WHY THE CALIFORNIA WEEKLY?

This new publication is the outcome of a conviction that there is not only room, but need, in California for a weekly paper, State-wide in its scope, which shall be in a position to tell the truth and advocate the right, unhindered by any interest or influence whatever. That conviction must be wide-spread, because two hundred persons, many of them among the best-known men in the community, have subscribed for shares of stock in the company which has established The California Weekly. No one of these persons has invested more than $500 in the enterprise, and no one has placed money in it with any reference to immediate pecuniary profit, though it is believed that a journal which can gain the confidence of the public, and keep it, will become stable and, in the long run, profitable. These facts are stated at the outset in order to save unnecessary speculation regarding the question of ownership and to make it clear that the paper is not the organ of any interest or influence even among its own stockholders.

It is proposed to publish a weekly paper which shall be as generally entertaining and readable as possible, and to that end there will be supplied literary and special features of the best merit obtainable. But beyond this there is, as indicated in the opening paragraph, a purpose more serious and one without which The California Weekly would not have been established. It is to represent the best conscience and best intelligence of the community in the discussion of the many issues, political, social and moral, which must arise in a State so great as this and having interests so diversified. There is a place for a weekly which will truly do this. The daily newspaper gives news and influences opinion, but it does not give all the news, and oftentimes that which is of the highest value is omitted. This is most likely to be the case with that which represents the results of serious study and investigation. In the thoughtful discussion of important questions the weekly is the more effective agency for public education.

The man who is now President of the United States will, in a few months, become the first citizen of the country, as he has been for four years at least, the most conspicuous personality in the world. People have wondered what he would find to do after his term of office, and his well-earned play spell, have ended. He has settled that. He will not become, as some have supposed that he might, president of a great university. He will not be the editor of a great daily or a great monthly magazine or review. He has decided to associate himself with the publication of a weekly paper of good reputation and with a good hold upon public confidence.

Good faith with its readers will be the aim of The California Weekly. There has been a growing skepticism among newspaper readers regarding the amount of confidence to be placed in printed information, especially in political or controverted matters. Yet in the nature of things there nowadays can be no other adequate source of general information. It is the ambition of The California Weekly to deserve, and thereby earn, the confidence of the people of California in the entire good faith and greatest attainable accuracy of its statements.

The California Weekly believes with the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League that the fundamental evil in American public life is corporate domination of public affairs, represented in California by the political bureau of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, and its allied interests, and it will urge the people of California to throw off that domination, but The Weekly will not be the organ of the League or of any other organization or influence.

This paper will stand unwaveringly for the equal enforcement of all our laws and will resist any tendency to set up one law for the millionaire and another for the man. Therefore it will uphold in all proper ways those officers of the law who are striving to bring to a successful termination the graft cases in San Francisco, and it will vigorously oppose any and all efforts to hamper the prosecution and thwart its purpose.

The paper itself will be its own best evidence of what it stands for and, in that belief, is respectfully commended to the reading public.

* Diplomacy, Not Bluster.

The relation of California toward the forthcoming tariff revision campaign calls for diplomacy rather than for bluster. Our position is a delicate one. We are producers of special products that must be protected or suffer annihilation. The 2,000 miles of land haul between us and our market makes the equivalent of a stiff tariff tax and always will, but the tariff is to be revised and revised downward. The standpatters may boast and bluster if they know of no better way to advance their cause, but that policy will avail little. The nation is convinced that predatory interests do find shelter behind high tariff walls and those walls are to be lowered if not levelled. That issue should mainly be fought out between the Rocky Mountains and the Atlantic Ocean where staple commodities are being produced almost without distinction with regard to State and State, city and city, town and town. It is an individual problem, a difference between neighbors. Let them settle it. California may, can and must stand aloof from it, asking only for justice from all because of her peculiar position and her specialized productions that must be grown here, if anywhere under the protection of our flag. With the aid of diplomacy and reserve and quietness of spirit, plus the innate justice of her cause, California should come out of the contest in good plight and owing no State or locality anything but good will.

Where Lies the Greater Danger?

It is well for the business interests of California to take, as planned, a well fortified position with reference to the proposed advance of freight rates on transcontinental shipments. These interests themselves are not only deeply interested, but they stand in a representative relation toward every producer and consumer in the State. Common carriers are engaged in a public, not a private, enterprise and there should be power somewhere to determine issues arising between the public and those who serve them by right of a public franchise. This is not saying that an increase in freight rates may not be justified when all facts involved are taken into account, but only that before any such increase is made a full hearing should be had and the common good safeguarded. As long as the world's product of gold outstrips consumption of that metal in the arts, and leaves an ever increased accumulation in the world's monetary chests, prices will rise and money will fall and it will take more of it to build railroads, equip them and pay operating expenses. In so far as this justification for an increase may obtain the railroads will not be without arguments tending to sustain their contentions, but if a full hearing shall disclose that rates are sought to be raised in order that increased dividends may be paid upon fictitious valuations of railroad securities, then the effort should be resisted by all the forces which industrial and commercial life can muster to do battle for the common good. There lies the greater danger.

The Channel Is Still There.

John Bull has ever been the personification of cool-headed confidence and has not been charged with timidity, yet he is beset with the fear that some European army may invade his tight little island, and this fear has haunted him from time immemorial. General Lord Roberts has just given new tongue to the old fear, with the result that the British Empire is on nettles. Nothing can be more absurd. Napoleon found ways enough for getting an army into England but none at all for getting one out again, and it is not likely that Kaiser Wilhelm would fare any better. The British government will do well to dismiss this obsession from its mind that it may the more uninterruptedly consider the problem of the unemployed. There have been few more important facts in all human history than that of the twenty-mile strip of water dividing Britannia from continental Europe, and that fact has by no means lost its significance. The strait is still there.

Look Farther and Do Better.

We have it upon the authority of Vice-President-elect Sherman that, if re-elected Speaker of the House, Uncle Joe Cannon will work cordially with President Taft, as no doubt he will if President Taft will do the things that Joe Cannon wants done when he wants them done, otherwise relations are likely to be as strained during the new administration as they have been with the present one. The new administration may easily do better by looking farther for a speaker. Joe Cannon lags.

Not for Kings and Emperors.

There are not many lands now in which the citizen is not at liberty to speak his mind if he have one, but the uneasy head that wears a crown has not the privilege. Kaiser Wilhelm is a masterful man. He has a mind of his own and a mind to speak it, but it is plain even to himself that he might easily play the mischief by speaking it. He has said nothing that is not obviously true, but neither the truth nor the obviousness of it becomes an international irritant until he has said the thing. Then it is. Europe seems now to be suffering from a widely diffused spirit of peevishness and every word that drops from the mouth of one high in authority increases the irascibility to a degree little less than alarming. It would seem that such adult nations as France and Germany, Russia and Great Britain, should put away childish things.

Graham Taylor regards the efforts of Samuel Gompers to throw the union labor vote to Mr. Bryan in the recent campaign as being more in the direction of detaching the labor vote from party dictation than a purpose to subject that vote to the dictation of unionist leadership. Dictation is a mean word when applied to anyone not a stenographer, and when applied to the suffrages of men it becomes intolerable, whoever would attempt it.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

THANKSGIVING.

Every man owes it to himself to have a few moments to himself every day of his life. Every being who does not propose living as the birds live, always in the present and never in conscious relation to the heretofore and the hereafter, as well as the now, needs to go away back and sit down with his own soul at least once in each twenty-four hours that he may orient himself, may take his latitude and longitude and so become conscious of his own position. To aid the formation of this salutary habit this paper will, in nearly every issue, have some one article that will make an especial appeal to the deeper significances of living. Just now we are all of us recovering from Thanksgiving.

It is probable that Thanksgiving was of old, to the many, an occasion for overeating, for sociability and jollity, but to that thoughtful few who at all times make public sentiment and impress themselves upon their age and its institutions Thanksgiving spoke mainly of dependence upon, and responsibility to, Almighty God, and it has been well for our nation that the dominant element in the shaping of the nation so deeply felt that dependence and that responsibility.

The theology of those periwigged old fathers, bending their way to the meeting house, may have been as rugged as the rocks among which they lived and as cold as the meeting houses in which they worshipped, but it had at least this merit: It never suffered one among them all to be without a sense of personal responsibility to the God of their fathers and of their posterity, and if our generation lacks one saving grace more than another it is that ever present sense of responsibility.

During 1907 there were 10,782 recorded cases of suicide in the United States, and there were three men to one woman who went out by that door. It has been pointed out that there are three women to one man in attendance upon worship on Sunday, or such other day in the week as religious services are held. Is it not possible that some relation may be traceable betwixt these two facts? Without a sense of dependence and responsibility upon some power that bends above us what has any human being left in the hour of crucial trial except suicide and a wish to blot existence out?

We repeat, it is profitable now and again, at least once in twenty-four hours, for each person whose head is not in an uncontrollable whirl, to draw himself a little out of the swim of things and, shall we say, pray? If not to pray at least, if he may, to find where he is "at" and just at this time, it may be well to dwell a moment on the fact that Thanksgiving has a deeper significance than gluttony.

GETTING CLOSE TO THE MUNICIPAL PROBLEM

[Special Correspondence of The California Weekly.]

The League of California Municipalities has recently been in session in Sacramento, this being the eleventh annual meeting of an organization whose practical work for the cause of good government has been as efficient as it has been unpretentious. Between it and the National Municipal League, which has also been holding an annual session, there is something of a contrast. The proceedings of the national organization consist largely of reading papers and making speeches on good government in the abstract, while the California league has been more disposed to devote attention to the proper way to dig sewer trenches or the best way of keeping municipal accounts. This avoidance of theoretical and attention to the strictly practical has kept the league alive and made it grow steadily in strength. It owes much, too, to the good common sense and organizing ability of its secretary, Mr. H. A. Mason.

Its history is interesting. In 1898 Mr. Mason, then city clerk of Santa Clara, called a meeting of city and town officials to talk over matters of common interest. It was held in San Francisco, where the league was organized, Mayor Phelan becoming its first president. In later years the representatives of the smaller cities and towns have manifested most interest in it, and neither San Francisco, Los Angeles, nor Oakland has done much to promote its progress. It was soon found that to keep up interest the organization must have a monthly journal and also that it must be supplied with enough funds to meet expenses necessarily incurred in its activities. So a magazine was started and has been continuously published, while the funds were provided by making the towns and cities themselves the members, and requiring from each a yearly payment proportioned to population. About a hundred cities and towns are now members, they pay from $10 to $60 each, and the total revenues amount to something like $2,000.

The annual meeting preceding the latest was held in Pasadena and was attended by a hundred mayors, city clerks, auditors, city attorneys, street superintendents, city engineers, treasurers and other officials. At the Sacramento meeting seventy-five attended, and it was a singular fact that out of about thirty thriving towns and cities in the Sacramento Valley only three, Sacramento, Chico, and Red Bluff, appeared to be represented. It has been noted before that while interested participants in the annual meetings usually come from the most distant places, the nearby towns almost neglect the opportunity for the exchange of views and information between men engaged in the work of conducting municipal governments. But as the proceedings of the annual meetings, including all the valuable papers, are printed in full in the journal during the course of the year, matters of interest are brought to the attention of a much larger audience.

In order to cultivate the professional spirit and to increase the interest several sub-organizations have been established and at the annual gatherings the discussions are conducted in the sections. Thus, while the city attorneys, who have their own organization, are discussing the latest decisions of the courts bearing on municipal affairs, the city engineers and street superintendents are meeting in another room and talking about sewer systems or street paving, and the clerks, auditors and engineers are having their own meeting to debate some such subject as uniform municipal accounting. At each meeting of the League of California municipalities it is demonstrated afresh that in the employ of the various local governments there are many bright young engineers, lawyers and accountants, besides an even larger number of non-professional men of hard-headed common sense. The town politician finds nothing to interest him and does not come twice to meetings of the league.

A subject of which the delegates to this year's meeting heard a great deal was petrolithic street paving. This is a new idea and a California idea, too; it first germinated in southern California, where so many new things are discovered, but it is being taken up and tried experimentally in many places, and it promises to become of interest wherever automobiles are operated on city streets and country roads. The automobile has precipitated a sort of crisis in street improvements, because it has proved to be a destroyer of macadamized highways, which were thought to be the last word in scientific road building everywhere outside of streets of heavy traffic in large cities. A smooth macadamized road makes a beautiful race course for automobiles, but the soft tires of rubber destroy the surface as iron wheels never did. The finely crushed rock which forms the top layer of a macadamized street or road is sucked up by the rubber and scattered, leaving the large stones exposed, and presently the highway is ruined. But now comes the petrolithic process to make a street which the automobile can use equally well and cannot destroy. At least, so say its advocates, and another great advantage is its cheapness.

It is merely a new application of a familiar idea, for the petrolithic road is an oiled road, only the oil is worked into the ground instead of being spread on top of it. Special machinery has been invented to do the work, the principal machine being a tamper, a heavy roller with innumerable feet projecting from it. The idea is said to have been suggested by seeing a flock of sheep, with their small sharp feet, walking over newly plowed ground and in so doing packing it hard. In making a petrolithic street the ground is first plowed up and harrowed and the proper crown given to the surface. Then the surface is wet down and rolled with the tamper, the function of which is to compact the dirt from the bottom, so to speak, instead of from the top. When the soil has been compacted to within six inches of the surface oil tanks are driven over it and three-quarters of a gallon of oil applied to each square yard. Then the tamping roller is used again; then more oil is applied, and the process is continued until two gallons of oil have been put on each square yard. Afterwards two inches of gravel or crushed rock are put on; the surface is cultivated to effect a thorough mixture of the rock or gravel with the soil, and finally another oiling is done, the total quantity of oil used in all stages of the process being three and a half gallons to the square yard. A petrolithic street properly made is said to be as smooth and dustless as a street can be and to last a long time with any kind of wear. There are two hundred miles of petrolithic roadway in Los Angeles, and a few miles of it have been constructed in this part of the State.

Mr. Peet, a very diffident man, was unable to prevent himself being introduced one evening to a fascinating young lady, who, misunderstanding his name, constantly addressed him as Mr. Peters, much to the gentleman's distress. Finally summoning up the courage, he earnestly remonstrated: "Oh, don't call me Peters. Call me Peet!"

THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE

FRANCIS J. HENEY.

We needed thunderbolt and fire of God
To drive us from this desert of sloth and shame,
For while on knavery's back he laid the oar,
We drowned through lack of red-hot will and shame.
"See," cried the traitorous voices of press,
"Boughten and vile, and voice of purchased hind—
This bleggery Henev adds to your distress!"
And we one-half believed: O, foods, and blind!

We needed thunderbolt and fire of God,
Through two long years, maligned by vilest men,
The way into our freedom Henev tried, and shame,
Unbought, unowned, true heart beyond our ken,
And then the venomous tongues of slander wagged
In lies that might have hearts of mercy lagged,
But still he went his way—our way—nor ever lagged,
While we—O, foolish ones—one-half believed!

Oh, burdened by our burden, this was he,
Through the days that we left undone,
While we stood back, or, tuned to libel's key,
Cried, "It were well this moulder all should shun."
Ah, this we did! We ran it to our shame—
We hid our faces from accusing light;
Too much we heeded those who most defame,
While still he waged the war of God and right.

And then the assassin's bullet, and we knew
"At last we knew how straightly he had stood
Gained robber barons and their bounteous crew,
For you, for me, for all that means our good."
And we have sworn in God's great name we swear
Full grateful that this Henev yet forth live,
That Freedom's burden we will help him bear,
And unto Justice chase his mite shall give.

This be the proof that we the right have seen;
This demonstrate, at last, we know, a MAX;
This prove our shame for yester's sudden mind,
And all the guilt to better morrow—span;
So, Francis Henev, stand you straight and tall,
As you have stood—no more could mortal do
Maintain your battle for your brothers' al!
And by the God of Right, we'll stand with you.

Newspapers and the Clergy.

"It was like this," said Juniper, "A beneficent Providence foresaw the difficulties, trials and adversities under which newspaper men are compelled to drag out their weary existence, and so it provided clergymen for them. A bit of news comes limping into the office, and the jaded city editor considers its availability. 'A quarter of beef disappears from a well-known butcher-shop. Nawthin' doin'," says he, 'throw it out!'"

"But did ye notice," says the intelligent reporter, "that a preacher lives in the same block, and 'tis susp—"

"Play it up for a first-page feature with a scarehead across the top of the page, and run pictures of the girl that was seen last in the vicinity of the shop, and don't forget to mention her remarkable beauty in your story," says the city editor, and 'tis so done. The public is terribly worked up over it, and it says the clergyman ought to be ashamed of himself, not to mention the beautiful girl, for whose youth some allowance should be made, as the picture of the Oshkosh beauty that was dug up for the occasion indicates that she must be on the sunny side of forty-three.

"If ye don't believe me, turn your attention to the case of Edna Clark and Rev. Payson Young. Disembowelled of a few hundred columns of newspaper frills and tucks, the case stands like this: Edna Clark is a young woman of the average youth of average young women of her age, average education, and more than the average lack of good sense. She disappeared, and the one person beyond all others who, it is certain, was not with her is Rev. Payson Young. Consequently, as ye read between the newspaper lines, it is queer about Rev. Young, and the case should be investigated.

"The newspapers will attend to the investigation, so ye needn't worry about it. They do it, discovering that Rev. Young is something like an average clergyman of average clerical intellect, who preaches average sermons on average Sundays to audiences of average smallness. But, oh, his dark and gloom-haunted past! With shudders of horror, the newspapers reveal the incriminating fact that he has kissed several women at various times. Deepening interest on the part of the public. As a clergyman, he should not have done it; he should have left it to the rest of us. Rouse ye, Romans! Rouse ye, slaves! If the clergy take to kissing the women, where do the rest of us get off? Also, Mr. Young kissed Edna Clark, and therefore he knows all about her.

"That is the story in a nutshell, but you never would suspect it in reading the columns and columns, and more columns, of newspaper fiction concerning it. Once in a while a man or woman glances at with a shake of the head, and says: 'It is too bad thus to drag Rev. Young in the mire when he may not be guilty,' or perhaps another says: 'Well, I don't know many people, and I am included, who would like to have all of their past dug up and displayed in the limelight.' But the most of us, or, at least, a great many, say, 'Hully chee! But isn't Young a sly one! Won't it be a joke on the clergy if he is proved guilty?' or, if we do not say it in words, we say it in actions. Ten thousand clergymen may do right, and little or nothing will be said about it, but let one go wrong, and then watch the newspaper fireworks!"

"Oh, yes," Juniper concluded, "the clergy are a gossend to the papers."

Does it strike you that perhaps he is right?

The Opinions of Rufus.

The philosopher that said they's a reason for ev'rything was mighty well satisfied with his 'pinion till he come home an' ketched his wife cryin' a few times. Since then he's sorter stidestepped.

I've noticed that I advertise my own folly in a blam' sight wrong tone o' voice than I do my neighbor's.

They's nuthin' wrong with 'wine, women 'an song' more'n they is with honey. Trouble is it tastes good, an' so we eat till we can't help noticin' 'bout that queer feelin'.

Willie says that Ethel's hair is golden. Our cat's hair is jest the same color, an' Willie says it's a hidjus yaller. I ain't explainin' it, but hain't ye ever noticed nuthin' of the kind?

The main object, as I understand it, of the Ruef prosecution is to prove that Ruef didn't lie when he said he was a briber, an' of course it bein' Ruef the nat'ral presumption is the other way.

'Lizabeth went to church last Sunday to glorify the A'mighty, an' I b'lieve she'd done it, too, if Sister Snooks hadn't wore her new hat. Still I never blamed 'Lizabeth an' I don't s'pose the Lord will, fer He knows she's fem'ine.

I see that you're allers in a hurry. Augustus. So's my pup, but I don't notice that he ever accomplishes anything very important.

Schmitz feeling gloomy, though the higher courts were good;
Ruef upon his trial, would be absent if he could;

Glass looking solemn, and Halsey in a daze—I wish you'd tell me, brother, if you think that hoodling pays.

Opportunity Comes—and Stays.

It has been said many times and in many ways, Rehoboth, that Opportunity comes once to every man and woman, us all. She does; you need not doubt that, but what I wish to insist upon in this is that she also stays. The dear old girl, maligned, abused, jostled, hustled, the recipient of cuffs and blows, is about the best stayer that travels down the world's broad pipe. She comes to the boy or girl about as soon as he or she begins to "take notice," and from that time all through the journey she never is far away.

"Say," Opportunity whispers to the young man, "here is your chance to do your plain, simple, unadorned duty, and make the winning that such doing always attains."

"Awfully sorry," the young man responds, "Probably you are right, but this is the evening for that little theater party, and a little dinner afterward, and a few primroses. Would it bother you too much to call again when I am not so busy?"

This is a solar plexus for Opportunity, and you might think, Rehoboth, that she would leave the young man permanently, but she merely goes around the corner while he gathers primroses and a large head, and the next day she is with him again. Probably he gives her a black eye this time, but she puts a beefsteak over it, and directly she is with him again, smiling and insistent as ever. I tell you, my boy, when it comes to staying qualities, I am placing my last nickel on the blessed old girl.

"You could be very useful to your good old mother to-day," Opportunity suggests to Mabel, "and in so doing you would be particularly useful to yourself as well."

"I know," murmurs coy Mabel, "but there's Chawlie."

And Chawlie gets the persimmon, while Opportunity and the good old mother talk, but asks together. Another knockout blow for Opportunity, even from Mabel's small white fist, but she picks herself up and is with Mabel again just as soon as Chawlie has finished saying good night through three bliss-painful hours. Oh, you can't beat Opportunity as a stayer and permanent fixture in the lives of men and women.

So don't run away with the idea, Rehoboth, my boy, that Opportunity knocks but once at any man's door. She comes again and again, and her knocking is heard at our doors every blessed day of our faltering lives. As a knocker she beats even the unfortunate citizen who doesn't believe in the city and tells every stranger so. Always she is with us, and we no more can permanently drive her away than we can hurry Central when we want a number.

And so endeth the first lesson, Rehoboth, and you will be better off if you pay some attention to it.

Up-to-Date Fables.

An editor who had long dallied with chills misfortune and grinding penury, and who was a well known habitué of free-lunch routes, suddenly flashed out in tailor-made clothing and a 7-carat diamond solitaire.

"You look opulent," said a man who had been in the habit of passing him by on the other side.

"That's what I am," the editor replied, with a blithesome chortle.

"New subscribers?"

"Nay, nay, Pauline; not that anybody has noticed."

"More advertisers?"

"Nixie! Nix! They're falling off."

"Then how do you manage to accumulate the simoleons?"

The editor took the man behind an adjacent barn, and whispered in his ear.

"Dear man," he confided, "I enjoy an extensive acquaintance with the indicted grafters."

Moral:—A "higher-up" acquaintance is not rather to be chosen than great riches, but sometimes it is the next thing to it.

A certain young woman was weeping bitterly.

"Why do you weep?" a friend inquired.

"Alas!" the young woman responded, "I am so plain, so homely, so ugly!"

"Then why don't you have yourself made beautiful," the friend replied. "You know how."

So the young woman went and did something scandalous, and all the newspapers read about it, at the same time assuring their readers that she was "beautiful, attractive, and charming."

Moral:—Almost any girl can be beautiful, attractive, and charming—in the papers—if she is willing to pay the price.

There was a boy who was the terror of the neighborhood, so much so that all the mothers in the vicinity used to call their children in when they saw him coming for fear that he would teach them to do and say naughty things; and forever he carried a chip on his shoulder, and he used language that is not approved by the best authorities.

And when he went home at night his mother used to put her arm tenderly about him, and say, "Mamma's own little angel!"

Moral:—If it were not for our mothers, some of us never would be appreciated.

Clytemnestra Adelina.

"They named the dear child, their first," said Grandma Spraggins, reflectively, "to fit her initials."

"I don't understand what you mean," said I. "No, I s'pose not," the good old lady replied; "like's not you don't. Y'see, 'twas like this: Fore the little one come 'long 'twas mighty sweet an' tetchin' to see how anxious his ma was to have ev'rything jest so fer the little darling. They want a thing that hadn't ben done, an' she even had' brodered his initials on his cute little clothes, fer 'says she, 'his pa's name is Charles Adolphus, an' he's goin' to have the same name as his pa, so I thought I'd better 'broider the initials just to show how perfectly sweet they look on his little clothes.' Oh, they ain't nuthin' like mother love, is they, an' when I looked at them darlin' little things with the initials on 'em I couldn't help reelin' in it."

"I don't wonder that you felt so," said I. "There is nothing more tender, more beautiful, or more sacred, than a young mother's preparations to receive and bless the little soul that's to come hereafter from the mists."

"Yes, that's what I think," said Grandma

Spraggins, beaming upon me, "And then the little one come, an' 'see-an' so—"

"And so?" I repeated, inquiringly.

"An' so they named the little darling Clytemnestra Adelina, 'cause they hated to change all the initials on them cute little clothes."

The Great White Way.

Oh, the Great White Way, and the merry, merry way, With its million lights a glimmer, bright and brighter Than the day,
With its song and sing of laughter and its dancing eyes ashore
To the luring eyes that sparkle to the sparkle of the wine,
The crooning of the music, and its message to the heart,
As the visitor and the motorist meet a moment, then to part,
And the nameless thrill that holds us, shaken-handed, in its way,
As we dance a round with I treasure on the Great White Way.

Ho, my brothers, fill your glasses! Ho, my sisters, here
With the sparkling spell of glances that tomorrow we forget
This one night for love and laughter, merrily dead and Conscience nipped,
Why look toward the morrows that may never, never come, Phantom treasure, lead us ever! (Down the street is Sorrow's brood.)

Here's a pledge to eyes a-quarrel in the maddening moon, Music, wine and women ever! We, their bondsmen, to
The day,
In the singing rout and revel of the Great White Way.

Oh, the Great White Way with its laughter shrilling high But last night there came a stranger—'twas a coffin passing by,
Bearing a lonely sleeper, strangely white and strangely still,
Heaving not the tongue of laughter, heaving not the muscle's thrill,
Then the maddening rout grew madder, Ho, my brothers, drink no more,
Ho, my sisters, lift with glances all the staidest sons of men,
Let us forget for merrily maddens as we own the maddening's swag,
That a coffin's waiting for us down the Great White Way.

No One Questions It.

An automobile party was touring through the mountainous district of Western Pennsylvania, and had made a stop in one of the small towns to make some repairs to the machine.

While they waited the attention of one of the party was called to an intelligent looking lad of about fourteen, who seemed to be very much interested in the work, and of whom the following question was asked:

"Say, son, what do you live on out here?"

"Nuthin'," replied the somewhat surprised youth. "Dad's a preacher."—Judge.

His Initials.

Henry A. Turner is a commercial traveler whose work takes him up and down the State of Texas. In Fort Worth recently he needed a hat, so he proceeded to one of the city's grandest men's furnishing stores and stated the fact. The obliging young clerk who waited upon him, after the purchase had been made, proudly announced that his house had the only machine in town for cutting initials in the leather bands of head-coverings and asked if Turner would like to have his chapeau marked.

"What initials?" inquired the merchant-prince-to-be, swelling out his chest.

"Well, let me see," said the reflective Turner, and after further deliberation announced his choice as "H. A. T."

"H. A. T.?" gasped the astonished clerk.

"Yes, H. A. T.; that'll be enough."

So the hat was marked, and, putting it on, the drummer started out of the store, according to the St. Louis Republic. The mystified clerk's curiosity got the better of him before the customer had reached the street, and hurrying up, he asked pardon, and said he would like to know the reason for those letters, adding:

"Why anybody can see it's a hat."

"Yes, I know," said Turner, without a smile, "but you see I'm afraid I'll get up some morning and think it's a shirt or one of my socks."

Evidently Mrs. Young's Oyster.

The Youngs had unexpectedly dropped in on the Baileys just as dinner was about to be served. The hostess, considerably disturbed, called her little daughter Helen aside, and explained that there would not be enough oysters to go round, and added:

"Now, you and I will just have some of the broth, and please do not make any fuss about it at the table."

Little Helen promised to remember and say nothing. But when the oysters were served, Helen discovered a small oyster in her plate, which had accidentally been ladled up with her broth. This puzzled the little girl, and she could not recall any instructions covering this contingency. After studying a few moments, she dipped the oyster up with her spoon and, holding it up as high as she could, piped out:

"Mamma, mamma, shouldn't Mrs. Young have this oyster, too?"—Christina Register.

Catching the "Tone."

He was a well-meaning young man, but as curate in a small village he had never occasion to meet the class of people to which he had just been appointed, says the New York Times.

His new rector, wishing to help him on to success, had been liberal with advice, and had duly impressed him with the importance of always taking the "tone" of the people with whom he mingled. Being invited to take dinner at the mansion of one of the members of the congregation and knowing that he would have to say grace, the young curate took his cue from the conversation overheard before dinner, and when his hostess nodded meaningly in his direction, he delivered himself of the following, which he considered quite in keeping with the "tone" of the guests assembled:

"O Lord, thanks awfully; jolly good feed, wot?"

SUGGESTED REFORM IN CRIMINAL PROCEDURE

Written for The California Weekly by ORRIN KIP McMURRAY, Professor of Law, University of California.

"Speaking generally, the improvement of justice, civilly and criminally, in the matter of its prompt despatch and the cheapening of its use for the poor man, is the most important question before the American people," said Mr. Taft in an interview at Hot Springs, Va., and a few days later he delivered a memorable address upon the subject before the Virginia Bar Association in which he said:

"Courts and Legislatures could devote themselves to no higher purpose than the elimination from the present system of those of its provisions which tend to prolong the time in which judicial controversies are disposed of."

The very definite suggestion of the President-elect appears as quite an obvious need when applied to the procedure in civil cases, though its importance may be less apparent in connection with criminal cases. But a consideration of the matter will, I think, bring out the result that expedition is of far more importance in criminal cases than in civil cases. The poor litigant in civil cases is more or less of a myth. Usually such cases deal with property rather than with personal rights, and property usually manages to find means to take care of itself. In such matters litigation is often resorted to because of the obstinacy or evil passions of one or both of the parties, and the lapse of a sufficient cooling time between the wrong complained of and its final determination is not always a thing to be deplored. Perhaps I have stated the matter rather paradoxically, but what I wish to call attention to is that the encouragement of litigation is in itself not a desirable end; it is perhaps better for society that disputes be arbitrated than that its members should be disposed to perpetual warfare. On the other hand, the trial of persons charged with crime is, in the modern State, a matter of paramount importance. From the point of view of the innocent person charged with crime it is obvious enough that a speedy trial is indispensable, and though not so obvious at first, a little thought will convince us, I think, that in the case of the guilty, it is not less important.

The unfortunate thing about the whole matter is that the delay in such exceptional cases as People vs. Suesser gives an entirely false conception as to the actual efficiency of the system. As a matter of fact, the system is really not inefficient. The records of the District Attorney's office in New York City for several years, show that the average time from arrest to final judgment in prison cases, including preliminary hearing, the hearing of the evidence by the Grand Jury, the finding of the indictment, and the final disposition by trial, plea of guilty or discharge, was only eight days. And yet public complaint as to the law's delay is not less in New York than in our own State. In San Francisco in 1900, 702 felony cases were finally disposed of, and at the end of the period there were only fifty-seven cases pending undetermined. In other words, the District Attorney and the courts disposed of more than two felony cases daily.

Not only, in the case of the average offender, is the punishment speedy, but it is also certain. From 1902 to 1904, out of 2,503 persons tried for felony throughout the state, 2,120 were convicted and 383 acquitted; from 1904 to 1906, out of 2,711 tried, 2,428 were found guilty and 283 acquitted; from 1906 to 1908 the ratio was 2,678 to 371. And of those convicted very few escaped punishment through the medium of appeal. Only 134 defendants from 1902 to 1904 exercised their privilege of appeal, and in 97 of those cases the appeal was without avail, and the sentence was affirmed. In only thirty-seven out of 2,120 cases was the decision of the trial court disturbed. Of the 134 appellants forty-two or about one-third were defendants convicted of murder and manslaughter. From 1904 to 1906 there were only 109 appeals to the Supreme Court and District Courts of Appeal, and out of those 109 appeals twenty-six only were reversed and eighty-three were affirmed. Of the 109 appeals, forty-five were in homicide cases. The proportion of reversals to indictments and informations during this period was sixty-two hundredths of one per cent. That is, only six persons out of every thousand charged with felony got some benefit from the appellate courts.

If we remember that of the cases reversed, probably one-half at the least were against the defendants, it is plain that the actual number of guilty persons escaping punishment through the medium of appeals is very inconsiderable. It is a conservative estimate to say that not three out of a thousand defendants finally escape punishment through this means.

When we come to consider the question whether or not substantial justice is observed in the disposition of cases on appeal, we pass from the region of safe fact to the region of mere opinion. Some years ago our Supreme Court reversed a murder case because the indictment did not state that the victim, who was named in the indictment, was a human being. The Supreme Court of Kentucky not long ago reversed a murder case because the judge told the jury that they could not convict the defendant on the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice. He did not say "accomplice or accomplices," but neither did the Statute, which he read word for word. The defendant thought the words "or accomplices" ought to have been inserted by the judge, though they were not in the Statute, and so did the Supreme Court of Kentucky. Thus Caleb Powers escaped the gallows. Was it more absurd for the California court to say that the omission of one of the elements defined in the Penal Code as constituting the crime of murder rendered Lee Look's conviction bad, than it was for the Kentucky court to say that the omission of something not stated in the Statute rendered Powers' conviction bad?

There are not many cases, however, of the character of the Lee Look case or of the Powers case. In most instances the grounds of decision are broader and more human, and I think that, as a rule, even persons unskilled in the law would agree that the great majority of decisions are not technical. It may not be amiss to state that Lee Look was again convicted on a new indictment, and his conviction sustained on a second appeal. But it may be urged, What then was the use of reversing the case the first time? And this brings up the question, What is the use of a court of review anyway? If, as the figures I have quoted show, so few seek the advantage of an appeal, and if only three out of a thousand get any result from it, and if some of those three cases are like Lee Look's, what is the use of preserving such an expensive part of the judicial machinery? Besides, as to real justice, is it more likely to be done by an honest judge who is near to the people and a jury of common sense citizens, or by a body of rather conservative men who don't hear the evidence, who don't see the witnesses, but who read big printed briefs in a dusty library and decide, maybe, according to the notions of some old bewigged and begowned English judge of ten generations ago?

It may well be doubted whether the right of appeal does exist mainly that justice may be done in the particular case. Not that it is not an important part of the appellate court's business to decide the particular case, but its most important functions are probably interpretative and regulative. It declares the law; it preserves its unity. Without a tribunal of authority to declare the law, we would in time have as many systems of law as there are judges. The fact that the business actually performed by these courts in connection with the administration of criminal law is inconsiderable, should not blind us to their real importance; the fact that in the exceptional case there is either absurdity or delay should not be taken as a basis for a general arraignment of the appellate court.

And yet it is the exceptional case, like the Suesser case, or the recently decided Botkin case, that stands out in the public mind. What is the sentiment of the public when a notorious malefactor is found guilty by a jury? He will appeal and tie the matter up for years, and will probably succeed in reversing the sentence—so thinks the public. Whether finally affirmed or reversed, if a long period elapses between the verdict and its affirmation, the conviction loses most of its tonic effect upon the public mind, and the prevailing sentiment against the criminal judge, upon counsel for the State, and counsel for the defendant. With the pen of genius, Dickens, in his Bleak House points out how the dry rot of the Court of Chancery attacked and destroyed all who came within its influence. The spirit of procrastination and uncertainty typified in the case of Jarnyce vs. Jarndyce permeated the whole atmosphere; the very streets and houses about the court were touched by the taint. So in respect to the present sentiment. The defendant's counsel tries the case to make error, the State's counsel to avoid error. The trial judge fears to make rulings as his own judgment dictates and decides as he thinks some court of review might require. For example, hardly a criminal case of importance now arises in which the members of the Grand Jury are not examined for bias; sometimes days, nay, weeks, are spent in the search for prejudice, not in the hope that the trial court will quash the indictment, but in the hope that he refuse to set it aside, and that possibly an error may be committed for which a court of review may possibly reverse, if the defendant is finally convicted. Now the possibilities involved here are very remote, for under the law as established in this State, it makes no difference whether or not some members of the Grand Jury were biased, provided that a sufficient number of competent jurors were present and found an indictment. But difficult as it is to prove bias, and unimportant in the outcome as it is likely to be, even though one or two jurors should be biased,—though no case has ever been reversed on this ground in this State,—though the power of examination of grand jurors has never been held to be the right of the defendant in California, and it most certainly was not his right at common law,—the trial judge permits day after day to be consumed so that a possible error may not happen, and the defendant's counsel wastes day after day in the expectation that a possible error may be committed. The trial judge reasons thus: "Most probably the courts of review would not disturb the verdict if I refused to permit the examination, but it is better to be certain; the trial will occupy weeks, probably, the appeal years, and if by any chance my present opinion that the jury should not be examined should prove wrong and the case is reversed upon that ground two or three years hence, I should feel greatly at fault."

And just as the trial judge reasons, so the defendant's counsel reasons, looking at the problem from a different standpoint. And so the whole machinery of the courts is obstructed by a shadow. If trial judges knew that an affirmation or a reversal was sure to follow in a short time after the verdict in appeal cases, a strong motive would exist for them to apply the law as they believed it, rather than to attempt to steer an impossible course. They could afford to take ordinary risks of reversal. If defendant's counsel knew that the game of delay was one that it hardly paid to play, we would have more cases well tried before the jury than for the sake of the record.

The certainty of the law, which, as we have seen, really exists, can only be made vivid to trial judges and counsel by a swift despatch of their business by the courts of review.

As the matter stands at present, it is not difficult to enumerate many cases where from three to four years elapse between the verdict and the final determination by the appellate court. The average case in the Supreme Court occupied one year and three months on appeal, in the period from 1902 to 1904, and in the period from 1904 to 1906, one year, four months and fourteen days. Yet that it is possible to dispose of appeals more rapidly, is shown by the fact that in one case, People vs. Nihil, only two months and twenty-one days elapsed between the jury's verdict and the final decision in the Supreme Court. The court itself was not directly to blame for most of the delay. The greater part of the time was consumed in getting the case into the Supreme Court, for which, of course, the District Attorney's and defendant's counsel were wholly responsible. The Supreme Court, as its business is at present constituted, knows nothing of the appeal until the transcript is filed. This is done by the defendant and it regularly should be filed within forty days after appeal, but the cases are very numerous where a year is allowed to elapse without the transcript being filed, and in one case,—a murder case,—six years, two months and twenty-eight days were taken in preparing the transcript. In People vs. Wynne, the transcript followed the verdict in three years, five months and eleven days, and in People vs. Manning, in three years and four months. It took nine months and nine days to get the transcript filed in the average case in the Supreme Court from 1904 to 1906, and seven months and five days after its filing for the court to decide it.

If appeals were decided as well as they now are decided, within ninety days after verdict, instead of nearly a year and a half after the verdict, if the exceptional Suesser and Botkin cases were rendered impossible, we would have much less about the law's technicalities and delays, or about propositions to abolish the right of appeal, or to try dangerous experiments affecting the rights of the individual. The attitude of the community towards the law, including trial judges and lawyers, would considerably change for the better. If the judges of the courts of review would realize the importance of Mr. Taft's words, it would be an easy matter to frame a few rules that would compel lawyers engaged in criminal appeals to expedite the business pending before the courts. Some legislation might be needed and could be suggested by those judges; but would probably be in the direction of clearing away those Statute and Code provisions that interfere with a simple and effective procedure, rather than in line with the New York statute passed in 1902 directed to this very matter, which provides that appeals in all capital cases shall be dismissed unless brought to a hearing within six months after appeal. The Legislature would doubtless readily pass any Statutes which the courts might think necessary to enable them to simplify and despatch the business that came before them.

It is not claimed that the good results that would flow from the speedy determination of appeals would cure all the evils in the present administration of criminal law. But it can hardly be gainsaid that a rule which would prevent such results as occurred in the cases of Suesser, of Botkin, of Clark, of Manning, and a host of others, would be a distinct advance along the line which Mr. Taft has pointed out.

In the Right Direction.

Bishop Bloomfield was one of the many witty Englishmen whose good things have found their way into a recent volume of reminiscences, "Leaves from the Notebooks of Lady Dorothy Nevill."

Bishop Bloomfield was led into a controversy one time with a learned man as to the mental superiority of the East over the West, and his opponent, as a parting shot, said:

"Well, at any rate, you can't dispute that the Wise Men came from the East."
"Surely, that was the wisest thing they could do," retorted the bishop.

A Useful Echo.

"Out where I live," says the man with the wide-brimmed hat and the large mustache, according to the Chicago Post, "we have a gulch we call Political Canyon, and in that gulch is the most remarkable echo you ever heard."

"Yes," dubiously inquires the listener.
"Yes, sir. Why, you can fire off a revolver on one side of the gulch and the echo will take up the sound and repeat the report all day and night."

"That is not so—"
"But the remarkable part of it is that next morning the echo begins denying the report."

Belated Leap Year Story.

A mismatched family's troubles were being aired in the Supreme Court, room T, says the Indianapolis Journal.

Judge McMaster listened to the man's story—he was the plaintiff and had charged his wife with cruel and inhuman treatment. He was a small man, and his wife—well, there were at least apparent grounds for the charge. After the plaintiff had finished his testimony, Judge McMaster decided to ask a question.

"Where, Mr. Trouble, did you meet your wife, who has treated you this way?"

"Well, judge, (somewhat meekly), you see it's this way; I never did meet her. She just kind of overtook me."

Field's Head for Business.

In the early eighties, when Eugene Field was managing editor of the Denver Tribune, newspapers in that city were not conducted with metropolitan preciseness, says the Philadelphia Ledger. Field's official position gave him access to the money drawer. He would take out such amount as he needed and drop a memorandum, known as a "tab," for the guidance of the bookkeeper. In this manner he was generally contrived to have his salary expended several weeks in advance.

One day Field was in a hurry and, as usual, in need of cash. Rushing to the money-drawer he hastily scooped out coins and bills, transferred them to his overcoat pocket and started away. But apparently he was struck by the thought that this would be confusing to the accountant, for he returned, and, scribbling a "tab," placed it in the raised drawer. When Fred Skiff, the business manager, opened the drawer a little later, he found nothing but the slip of paper bearing the legend: "Took all there was, Gene."

A Parliamentary Strategem.

It was at an informal session, after one of the regular meetings of a religious convention, that the New Hampshire minister told some of his best stories, says the Youth's Companion. "There is one man in our church," he said, "who is as good as gold, but so long-winded that he tires everybody out."

"At one time it was suggested by one of the deacons that in order to avoid the extreme length of this good man's remarks at prayer meeting, we might make a five-minute limit." "This I inaugurated at the next meeting, and it was cheering to us all, to see that when the long-winded man rose to speak he held his open watch in his left hand."

"When the limit was all but reached, he said: 'Finding, my dear friends, that I have only a few seconds left in which to speak, and having much to say, I will throw the rest of my remarks into the form of a prayer.'"

A New Bryan Anecdote.

Last winter when William Jennings Bryan was here, says the Binghamton, N. Y., Press, he attended an informal reception, for men only. He had told a number of clean, witty stories, when suddenly a man, a stranger, edged through the crowd and began to joke with Mr. Bryan. Nothing was thought of this, as it was a game of conversational give and take. Suddenly from the lips of the stranger there fell a single coarse remark.

The Commoner's jaw set like a steel trap, and his eyes flashed. The stranger was quickly hustled out of the room.

"He was a stranger, Mr. Bryan," said one present, "and had no business here. We beg your pardon for this occurrence."

"Never mind me," said Mr. Bryan, his eyes softening. "The man's ill-judged remark did me no harm, and I know he had no business here, but"—pointing to a lad of fifteen years, who was watching the scene and waiting for a handshake—"it was not just the sort of speech for the laddie to hear."

THE WORK OF Allen's Press Clipping Bureau FOR PUBLIC MEN

Allen's Press Clipping Bureau has now had experience in six National and five State Campaigns. In this time it has had the honor of serving hundreds of public men, including members of the Cabinet, U. S. Senators, Congressmen, Governors, State Senators and Assemblymen, Mayors, and State and County Central Committees.

It has aided these men by bringing them quickly, easily, and cheaply, what the entire press has to say of them or the measures in which they are interested.

A thorough clipping service discloses the state and trend of public opinion, brings to attention false charges that should be denied, true charges that should be parried; shows what editors need argument, and what editors need encouragement—in short, aids in handling the most powerful and important of political engines, the Press.

Having three offices, a staff of thirty people, and reading and copy editors per week, we have now unsurpassed facilities for very high-grade and thorough work.

We can cover every State, District, the State, or the Pacific States.

Rates will be furnished on application.

ASS'S SPRING

From the German of Rudolf Baumbach, Translated for The California Weekly by Hugh Jeidell.

[Rudolf Baumbach, 1840-1905; born in Lachsen-Muegen, in Thuringia, where his father, who was a physician; studied at several German universities, taking the degree of Ph. D.; traveled extensively; taught a few years in Austrian colleges; then devoted himself entirely to literature; became titular counselor to the district court of Bamberg, where he died in 1905. His writings include a dozen volumes of lyrical and epic poetry; a historical romance—"Truggold und Fools Gold"; and a large number of short stories, fantastic tales and "novellets." Without being literature of the very highest order, they are of the quality of true art—worthy in content and honest and attractive in expression—and have given their author an assured place in the history of German literature.]

Baumbach's work much resembles, as it were, his native Thuringia, that romantic district famous for its beauty of landscape, quaint customs, and wealth of folklore and historical tradition. In his "Maerchen," i. e. "Fairy Tales," he has produced a unique variety of that species by skillfully interweaving the fantastic figures and events of fairyland with the conditions of modern reality. The following tale—"Ass's Spring"—is taken from Baumbach's "Sommer maerchen," i. e. "Summer Fairy Tales."]

In a green vale that is completely encircled by steep mountains, rises a cool, bounteous spring, known as the "Ass's Spring." It is walled in and protected by a roof, on the top of which there turns as weather-vane, a tin ass.

Every summer morning the spring is lined by pale young ladies, and under the watchful eyes of solicitous mothers or chaperoning aunts, sip the cool water from dainty cups. Gentlemen, too, visit the spring—by no means only such as are sickly, but also strapping fellows with brown faces and bold and twisted mustaches. A gray-haired military man who for thirty years has been coming and going with the swallows; a poetizing miss with long straw-colored locks; a mysterious widow in deep mourning; a prestidigitator in great demand in rainy weather, who makes money disappear and performs card tricks—all these are present at Ass's Spring; and thus nothing is lacking of what belongs to so-called "high society resort." Oh! almost we had forgotten the main thing, which is the landlady of the "Golden Goose." She rules with absolute sovereignty, is a fine cook, and treats high and low with an honest, if somewhat rude, straightforwardness which acts on the city folk as refreshingly as May dew.

Over the origin of the spring's name there is much dispute; some relating that the pawing of a thirsty ass had disclosed the spring; others maintaining it got its name from the circumstance that its water, like ass's milk, is beneficial to weak constitutions. But both opinions are erroneous. And that will be abundantly plain to every one who follows this story to the end.

Many, many years ago, when the mightiest tree of that forest yet slumbered, a seed in a brown acorn, nothing was known of the curative powers of what was to be Ass's Spring. Then its guests were the beasts of the wood or grazing cattle, herdsmen and woodchoppers, huntsmen and charcoal-burners; and the men praised the cool water, and the animals, in their way, did likewise.

One day two beings stood by the spring—one on this side, one on the other. He was an ass—and she was a goose, both in the first flush of youth. They exchanged a silent salute and quenched their thirst. Then the ass approached the goose and asked bashfully: "May I walk with you, Miss?"

She nodded and had liked to blush, but that was beyond her; and together they went through the meadow and talked of the weather. They had gone some distance, when the ass stopped and asked: "Whither leads your way, Miss?"

Sadly the goose bent a side-long glance at her companion and said softly: "If I but knew, myself! Oh, I'm the unhappiest creature under the sun!" And when the ass had questioned further and urged her to ease her mind, she told him her history.

"My name is Adelaide," said the goose, "and I am of good family. My ancestress was one of those sacred geese that saved the capital—of course, you know the story, Sir?"

The ass responded with a hesitating: "Y-ah." As a matter of fact, he had heard nothing of the story, but he would not offend the goose.

"Another of my forefathers," Adelaide continued, "was on most friendly terms with St. Martin; a dark legend has it that she even went to her death for his sake. But I will not dwell on my ancestors; let me speak of myself. I first saw the light of this world in the company of eleven brothers and sisters who were born at the same time, on a farm where my mother, as setting goose, resided in a style appropriate to her rank. I was mother's favorite, for in our family the youngest child is always the most highly gifted."

"Exactly as with us," remarked the ass. "I'll pass over my childhood," the goose went on—"the merry games in the village pond and the little lake in the squire's park, where in the company of some young swans I acquired that elegance of movement for which I've had praise so often."

"I had shed the yellow down of early youth and bloomed into womanhood, when there appeared on the farm a man with a hooked nose, with a glossy black curl adorning either temple, and with a bundle slung over the shoulder. The farmer's wife and the maids gathered round him and cast longing eyes at the gay-colored ribbons and shawls which he took from his pack. To make it short: I was caught and, bound wing and foot, handed over to the stranger, who had taken me in barter for a blue kerchief decorated with red roses."

"Then followed sad days. I was locked into a narrow stall and with balls of barley-flour developed into a—stuffed-goose. With horror I noticed that my waist-measure grew from day to day, and not even my grief at my desperate situation could check the evil."

Here the ass gave an expressive look at his companion and affirmed he had never seen a more elegantly formed goose. With a grateful glance at the ass the goose resumed:

"In the last night—I shudder to think of it—I heard agonized screams, coming evidently from the throat of one of my fellow prisoners. I saw two eyes gleaming in the moonlight and heard a death-rattle—a fox or pole-cat must have broken into the barn. Fear gave me strength. I squeezed through the rails and gained the open—I was saved. My wings bore me into this vale, and here I'll try to elude out an existence as wild-goose until winter, when I may perhaps obtain a modest situation as snow-goose."

Adelaide heaved a deep sigh and was silent. "My fate," said the ass, "resembles your own, Miss Adelaide. Look at the black cross on my shoulder, that will tell you everything; I am of the tribe of the palm-asses and my name is Baldwin. My family-tree goes back to Noah's Ark; Balaam's ass and he with whose jawbone Samson slew two thousand Philistines, were ancestors of mine. Be it mentioned only in passing, that I was also one of my forefathers who died, a true philosopher, between two bundles of hay; nor shall I dilate on the achievements of my ambitious ancestor who founded the collateral line of the mules. My parents were convent folk and carried pious monks on their journeys. My elder brothers also became serving brethren; we, however, the holy father sold to the miller of the monastery, and I, a palm-ass, was compelled by human brutes to pack vile sacks of flour! For a time I bore it in quiet resignation; at last, however, my maltreatment—O that beast of a miller's boy!—drove me desperate; I broke my fetters and reached this peaceful mountain valley, where I found you at the spring, charming Adelaide. Here I intend to remain for the time being and to lead a contemplative life as wood-ass."

Thus ass and goose remained in the valley. They had their dwellings apart, as the properties demanded, but they met and talked together daily; and finally one could not live without the other. They were happy and sad at once; happy, because of their love; sad, because they recognized they could never belong to each other.

"Oh, that I was born a goose!" was Adelaide's plaint; and Baldwin sighed: "Were I but a bird!"—and he knew precisely what kind of bird he had liked to be.

Weeks went by. The ass grew visibly thinner, though the valley lacked not an abundance of nourishing fare; and the red paled on the goose's bill and her eyes grew misty.

Now there dwelt in that forest, in a hollow rock, a very old owl. That was the wisest woman for miles around, and often would the forest folk seek her advice. And thus the ass went to her with a moving account of his distress. When the owl had heard him she said: "I have no help for a case like this; but wait until the turning of the sun—then the wish fairy comes to bathe in the spring of the meadow-vale. Confide your sorrow to her, and, maybe, she will help you and change your form; for she is a great sorceress."

Half-consolated, the ass trotted away. On the eve of the summer solstice, when Adelaide had repaired to her chamber for the night, he hid himself near the spring and awaited the coming of the wish-fairy. She did not keep him waiting long. In gown of swan's down she came dyed blue, threw off the magic garment and bathed her white limbs in the cool water. With an ass's patience the ass waited till she had left the spring; and when she was seated on a rock and had begun to comb her hair, he appeared, gave three salutatory paws with his fore-hoof and piteously besought the fairy to turn him into a gander.

The sorceress shook her head. "That is a curious wish," she said; "but I can and will grant it." And she whispered into the ear of the devoutly listening ass: "Tomorrow morning, at sunrise, pluck seven daisies and eat them in silence; then dip your head into the spring and you will be turned into a handsome gander. And now go your way, and leave me alone."

Deeply moved, the ass gave thanks and went. All night he closed not an eye, and as soon as the mountain tops showed the first faint flush of red he was afoot to get the seven daisies. Then he hurried to the spring, dipped his head, and when he pulled it out again he gazed in ecstasy on the image of an elegant gander with beautiful curved neck, mirrored in the surface of the water.

As fast as he could he hastened to the bush where the goose had made her residence. "Adelaide, my beloved Adelaide," he cried, "where are you?"

"Here, my beloved," it came from the thicket; and out of the bushes pranced a dainty she-ass.

Petrified with horror the lovers looked at each other.

"O, ass that I am!" groaned the gander.

"O, goose that I am!" moaned the she-ass. Then hot tears stole from their eyes, and sobbingly Adelaide related how by the owl's advice she had sought the wish-fairy and, on her hard begging, had been changed into a she-ass. Hereupon the gander told his story, interrupted by rending sobs; and never has the midsummer sun shone on two unhappier creatures than our two lovers.

Time heals. In place of wild pain there came resigned suffering. One hope the couple clung to: Perhaps they could prevail on the wish-fairy at her next visit to restore to one of them the original form. But till then a full year must go by. Patience, therefore, patience! And again Adelaide and Baldwin dwelt together like brother and sister.

After many a danger and distress that the winter brought the two anchorites, spring once more came into the land; the sun mounted higher and ever higher; and at last it was the eve of the summer solstice.

With beating hearts the lovers—this time together—went to the spring and put their case before the wish-fairy.

"That's bad—very bad," said the sorceress. "I cannot change back either of you, dearly as I should like to do you the favor. But let me make a suggestion: how would it be were you to become human? To make a young fellow and a young girl out of an ass and a goose—that is not so difficult, that I can do. Are you willing?"

"Yes," cried Adelaide and Baldwin in unison. The wish fairy murmured a spell and bade the two plunge their heads into the spring. They obeyed, and when they stood erect once more, there was Baldwin, a strapping young fellow with extremely good-natured features; and facing him, a charming little woman with dainty pouting red mouth and languishing eyes.

They fell on their knees and gratefully kissed the hands of the good fairy; and then they kissed and kissed each other and whispered tender nothings in each other's ear. The wish-fairy, however, who noticed that she was superfluous, got into her feather-robe and flew away.

The two young people remained in the valley. Baldwin built a house; and in it they passed many happy days, and every year there came a child, now a boy, then a girl.

No one in the surrounding villages suspected that Baldwin had been an ass, and Adelaide a goose; for they were about as rational as other people. Nor did they hanker to have the story of their transmutation noised abroad, for that would have hurt their reputation. But in their dying hour they entrusted their secret to the eldest son; and he it was who, in memory of his parents, named the house "The Golden Goose" and the spring, "Ass's Spring"; as house and spring are still named to this very day.

How the healing power of the water was discovered and how gradually life came into the secluded mountain vale—all that is told at great length in a book which the landlady at the Golden Goose sells to the summer guests.

The wish-fairy has long since ceased to come—probably because it became too noisy for her in the valley. But even now it happens almost every year that a couple of young people are mated at the Ass's Spring who are as well suited to each other as were the hero and the heroine of our tale.

Electrical Terms and Their Meaning.

Because electricity can not be seen is no reason why it should not be understood and it is strange that with all the millions of users of electricity for light, power and heat, so few know anything about this wonderful force.

The majority are content to know that the pressure of a finger will light the house, a turn of a switch will start the electric cooking devices and another switch will give instant power, without prying into the mysteries of electrical energy. When anything gets out of order they send for an electrician and let him wrestle with the problem.

In this electrical age it is important that everyone should understand the rudimentary principles of electricity. The first step is to comprehend the numerous technical terms associated with the profession and then grasp some tangible idea of the nature of the current.

In the scientific world electricity is called a fluid, in the same sense that light is called a fluid, and therefore, it can best be compared with water. To make the terms "ampere," "watts" and "volts" comprehensive it is only necessary to keep the water comparison in mind and remember that amperes correspond with the volume of flow of a fluid, watts with energy or horse-power, and volts with pressure. A "kilowatt" is a thousand watts, or equal to one and a third horse-power of energy.

Electric lights consume electrical energy—this energy is expressed in watts and paid for at so much per kilowatt, or a thousand watts.

If the rate is fifteen cents a kilowatt-hour it is equal to about eleven cents a horse-power hour.

The average electric incandescent lighting circuits carry current at a pressure of about 110 volts and the street railway systems at about 500 volts. This means that the wires are carrying electricity under a pressure of so many volts just as water pressure is expressed in pounds. We can easily understand that a certain stream has a volume of so many gallons of water and it should be as easy to comprehend that a certain electrical line is carrying so many "amperes" of electricity, which means the volume of the flow of the current.

One reads a great deal about "direct current" and "alternating current." In the beginning of the electrical industry direct current only was known, that is, the current generated always flowed one way along the circuit. But later developments proved that a generator could be made much easier and simpler that would produce an "alternating current"—a current that surged first one way and then the other over the line. This current surges back and forth as often as sixty times or "cycles" a minute on the average lighting circuits and twenty-five times on power lines. Alternating current generators are most extensively used to-day and where direct current is needed for street railway lines or other work the alternating current is changed into direct current with rotary converters. These machines look not unlike generators, but they simply change the surging current to one which flows always the one way.

Electrical Definitions.

Alternating Current.—That form of electric current whose direction of flow reverses a given number of times per second.

Ampere.—Unit of current. It is the quantity of electricity which will flow through a resistance of one ohm under a pressure of one volt.

Armature.—That part of a dynamo or motor which carries the wires that are rotated in the magnetic field.

Circuit.—Conducting path for electric current.

Circuit-breaker.—Apparatus for automatically opening a circuit.

Electromagnet.—A mass of iron which is magnetized by the passage of a current through a coil of wire wound around the mass, but insulated therefrom.

Fuse.—A short piece of conducting material of low melting point which is inserted in a circuit and which will melt and open the circuit when the current reaches a certain value.

Galvanometer.—Instrument for measuring current strength.

Insulator.—Any substance impervious to the passage of electricity.

Kilowatt.—One thousand watts. (See watt.)

Kilowatt-hour.—One thousand watt hours. Motor Generator.—Combined motor and generator for changing alternating to direct current or vice versa.

Ohm.—The unit of resistance. It is arbitrarily taken as the resistance of a column of mercury one square millimeter in cross sectional area and 106 centimeters in length.

Poles.—Terminals of an open electric circuit.

Potential.—Voltage.

Resistance.—The quality of an electrical conductor by virtue of which it opposes the passage of an electric current. The unit of resistance is the ohm.

Switch.—Device for opening and closing an electric circuit.

Transformer.—A device for stepping-up or stepping-down alternating current from low to high or high to low voltage, respectively.

Volt.—Unit of electromotive force or potential. It is the electromotive force which, if steadily applied to a conductor whose resistance is one ohm, will produce a current of one ampere.

Voltage.—Potential difference or electromotive force.

Watt.—Unit representing the rate of work of electrical energy. It is the rate of work of one ampere flowing under a potential of one volt. Seven hundred and forty-six watts represent one electrical horse-power.

Watt-hour.—Electrical unit of work. Represents work done by one watt expended for one hour.—Exchange.

A Dreadful Woman.

"That woman next door is really dreadful. John," said a young married woman to her husband. "She does nothing but talk the whole day long. She can not get any work done, I'm sure."

"Oh," remarked her husband, "I thought she was a chatterbox. And to whom does she talk?"

"Why, my dear, to me, of course," was the reply. "She talks to me over the back fence."—Philadelphia Ledger.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By ALL-OF-US

A contemporary truthfully protests, in effect, that if Victor Metcalf, Secretary of the Navy, had stood up stanch and bold for the interests of California and the Pacific Coast when the President commissioned him to look into the Japano-San Francisco school problem he would stand in better plight with the people of this coast than he now does. Let it be remembered, however, in what extenuation it may, that one who, during a long political career, has not been disobedient to the authority of the Republican "organization" in this State, with all that name implies, has had small opportunity for developing a robust spinal column. It takes on elasticity at the expense of rigidity. Mr. Herrin's school for citizenship does not make for independence or initiative, or aid in rising to supreme requirements at crucial moments. The man who habitually "takes programme," sooner or later takes also the political back seat.

Historian Farish, writing for the Scripps papers a "History of the Southern Pacific in California Politics," records an occasion, away back in '69 and '70, when one George C. Perkins, then an Honorable State Senator from Butte, alone of all the Republicans in the upper house, stood up inflexibly against a proposition to authorize the interior counties of California to bond themselves to the verge of bankruptcy in aid of the construction of lines of road already over-aided by the United States government and, with the aid of thirteen independent Democrats, effectually blocked the measure. Alas! what changes has time wrought in California's senior Senator since '69 and '70.

Mendocino County wandered for forty years in the Democratic wilderness, and even now it can hardly be said to have reached the promised land. It is Republican, but not the very best kind of Republican, and Republicans of that county are beginning to be sensible of the fact. This is how it happened: Frank Caughey made himself deservedly popular with the citizens of Mendocino County. Whatever they set him to doing he did well. As Auditor he stanchly refused to approve an account that was not as straight as a plumb line and the men of Mendocino made up their minds that Frank Caughey would do to tie to. Frank was ambitious. Having held a variety of public jobs in his home county he aspired to a State job. His first choice was for nomination for Surveyor General, but Mr. Herrin had other ideas as to that place, the more certainly because Los Angeles had its heart set on the possession of that office, so Frank took the next best thing, or the best thing he could get, and stood for Clerk of the Supreme Court. Up to that time there had been considerable independence in Republican politics in Mendocino County, but under the bargain-counter method of expressing the will of the people it became indispensable for Caughey to go to the Santa Cruz convention with the Mendocino delegation in his pocket. The delegation was loyal to their candidate and, not counting cost to the State, went onto the bargain counter without reservation. Caughey got his job and Herrin got Mendocino County. Since then Republicans of Mendocino, here and there, have been asking themselves if that deal really paid. They have been wondering if the possession of a mere clerkship by a well-loved citizen was compensation enough for the delivery of their county to a political bureau whose offenses against good politics and good government have become a national scandal. The more they think it over the less they like the look of it. Frank Caughey had deserved well of the county, but the county had deserved better of Frank Caughey than to be sold so cheap.

And then there is John L. McNab of Mendocino! He is another problem that Mendocino is pondering over. John L. is a good fellow. He has good ability and a good voice. When Caughey gave Mendocino to Herrin for a clerkship, John L. McNab was thrown in to make good measure. Among all her sons Mendocino has none of which it is more proud than of the half-brother of the redoubtable Gavin. During the late campaign he was honored by being made the fellow traveler and chief orator with a governor who was elected by sixty thousand less than a majority vote of his State, and the echo of that voice still reverberates, even if no one does remember what the voice said. It was musical and still tinkles pleasantly in the ear of recollection. But the men of Mendocino, the more thoughtful men especially, are beginning to ask themselves if it was really a good thing for John L. McNab to be tossed onto the Herrin bargain counter to make good measure, in addition to giving the whole county, just to get a clerkship for Frank Caughey. They know full well that, while office may come to a man who serves the machine, and some notoriety, honor never can, and they would like to see John McNab honored at some fitting time in some fitting way. They reflect that of all the public men California has produced not one who "took orders," or was in any way subservient, attained a name that was an asset to posterity. They have seen the gubernatorial office emptied of honor by being made subservient to the political bureau of the Southern Pacific Company. They have seen seats in the United States Senate confer as little honor as a seat on a drygoods box in front of a country store, for the same reason, and they are wondering if any higher honor awaits their bright young man than to come to be known as "Tom Dozier No. 2."

Among the surprises of the legislative election was the defeat of Fred C. Handy of Mendocino for the assembly. At this distance it is not easy to account for it. The winds which go sighing through the tall timber of Mendocino make a noise like that of double-crossing a candidate who might not prove as handy as the name implies. Fred C. Handy is an honest man. He would go as far as another, institutional or otherwise, but there would inevitably come a time when the assemblyman from Mendocino would balk at taking orders, and the "organization" may have foreseen this eventuality and provided for it. This is not implying that the successful candidate will prove more sure, for he is to depend unknown, but it is hard to understand, without being on the ground, how a county that gave such a round majority for Taft could have given such a round minority to Fred C. Handy, as clean and reputable a man as Mendocino holds.

To shift to another field, it is encouraging to note that Los Angeles did not vote down the sea-wall and India basin bond proposals merely through pique or out of a spirit of commercial jealousy of San Francisco. That city so voted because the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce told it so to vote. To whom, if not to a great commercial body, presumably conversant with such matters, should voters so far away from the fact, look for advice? Let the responsibility therefore rest upon those who gave the advice and not upon those who took it, and suffer not the incident to estrange the metropolis of the north from the metropolis of the south.

Voters do not always express their dissatisfaction with a politician or a political policy in the most direct and effective way, but they generally find some way of expressing it so that the object of their disfavor knows who they are alluding to, even though they have to punish the innocent as well the guilty. Santa Cruz County manifested its disposition toward Warren R. Porter, quite the rawest spoilsman in California politics, by electing Democrats to senate and assembly. A Santa Cruz paper grumblingly remarks that, because of this, Santa Cruz "won't get anything" from the coming legislature. Perhaps not but, anyhow, Warren Porter has something that he will not fail to understand and, moreover, he will know that he will get more of the same as soon as a good opportunity offers. The fact is that it is not profitable for any county or community to be misrepresented anywhere and California's lieutenant governor has conferred anything but honor upon his home town and home county. His address before the students of the State University received no more applause from his neighbors than from the students. And yet it should be remembered to his credit that he practiced no hypocrisy. His speech was as raw as his political policies.

Whoever will take the tangles out of politics in Contra Costa County will confer a favor on a mystified public. The Republican party in that county was split into two warring factions on local animosities rather than on issues. Each faction made overtures to leaders in the Lincoln-Roosevelt League for permission to ally itself with the League and so have the League influence to help make its fight against its adversary. There are reasons for believing that, in both cases, love for League principles was never more than skin deep, but there was one issue in which the League was interested and that was the making of the primary law mandatory. The League stands for giving the voter a chance to be heard directly, and so espoused the cause of the faction that stood for making that law mandatory, and won on it at the special election. The office of superior judge was the storm center. The leader of the "organization" forces gave as his reason for fighting the incumbent that he could win no cases against the Southern Pacific Company in that judge's court, and the fight that was made against the incumbent by every railroad influence was focussed on the objection that the incumbent was suspected of having had railroad affiliations. How was that for a family row? The Republican convention took the bits in its teeth and nominated a thoroughly independent candidate in the person of Fred V. Wood, but when the vote was counted it was found that Contra Costa had gone for Taft by 1,100 and for the Democratic candidate for superior judge by a majority of 726. Politically speaking, Contra Costa County is mixed pickles put up in acid vinegar.

Before dropping Mendocino men from further consideration at this time, it may be apropos to observe that Senator Sanford is believed to be nursing a gubernatorial ambition. How doth hope spring eternal in the Democratic breast!

The Woodland Democrat consoles itself with the reflection that "A defeat does not prove that justice and right are on the side of the victorious party." Of course it does not but it sometimes raises a presumption to that effect that is hard to overcome.

Among politicians who discuss the organization of the coming Legislature the only two men whose names are often mentioned in connection with the Speakership of the Assembly are Robert L. Beardslee of Stockton and Philip A. Stanton of Los Angeles. It is not thought the organization will bring out any other candidate, and therefore it is assumed that one of these two will be elected—the successful one to be he who, upon calm reflection and broad consideration of all points involved, the organization shall decide it would prefer in the position.

Of course the organization has encouraged both candidates to hope for its favor; that is the organization's way of doing politics. It never, or at least very seldom, starts in by making any one man its avowed candidate for an office of real importance. There is nearly always something to be gained by holding the choice in suspense for a while, or appearing to do so. Walter Parker, who is the Southern Pacific political manager in the southern end of the State, has announced that Stanton is his candidate, but it has not been observed that the persons who have authority to represent the Southern Pacific in politics in the northern end of the State have ratified the choice. No doubt they are encouraging Mr. Beardslee and his friends.

For the benefit of readers who do not know either candidate but who feel some interest in the filling of an office of such large powers as that of Speaker of the California Assembly it may be said that both of the men who are mentioned are forty years of age; Stanton was born in Ohio and came to California in 1886; Beardslee was born in California, and his home has always been in San Joaquin County; Beardslee is a lawyer and before being elected to the Assembly he was city attorney of Stockton; Stanton is a real estate dealer, a man of considerable means and the principal promoter of one of the beach towns in Los Angeles County; Beardslee has served two terms in the Assembly, at the last one being Speaker; Stanton was first elected in 1902, has served three terms, and at his second term held the responsible position of chairman of the Ways and Means Committee.

Both men are bright and ready, and both have shown themselves prepared to do pretty nearly any job of programming which may be required, and yet both have on occasion manifested a flash of independence. They think, talk and act as organization politicians, but each of them can make some stir of opposition when the organization is not going his way. Stanton has carried this further than Beardslee, for at the Santa Cruz convention, in which he was a delegate, he made a hard fight for Pardee for Governor, although Gillett was the programmed choice of the organization. But the railroad machine appears to regard that as a personal affair which on Stanton's part did not disqualify him for further association with the organization.

The "organization" is giving out the tip in a rather ostentatious way that at the coming session of the Legislature it is to be regarded as a non-combatant on one issue in which it is already foreseen there is going to be a fierce fight. This is the anti-race track gambling bill. In substance, the politicians who speak for the Southern Pacific say that the race track men must "make their own fight this time"; that the organization does not intend to bear the odium of being the defender of that business; that it realizes that it cannot afford it, and that the close political partnership with the California Jockey Club is at an end, or at least suspended for this session of the Legislature.

There is a possibility, of course, that this may be true; it would be a good thing if it were true; but its truth is not likely to be generally accepted until corroborated by the course of events. It is easy to see why the organization should not wish to appear as openly backing the race track gamblers in their efforts to defeat legislation which will place California on an equality with New York in the scale of morals, and it is not altogether impossible to see why the head of the race track gambling trust should consent to an arrangement by which the organization is to be put in the nominal attitude of taking no part in the matter.

RESUME OF GRAFT CASES TO DATE

It has been more than eighteen months since the graft prosecutions began in San Francisco, and as their ramifications have been numerous, and their details, as given and variously colored in the daily papers, have been minute, it may be timely to refresh the memory of readers concerning the exact course and status of the cases. Briefly, this is done in the following:

In the first of these cases in point of time, with the exception of that of Schmitz, Louis Glass was charged with the bribery of Thomas F. Loneragan, a supervisor of San Francisco. The trial began August 12, 1907, and continued till the thirtieth of that month. Glass was found guilty, as charged, and on September fourth was duly sentenced to a term in the penitentiary. He at once appealed to the Appellate Court, and since that time has been out on bail. It is considered probable that the appeal will be argued at the approaching January term of the court, some sixteen or seventeen months after sentence was pronounced.

The first trial of Tirey L. Ford for the alleged bribery of Thomas F. Loneragan began September 13th and terminated October 3, 1907. The jury disagreed. His next trial, on the charge of bribing Jennings J. Phillips, continued from October 17th to December 3d of the same year (the bank holidays intervening), and Ford was acquitted. A third trial, under an indictment alleging the bribery of Daniel G. Coleman, consumed the time between April 14th and May 2d, inclusive, and the jury declared Ford not guilty. It is understood that other trials under other indictments probably await him.

The trial of Theodore V. Halsey for bribery was to have taken place in October, 1907, but on the fourth of that month, after ten jurors had been secured to try him, Halsey was taken suddenly and seriously ill with appendicitis, and so the jury was discharged. As the defendant still is in precarious health, it is doubtful when, if ever, he will be tried.

Forty-five indictments were brought by the grand jury against Eugene E. Schmitz, at that time Mayor of San Francisco, for bribery or extortion. In five of these instances he was indicted with Abraham Ruef: in fourteen with Patrick Mulholland, Tires L. Ford and Ruef, in fourteen others with Eugene De Saba, John Martin and Frank Drum; with Ruef alone in five instances, and Schmitz was indicted alone in three cases for receiving bribes. He went to trial on the five counts for which he was indicted with Ruef only on May 22, 1907, and the trial terminated in his conviction on June 13th, Schmitz being sentenced on July 8th to five years in San Quentin. He immediately appealed, and the First District Court of Appeals ordered his release on January 9, 1908. A rehearing of the case was denied by the Supreme Court on March 9th. He is now out on bonds in the amount of $400,000, and may be tried at any time on any of the forty indictments still standing against him.

"Abie" Ruef, "the fallen boss," constantly has been so central a figure in these prosecutions, his early confession of guilt and his subsequent recantation thereof were so dramatic and impossible to forget, that it doubtless will be sufficient briefly to recapitulate what has been done in his trial now in progress. The empanelling of the jury began on August 27th, fifteen hundred jurors being brought into court, of whom eleven hundred were dismissed for sufficient reason, and four hundred were examined by the attorneys on both sides. After two months and ten days a jury was duly sworn in and the prosecution's opening statement to the jury was made on November 6, 1908. John E. Behan, clerk of the board of supervisors, and State Senator George B. Keane, former clerk of the board, had testified concerning the passage of certain ordinances in connection with which it was claimed that bribes had been paid, and former Supervisor James L. Gallagher was on the stand, when, on November 13th, a shot was fired which, like another, "was heard around the world," and Francis J. Heney, seriously but fortunately not mortally wounded, fell. The gory incident served as ground for motions, by the defense, for change of venue, continuance, etc., but all were denied by Judge Lawlor, and the cross-examination of Gallagher still continued. He went on the stand November 10th, and three days were devoted to direct examination and two weeks to cross-examination. Nearly a day of this time, however, was devoted to the examination of Alexander S. Lathan, Ruef's former chauffeur, who denied or claimed to have forgotten the facts relating to testimony sworn to by him before the grand jury.

THE LAST REBEL

Written for The California Weekly by Len Low.

"We ain't no sons of rest, nor hoboes, nor anarchists; we make our way and pay it—make enough hay when the sun shines to keep us in muligans when the stress of nature envelops us. No layin' any foundation for trusts, or the strenuous life for us, eh Humpy? We're just freeborn spirits that ain't got any real anchorage." The Bully lolled back on the grass and gazed into the depths of the autumn sky. The exertion of his speech necessarily called for a space of silence and only the drone of the distant city or the chatter of the magpies in the oaks, could be heard.

Several days before these two birds of passage had dropped from the southbound and were now in their winter rendezvous anxiously awaiting their comrades, the Prince and the Veteran.

"Most time for the Prince to be showin' up," said Humpy Jackson some hours later as he turned his head to one side to escape the smoke, and scolded furiously at a carrot he held above the coal-oil can. Some fell squarely into the can, sending up little firs of water, some fell wide of the mark into the fire. The Bully, who was stripping the leaves from a pockmarked cabbage, noticed this, and cried out:

"Look what you're doin', fool! Who wants to take a three-mile hike after gratts eatables and have you stand there an' slice 'em into the fire!"

"Don't get angry, Bully dear. I was in a reminiscent mood, conjurin' up memories of the past an' I always close my eyes then." Humpy drew back, wiping his smoke-laden eyes.

"I know some things in your past that makes your eyes open pretty wide when you think of 'em. But about the Prince—yes, 'tis about time he was ringin' in. By the last tell-tale I saw they had a blanket of the beautiful around Reno. That'll start the tin horns for the valley."

"Pass up your fruit, Bully," broke in Humpy. "There," he sighed as he backed out of the smoke, "there's seven kinds of cereal in that can—it ought to be good—I've cried over it like a mother over her sick babe. I was bound to make this a Thanks-givin' dinner to be remembered."

"By the way you talk, Bully, a fellow might infer you classed the Prince as a tinhorn." Humpy's face bore a look of high disdain. The Bully threw back his head and laughed uproariously, his fat sides shaking like a jelly-fish.

"Now look here, Humpy, I said nothing of the kind. Infer? Oh Lord! I suppose you think I don't know what your principal parts of speech are—huh—I bet I went to the little red school house as long as you! I was been rubbin' that kind of volapuk into me ever since we left the Yakima. Wait till the Prince shows up—you'll go way back and stand up!" Humpy did not answer. He was busily drilling the pit from a willow twig for a pipestem. The Bully, feeling that he had won his point, altered his tone and spoke on.

"He's sure a wonder! Full of schemes an' yet you can't call him a schemer in the flat sense of the word, can ye Humpy?"

"No, can't say as ye can," answered Humpy. "He's full of hopes an' visions an' such like, if that's what you mean."

"That's partly it. Say, he makes some of 'em stick too, don't he?"

"Well," answered Humpy as he fitted the new-made stem, "there's where it does seem strange. The Prince always puts on a good front an' always has the wherewith, but does he get it out of them schemes of his?"

"Hanged if I know, Humpy. As you say, the Prince always has the lucre—where does it come from? I don't take much stock in fairy tales, but if there are fairy tales, the way the Prince hands them out—you can see visions. Stir up the fire, Humpy!"

"Stir yourself up, I'm goin' to smoke," and he carefully turned the lining of his coat pocket for a pipeful of tobacco. The Bully, seeing no alternative, arose and replenished the fire around the steaming can.

"Well, anyway, I'd like to see the Prince. Wherever he is, the Veteran ain't far away." Their laugh ceased and an expectant look gathered on each face at the sound of a step along the path. The willows at the far end of the clearing parted and a man came quickly toward them. Humpy Jackson jerked the pipe from his mouth, the Bully half arose and they ejaculated in accord, "The Veteran!"

The one addressed did not answer until he had seated himself on an upturned keg between the two. There was something portentous of evil in the calm, deliberate way that he drew his slouched hat from his head and brushed back the scattered gray locks.

For a few seconds there was silence while they thought of the law and hoped the old man had not collided—but pshaw!—then they thought of the Prince and still were silent.

The Veteran looked from one to the other and said slowly, "Yes, it's the Prince."

"Is he pinched?" began Humpy, but paused abruptly at the look of scorn on the old man's face.

"Say, Veteran," said the Bully, "he ain't cashed in, has he?"

"No, he ain't cashed in nor he ain't pinched, but he won't be with us any more—he's gone back to the world he came from." They waited for him to continue. They knew him well. 'Twas useless to urge him and impossible to repress him in speech.

"No, don't expect the Prince, for he's gone. I say, to his nat'ral place. I'll begin at the beginnin', boys, so's you can understand. You know we've all thought there was somethin' unusual about him, an' we've thought right. I was with him most all the latter part of the summer, an' we came down from the Klamath together. He seemed alright an' nat'ral till we reached Marysville, an' then some news he heard or read outen a tell-yele, set him agoin'. An' nothin' would stop him but onto the next southbound he got, takin' me with him. I seed he was in trouble an' wa't goin' to quit him. 'Veteran,' said he several times, 'I need you for awhile, an' I, not forgettin' the time he nursed me back to life on the Sound in numerous other things, just said, 'Prince, I stay by you till the last wall is scaled.'"

"When we reached Sacramento, we took a streetcar to the city limits, then walked out the river road about two miles, along where them big hop-fields an' fruit ranches are, but not a word did he say till we stopped opposite one of them gabled houses that sets far back from the road. Then he turned on me.

"See that house, Veteran?" said he with eyes blazin', "that's my home." I looked at him foolish like. "Sit down here an' I'll tell you something of myself. That was my home till a few years ago. My people live there yet. You see, my father was an old soldier and fought with the South, and after the war he came West and I was born and raised here. Father never talked much about the war, but when he did one could see he was still sore. I never could understand that, but anyway, everything went hairy until the Spanish War broke out. I was all for going, but it roused the old man and he said some bitter words about the flag and the government and I answered back in the same spirit. I was a little onery, I guess, Veteran, for I went to the piano and played and sung the Star-Spangled Banner with a vigor that brought to life every unpatriotic sentiment the old gent had. It wasn't right, but I was bullheaded, and then he told me to go and never to come back as far as he was concerned. I went to the Philippines and from there to Alaska where, in a little over a year I made one of those old-time wads, passed the buck and came south.

"When I left home the old ranch was payin' big dividends, but I hear the padre got to speculating in hops and got a setback from which he can't come up at the count. That's what I saw in the paper up the country, and from what I heard as we came through town they are up against it, good and hard. My brother sick and the old man not able to see to things. Now I want to see them, the Lord knows, and they want to see me. I'm not going to take any undue advantage of them, or heap coals of fire, but I'm going back there just the same and the old man's going to salute the flag. But I want you, Veteran, to do something for me first. Take this money and give it to them and tell them I'm coming up to-morrow at five."

"With that he thrusts a bag of simoleons into my fist an' hikes off toward town. I sat there a minute, dazed like, but I knew it was the truth, so I marched up the driveway an' straight into the rebel stronghold. The old man met me at the door an' asked me my business, an' I told him I wanted a few words with him about the Prince. 'The Prince!' said he, eying me curious. 'Your son, sir,' said I firm an' strong. He hesitated a second but someone behind him heard the words an' I was hustled in there pretty pronto. I don't go into detail but just dumps that gold on the table before 'em. The old man came flitterin' toward me. 'Man,' said he, 'have you been robbin'?' 'No,' says I, 'that's from the Prince, your son—it's for you all. He's comin' to-morrow eve an' I guess if you've any undamaged bovine you can trot him down to the slaughterhouse. This will help you decorate up a little.' The old man looked first at me an' then at the gold 'sif he was tryin' to understand. Twice he tried to speak, but couldn't."

"Well, I guess that money saved them an' the ranch; they'd needed it bad. They'd all wore an anxious look, but the change, it was wonderful."

"I stayed. I couldn't get away. Anyway, the Prince gave no orders otherwise. But how they did ask questions, but I left it most all for him to tell."

"The next day, the women tidied up the house 'sif for a ball. The old man shaved an' acted nervous. All day there was a quiet about the house, an' I longed for the pasture. The old mother opened an' dusted the piano an' pat, an' smooth things round that piano, touchin' the keys reverent-like just 'sif she was communin' with an old friend. There was a light in her face that told someway of prayer answered, an' when she came for the forth time to where I was settin' on the porch, an' lay her tremblin' hand on my shoulder with that painfully eager expression in her eyes, an' asked me if I didn't think it was most time for him, I just couldn't stand it. I kissed her wrinkled hand an' went out into the orchard to commune with nature. wishin' I had known a mother."

"Just about five o'clock I seen him through the trees, coming toward the gate. If I should keep on livin' forever I shouldn't ever forget that scene. I gaddy! I sometimes think God fixes up things just to show us what we are not.

"The sun was just disappearin' behind the orchard an' its rays were slippin' silverlike through the branches, lightenin' up that flower-bordered walk just like you see it in plays, only better. Someway there had come a silence; a sort of waitin', expectant feelin' settled over everything. Even the mockin' birds were still. 'Twasn't like that silence one feels when standin' at a grave waitin' for the words of the minister which always breaks open the safe of grief—but more like when you stand on the wharf an' watch a ship with some one dear to you on board, come sidin' in. Leastways, that's how I felt.

"When the Prince reached the gate, the old Reb was there, fumblin' to open it. His hat was off an' his gray hair glistened as his head bobbed this way an' that in his efforts but the Prince threw the gate wide an' for a minute they just stood gazin' at each other. They didn't speak. Someway, men don't at times like that, but I saw the old man raise both hands an' the Prince took 'em in his, then they turned an' walked side by side up the walk. Half-way to the house stood the mother, nervously foldin' an' unfoldin' her hands. The Prince just reached out an' took her in his arms like she was a child. I guess he'd butted up against sorrow an' stood it well enough till then, but when he felt her caresses he just gave up for a minute. The Sis cried, an' I walked to the end of the porch behind the mornin' glories. Ben had come out an' was sittin' on the step. I saw his face workin' fast an' painful as he coughed an' tapped the porch with his cane, but shucks! they just took each other's hands and were brothers again.

"The Prince headed the procession into the house an' went straight to the piano—it was open an' waitin'—an' before they was all fairly into the room, his fingers struck the keys an' out came a soft tear-bringin' melody that just opened your heart an' let the good slip right out. I ain't never heard much such playin' but the way he went over that machinery I'll never forget. Up an' down an' sometimes 'peared like he'd go right through them, then he'd settle down softlike an' hovered over 'em like a turtle dove over its nest. He played through storm an' calm, through the sorrow of the past right up to the joy they all felt. He paused a second an' then he began to sing the song I reckon most of the world knows. It was the Star-Spangled Banner. There was no defiance in it now, only a restful calm, seemin' to brush all arbitrary feelin' aside, like a ship with treasures of peace unloadin' its freight to waitin' hearts. He hadn't sung but a few words till the Sis rose an' joined him, then the grand old mother added her feeble voice.

"Right here I'll pause to say I've seen Rebs chased an' been chased by 'em, but in all my rambles from Yuma to the Sound I never met one but had surrendered long ago, an' I know that old man was the last one to.

"For a minute he sat there lookin' far away into the past, or future, or maybe both. An' then as they sing the last verse, hanged if he didn't up an' join 'em with a voice that meant what he said—the war was over, the last rebel had surrendered—the house that was once divided was together again.

"As they finished singin' I slipped away quiet an' came here to you. I knew you was waitin' for me an' the Prince." He paused, then added, "But the Prince—well, it has been a Thanksgivin' Day for some people."

While the Veteran had been talking the sun had disappeared behind the blue line of the distant Coast Range, the gloom of evening hung over the valley, the fire had died down and the can smoldered on the hot ashes, a thin line of smoke rose a few feet in air and drifted slowly through the willows. The scream of a locomotive far up the river told that the westbound was on time.

For some time no one spoke, their thoughts were with the absent Prince, then the Bully arose an' clearing his throat with unusual vigor, said almost gently, "Boys, the mulligan is gettin' cold."

STATE PRESS CONCERNING THE WEEKLY.

It is decidedly refreshing to note that San Francisco is to have a decent weekly publication. The subsidized weekly press of the corruption-ridden city has so long been a stench in the nostrils of the better element of the city and State that the entrance into the field of a paper free from entangling alliances with the higher-ups, and whose avowed policy is "absolute good faith with the public," will be most gratifying.—Ventura Free Press.

It will aim always to promote a higher plane of citizenship and public morality in the State. It will work constantly for good government and substantial justice. It will be a vehicle for the conveyance of the better thought of California.—Stockton Record.

There should be room in San Francisco for one more such paper; a paper that will not represent any special interest, and that will not be afraid to speak out and tell the truth at all times.—Santa Cruz Evening News.

As the Press is devoted to the same cause, I am sure your paper will prove of great value to me. I shall be glad to speak a word for the paper wherever and whenever I can. I enlisted for the war over a year ago, and . . . appreciate the need of such a paper as you purpose to issue.—Chris Runckel, of the Niles Washington Press.

What California long has needed is a weekly paper that will truly represent the people's interest; a paper whose columns cannot be purchased by the law-breaking elements and that will not be influenced by any man's political ambitions; in brief, a paper that shall be State-wide in its influence and that shall owe allegiance to no one but the public. That is the sort of paper that The California Weekly aims to be.—Los Angeles Express.

Among other things, we notice that The California Weekly will contain reading matter for "tired men." If all the men who have been made tired by the "scarlet letter" weeklies of San Francisco take The California Weekly, its success is assured.—San Francisco Star.

The main purpose of the new publication is to aid in getting the government of the State of California back into the hands of the people and keeping it there, and for that reason it may be expected to indorse the principles enunciated by the Lincoln-Roosevelt League and other reform organizations which have in view the purification of public life, but it is distinctly declared that the paper will not become the "organ" of any movement, but will preserve its absolute independence of thought and expression.—Tulare Register.

A. J. Pillsbury and A. J. Waterhouse were connected with the Sacramento Union before it passed into the hands of the Calkins syndicate. Both are able, fearless and reliable journalists. Mr. Rowell is the editor of the Fresno Republican, and one of the virile and resourceful editorial writers on the Pacific Coast. The combination is capable of putting out a splendid paper.—Woodland Democrat.

That some men fail to keep their word is probably due to the fact that it isn't worth keeping.—Boston Courier.

The Baseball Umpire.

"That gentleman who is to umpire the game to-day is an old friend of mine," said the mild-mannered baseball fan to his neighbor as they sat leaning forward in the grand stand, their eagerness over the coming contest enhanced by the stentorian command, "Play ball!"

"He's one of the squarest and finest of men. Yes, sir, he's as nice a fel—a Say, watch the graceful attitude of our first batter! He's got his eye with him to-day, too, for see how he lets this first bad one go— What did the umpire call that?"

"A strike," replied his neighbor.

"Now, what do you think of that? Ball went a mile wide of the plate! Well, umpires will make mistakes. I've seen—"

At this juncture a crack rent the air and the ball sailed on a line toward the left field fence.

The mild-mannered man was on his feet in a jiffy.

"Oh, what a swat! Run, run like the dickens! Go on and make it a homer! Look at that cuss go, you'll! Go on; keep a-going. Don't stop. Make it—What's that?"

"The umpire called it a foul!"

"A foul? He's crazy! Say, Mister Umpire, put on your glasses. A foul! Good Gad, man, you're the limit. Throw him out! Go lay down somewhere, umpire! You're rotten! Rotten! Rotten!"

And in his disgust the mild-mannered man slapped his derby hat down on the seat and sat on it.—The Bohemian.

"I thought you said that auto you sold me was the latest thing out!"

"Well?"

"Well, I went out in the country with it yesterday and I had a breakdown and had to be dragged home! Didn't get in until midnight!"

"Well, it couldn't very well be out later than midnight, could it?"—Houston Post.

Maternal, generous and pure,
Thou didst not close thine heart and ehsh;
Thy love o'erlooked, thine arms were wide;
And men were proud to own thy love.

They came to thee from many lands,
Brave men that worthy were of thee;
And those that struggled to be free,
Took heart to see thine outstretched hands;

Thy brow, that stooped not to the gale,
Thy kind blue eyes, unswerving, true;
Ah! eyes that were not meant to sue,
For love they did not dream could fail!

Thy temple did not fail by age;
Its towers fell not stone by stone;
Till shafts unbudged stood alone,
Torn fragments of a splendid page;

But, victim to the eternal fate
That flung the mountains to the sky,
Here was no God to hear thy cry,
Who could be swayed by love or hate.

To the last day, thy doom unguessed,
Thine heart was tender toward thy weak;
Now, stricken, let thy children speak,
Mother, whose blind eyes face the west.

Mother, thy sons are round thee still;
Forgive us our first fearful greed;
One word, and we had given heed:
We lost the savior of thy will.

Ask of thy sons that knew thy love,
And the kindest of thine eyes—
Ask the long filial sacrifice,
And we stand ready to endure!

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

Let us Pledge Ourselves to the Cause of Self-Government.

By Fairfax Wheelan.

No truth in history is shown with greater clearness than that republics can exist in form long after they have ceased to exist in reality. In the pages of the historians we read of great peoples enthusiastically singing songs about "the land of the free and the home of the brave" when they neither inhabited the one nor were domiciled in the other. We see them throughout long periods of time contentedly casting a vote that was but a hollow mockery. We see grave senates decreeing laws they had power neither to originate nor to enforce. And we see great concourses of people going wild in a frenzy of patriotism while they listen to impassioned orators ascribing to them liberties they did not enjoy, rights they did not possess, and virtues they did not practice.

It was ever so. In a republic you can have the form without the substance, the name without the fact. If the citizens neglect their civic obligations, if they fail in the performance of their political duties, if they cease to take an active part in the full scheme of self-government, the result will be the enthronement of a boss and the erection of a form of government closely akin to absolutism.

It is time that every true American should guide himself by the teachings of the past and take warning from the portents of to-day. It is his part never to forget that God in his wisdom and mercy has permitted him to have a share in guiding, maintaining and perfecting the greatest, grandest, noblest experiment of a government "of the people, by the people and for the people" ever granted to the sons of men. Let him never cease to bear in mind that he is a trusted laborer in a vineyard where ripens a harvest—the most longed for, striven for, fought for, since the dawn of history. And upon the issue of that experiment the highest hopes of humanity depend.

There is need of his activity. The press of Europe in its columns, with too great a justification, has been lately filled with articles on the Breakdown of Democracy. Our kindest critics assert, with too much truth, that the government of our large cities has been a shining disgrace. In many states and in an overwhelming majority of municipalities a boss selects delegates, controls conventions, nominates candidates, and owns the officers after election.

The cause of the evils of our day is the cause of the failures in the ancient times—popular indifference, the neglect of the citizen to perform his due part in the scheme of government. Less than forty per cent of the registered voters of San Francisco cast a vote at a primary election. This humiliating fact holds good for a long period of years and over all portions of our Union. Less than forty per cent of the citizens, in one of the first steps of self-government, take occasion to express their will. Who is it that does not fail to express his will? Every man anxious to distort the public good to his private gain, every boss large and small, every job-chaser, every element that can profit by corruption or by violation of the law, every selfish scoundrel who has no conception of the honor of American citizenship and no notion of the obligation his country owes to the highest destiny of man. Throughout our land on the day of the primary, respectability, for the most part, lies dormant, corruption hustles; intelligence evades, ignorance executes; honor needles, dishonor fulfills; integrity omits, pascality performs; and thus is fashioned the sceptre of the boss and the field made ready for the harvest of graft.

Can a people hope for good government if they surrender the performance of so important a political duty to a mob composed of the least disinterested and most corrupt of their number? Could a nation hope for success if she sent only her poltroons to battle and entrusted her safety and her destiny to only her lowest and most designing soldiers?

In all republics there is abundant work for patriotism in the days of peace. It commands us to stand sentinel no less than to wage war. And it tells us that to strive with heart and soul against domestic evils which, unchecked, will destroy the Republic, is as meritorious and as chivalrous and as patriotic as to bear arms against a foreign foe.

The American people have too long neglected their political duties. The boss and his minions are deeply entrenched. The ark of the covenant is in danger. Every citizen worthy of the name of patriot should now enlist for a contest that may be justly called the Second War of Independence.

With this end in view we have prepared below a pledge binding each citizen upon his sacred honor to perform his full duty to his country and to the cause of self-government.

Sign it and forward it to the office of The California Weekly, 26 Montgomery Street, San Francisco.

THE PLEDGE OF CITIZENSHIP

I, a citizen of the United States of America, realizing that a free Republic is an impossibility unless the citizen performs his civic duty, hereby pledge myself upon my sacred honor never to fail to exercise my right of citizenship by voting at every election, primary or secondary, wherever it is possible and legal for me to render that service to my country, my health permitting me so to do.

In taking this pledge it is distinctly understood that I in no way obligate myself to vote for any particular party, any definite candidate or any certain measure. I am binding myself only to my Country, and pledging myself solely to the faithful performance of the duty I owe to her as a citizen.

WHY TAKE THE FOREGOING PLEDGE?

Those taking the foregoing pledge, signing and sending it to this office, will be enrolled upon The California Weekly's "School for Citizenship," which will be a permanent feature of this paper. It will entitle the person signing to his name to have answered, either through the columns of the paper or by letter, any rational question he may ask concerning public affairs, and, generally, by the person best equipped to afford the desired information. It will also entitle the signer to such special literature bearing upon the obligations and opportunities of good citizenship as may from time to time be issued. While this pledge is open to persons of all ages it is especially desired that it be taken and sent in by young men lately become voters, or who will cast their first vote, two years hence. It will take but a moment to clip out the pledge, sign, enclose in an envelope, stamp and address to "School for Citizenship," office The California Weekly, 26 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, and it opens the way for a liberal education in citizenship.

WHAT THE FARM COMMISSION DID NOT LEARN.

When President Roosevelt decided to appoint a commission charged with the duty of making a particular study of the conditions of rural life he had in mind the problem involved in the steady drift of population from the country to the city. If the conditions of life in the country are not generally favorable they may be rendered more so, in order that the advantages of the city may be rendered relatively less attractive.

In the tour of inquiry which the commission has been making, and which brought a part of the commissioners to California, it has proved to be difficult to hold the discussion down to points on which it was the President's desire that it should center attention. Wherever the farmers and other country people have been gathered together the talk has tended toward industrial rather than social questions. The speakers have wanted to talk about the farmer's opportunity for making money, and the helps or hindrances thereto, very much as though the making of money were in itself the important subject, without reference to the effect on the movement of population to urban centers.

Production and distribution, transportation and banking, education and postal delivery, are all subjects related to the problem to be studied, but they have been considered in that relation by only a minority of the speakers. Time and again the commissioners found it necessary to recall speakers to the main issue from such engrossing topics as methods of farm cultivation and rates of railroad transportation.

Those women representatives of the rural life who told of the difficulty of finding domestic servants and the personal hardships of the farmer's wife came nearer the mark. It is the farmer's wife, rather than the farmer, who determines the time when removal from country to city shall be made. It is not alone that the worst of the annoyances of which complaint is made fall upon the wife and mother, but theirs are the most pronounced inclinations toward the urban life. That it is not the difficulty of making money in the country which is thinning its population is clear, since in so many cases it is only when a comfortable degree of prosperity has been attained on the farm that the change is a possibility. Ordinarily the prosperous farmer is content to live and die on his farm, but it is likely to be quite otherwise with his wife, whose social inclinations are not bounded by the same narrow circle that bounds his own. She hopes and waits for the time when the income shall have been increased to the point where it does not appear to be a reckless extravagance to take a house in the nearest flourishing town, delegate the management of the farm to a foreman, or perhaps to rent it, and live the life, not quite of the idle rich, but of the well-to-do classes.

In those instances in which the wife's social ambitions soar beyond the ordinary she is impelled to a flight beyond the nearest market town and as far as the great metropolis, the center of life and fashion. In this view of it the womanly influence in the household furnishes the strong motive to cityward migration, and if it happens that the wife is the mother of several marriageable daughters, that motive is correspondingly strengthened. But, in any event, it is as much the prosperity of the country which tends to depopulate the agricultural districts as it is the reverse. In California it is more so.

This is the aspect of the question which has been unwisely ignored, although we do not claim the cause here stated is more than one—an important one—among a multitude of causes.

It is one thing to write a diagnosis, and quite another to prescribe a cure. There is no cure except in changes of conditions so general that they only can be described as revolutionary, and that must come as evolutionary changes come, slowly. Peter Finley Dunne condensed a deal of shrewd wisdom in one of his Dooley satires in a current magazine, when he said: "The trouble with the country is it's too far from the city, and that's the trouble with the city, too." The abatement of the objections to country life and the evils of city life lies in the direction of bringing city and country closer together.

Electric railroads, telephones, rural mail delivery and automobiles are now tending to bring town and country together. As distances are abridged social chasms are closed. If the automobile makes city people wish to get into the country, as it unquestionably does, it also makes it easier for country people to get to town, and so, by a double operation, it works for the improvement of the conditions which the President had in mind when he named his commission and sent it forth on its mission of research and recommendation.

The Tennessee night riders had nothing to ride at night about, but there had been night-riding in Kentucky and wherefore not in Tennessee also? It was the power of criminal suggestion upon unemployed and therefore receptive minds, and a great power it is, too.

A MALADY THAT IS DEEP SEATED.

The United States possesses nearly one-half of the railroad mileage of the world, all constructed within the lives of persons still living, but mainly since the Civil War. This mileage is now chiefly embraced in a few large systems, growing steadily fewer in number and larger in mileage, with a manifest tendency toward unification into a single "community of interest" presided over by one central authority.

This great railroad mileage reaches practically every community in the United States and has perfectly legitimate interests in every community to be looked after. To look after these interests and report to headquarters, as the sense of touch reports to the brain, there are in round numbers 40,000 station agents and 120,000 assistants on the ground, with between a million and a half and a million and three-quarters of employees in other departments—all more or less under political control in the special interests of their employers.

Financially speaking, this great railroad mileage centers in New York City, on a single street within that city and in the hands of less than one hundred men who can be called together, upon emergency, in a day's, almost an hour's, notice. This same hundred men control vast aggregations of banking capital, insurance funds and great American industrials like Standard Oil and the United States Steel Corporation.

Almost without knowing it, certainly without any person or group of persons having prearranged or planned for it in malice or otherwise, but wholly incident to the development of a splendidly great transportation system by splendidly capable men, there has been evolved a far-reaching and tremendously powerful mechanism for conducting the affairs of government, and the affairs of government, municipal, State and National, are, or have been, so conducted, not in the interests of the common good, but for the selfish advantage of these special, allied, dominating financial, industrial and transportation interests. Subtly, silently, steadily, the foundations of popular government have been undermined in a land solemnly dedicated to free government and amid the partial ruins there has been set in the seats of the mighty the meanest spirited, most tyrannous and humanly hopeless form of government the world has ever known—government by a purse-proud plutocracy. And for this the apathy of the so-called "good citizen" has furnished the opportunity.

It nothing extenuates that the men who have done this thing—our fellow citizens one and all—have done it without malevolent and conscious design. They have not been men who looked into or had any care for the future. According to the philosophy of their lives money has been the only good, and the making of it, by any method short of the application of physical violence, the only pursuit befitting men of capacity and the only purpose that made life worth the living. They have done the things that were needed for the attainment of their purposes and for the gratification of their unrestrained passion to acquire, leaving it to others to be answerable to the God of nations and the sons of men for the consequences of their acts. It had been better for them, as well as for the common good, had they had a care for the direction their steps were taking.

Such men are materialists and have made their age materialistic to the last degree. They have cherished no "impracticable ideals," and, cherishing none, have wanted nothing but opportunity and the prick of their ruling passion to make them political criminals. The miasma of criminality that pervades our municipal life, here and elsewhere, is explicable from this cause. There is not a public evil not incident to the mere sporadic irresponsibilities of human nature that does not owe its being to this all sufficient cause. The carnival of crime initiated by Schmitz and Ruef would have been impossible of development except for the existence of the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company and allied interests, and that bureau and its ramifying machinery, used for preventing the enforcement of justice, has been a principal buffer betwixt the accused and the punishment they have so richly deserved.

Executives have been selected, legislatures controlled and the judiciary, in no small measure, constituted by this power in its own interests and no other. Where public servants have not been owned in fee and under bondage to "take orders" they have been chosen because of possessing types of mind that rendered them equally servicable. This has been especially true of men put upon the bench.

For the better part of a generation California has been a political dependency of the Southern Pacific Company, but not more so than New York has been a dependency of the New York Central Railroad or Pennsylvania of a railroad corporation bearing the same name as the commonwealth. Many another State has known its master's voice and done his bidding to the destruction of the spirit of independence and debauching of manhood. The truth of this arraignment is at last permeating the subconsciousness, at least, of the manhood of this nation and signs portend a national upheaval against the downward pressure of an incorporated plutocracy. If California can be redeemed to self government there is not a State in the Union that will not be so redeemed.

Democracy has its faults and limitations, but, having made due allowance for them, a democracy is still the safest form of government for all concerned that the world has ever known. But the maintenance of a democracy implies an age-long controversy with interests glutinous for acquisition and power, ever desirous for special privileges and immunities. Since the Civil War the American people have, in affairs of government, taken the direction of least resistance and that direction always leads to a centralization of power in covetous and dangerous hands. For this there is no remedy except a training of our youth to a realization of the truth that citizenship carries with it an obligation as well as a privilege, and to this training The California Weekly, in its "School for Citizenship," elsewhere explained, will give constant and earnest attention.

WHERE SHOULD HARBOR CONTROL VEST?

Los Angeles continues to feel sore at San Francisco because San Francisco feels sore at Los Angeles on account of the way Los Angeles voted on the India Basin and seawall amendments. The insistence down south is that harbor control should be a municipal and not a State problem inasmuch as it is impossible that all the people of a State shall ever be able to judge wisely as to the needs of all, or any, of the harbors of the State. Accordingly the best sentiment in Los Angeles is reaching out toward San Pedro with the view of making that port an integral portion of the City of Los Angeles in order that the port may be placed under the protection of the metropolis of the south.

Oakland also is seeking to hold within municipal control what "white meat" on her water front greedy corporations have left her, and Oakland wants no State interference with municipal control of a harbor that means very much to Oakland.

So far as San Francisco is concerned her harbor, for better or for worse, is in the control of the State and every benefit sought has got to be referred to the whole State for approval before a pile can be driven.

It may be laid down as fundamentally true that, so far in the history of California, neither municipal nor State control of harbors has worked for the common good, but only into the hands of predatory interests. In San Francisco harbor management is and has been confined mainly to the care of political odd-jobs men, recruiting sergeants for the Herrin machine. Sacramento's water front has been municipally managed with the result that special interests have acquired all except 400 feet of river frontage and that remnant must be reached by crossing nine tracks of the Southern Pacific railroad, which corporation lately sought to reduce access to this frontage to one forty-foot street. Oakland has, in times past, been as fully under the domination of the Southern Pacific interests as State or city ever was, and, as for San Pedro, by manipulation of the municipal government and the government of Los Angeles County, the Southern Pacific, and allied interests, have bottled the harbor and may insert the stopper at their own convenience.

Is it not about time for commercial interests to ask who the real party in interest in harbor control by right ought to be? Is San Francisco the only, or even the chief, party in interest in the development and control of her harbor? What of the Nation whose commerce with untold millions across the Pacific must pour in and out through the Golden Gate! To whose surpassing interest is it that the ship and the car should come together along Oakland's extended water front if not to the producers and consumers beyond the Sierras who are to fill and empty the cars that come to and go from the ships? Does the harbor problem at San Pedro pre-eminently concern Los Angeles or the States and Territories far to the East that must create the commerce that makes the harbor needful?

In the last analysis is not the question of harbor management chiefly of national concern? Must the commerce of a great nation be at the risk of the incompetence or the subserviency of a State political machine or of municipal degradation? It militates little for or against any policy that we did not start that way, for the whole history of humanity is a history of moving toward, not from, correct principles.

The issue thus raised may savor of the academic, but it is hardly possible that only one harbor in all California shall remain under State control while all the others are municipally managed. If the nation be the predominating party in interest in control of harbors why should not the nation control all harbors?

COLLEGE AND UNIVERSITY.

President Jordan's article, to be found on another page, will prove of great interest to all those who have a vital concern for education. His conclusions have not been reached without wide investigation and deep thought, and if there be those who are not able to follow him to all of his conclusions the lack of an investigation as wide, and thoughtfulness as deep, may explain their inability.

Bigness is not greatness, and there are reasons for fearing that some of our western universities may have become big rather than great, and yet there are few of them that do not take pride in the length of their student rolls. They are human and the spirit that permeates them is human to a tantalizing degree.

It is a far cry from the little red schoolhouse to the ultimate university for whose existence David Starr Jordan is striving to prepare the public mind—the institution where mature and serious-minded men and women make their final preparation for particular vocations in life, or consecrate themselves to the pursuit of truth as men have given themselves to the church and women to the hospital. Will the burden-bearing public ever be willing to assume the charge of the chain of schools from kindergarten through the grammar school, high school, junior college, college and university? It will be asking a good deal of the taxpayer, the more especially as it will be scarcely more than the hundredth child of the people who will pass out from the university with his final diploma inside his breast pocket.

In a former time it was held sound policy to devote the public purse to the support of the common school, and those secondary schools which were looked upon as the colleges for the common people, leaving it to private and benevolent enterprise, or the vainglory of money-getters, to provide that specialized education which the university idea suggests. That idea may obtain again, and yet nothing can the more certainly tend to stratify society than the inability of the children of the poor, who have the aspiration and the ability to take an education, to reach as high a rung on the ladder of learning as the children of the rich.

The problem which David Starr Jordan has set before thoughtful readers of The California Weekly is a brain-cracking one, but in so setting it forth he has performed a patriotic and a needed service. It is not by shutting the eyes to coming issues that the public is to be best prepared for meeting them when they come.

THE CAUSE AND THE CURE.

There is no man in America better qualified to speak of the inadequacy of our judicial system than Judge William H. Taft. In a series of four addresses, delivered before the senior class at Yale in 1906, he pointed to what he regarded as the most serious fault to be found with our judicial system as it obtains, especially in the South and West. This fault is that the man on the bench has been stripped of a large share of the common law functions of a judge and of his co-operative powers in aid of the deliberations of a jury. Under the common law system, which still obtains in England and in the Federal courts in this country and, to some extent, in the older States of the Union, judge and jury are one and inseparable, working together for the establishment of justice. Under the common law system the court tries the causes with the assistance of attorneys on either side. Under the newer order of things judicial, attorneys try cases in the presence of judges who serve as umpires.

If it can be clearly shown how this condition came about, a way may be more easily be found for remedying the fault.

The reason for the condition is not far to seek. Gentlemen at the bar have desired to win bad cases and have found the common law powers of judges standing in their way. Inasmuch as our western and southern legislatures have mainly been made up of attorneys who sought election to legislative positions in order that they might so tinker the laws as to make it easier for them to win bad cases in court it is easy to see by what influence the courts were stripped of their common law prerogatives. Every session of every legislature affords numberless instances where general laws are amended to fit the needs of special cases.

Having stripped the judge of his common law advisory relation to the jury, attorneys with bad cases were free to practice all the arts of amateur theatricals upon the jurors. That was the first step. The next was to load down and confuse the jury with interminable and inexplicable instructions. Then came the "fixing" of jurors by downright bribery. This method was, however, open to the objection of being more or less raw so that, in San Francisco at least, there developed the custom of "fixing" the jury lists in advance of calling any case on the calendar. That reduced the whole course of law to a farce and a fraud.

It would not be wholly fair to leave out of consideration, as playing a part in the process of stripping our courts of power, a growing distrust of the courts themselves by reason of the methods more recently employed in selecting judicial candidates, but the desire of unprincipled attorneys, freed from the restrictions of professional tradition, has been adequate to the end.

The remedy is to restore to the courts the common law powers they have lost, and then restore to the people the power to select their judges. A purging of the bar of those who have sought admission to it that they might the more safely and effectively practice rascality will come near to doing the rest.

The Pillsbury-Washburn mills of Minneapolis have always done a splendid business. The margin between the cost of wheat and the selling price of flour has been good, though not as good as when the original Pillsbury first hit upon the gradual reduction process and put the flour made at St. Anthony falls from the foot to the head of the market. At that time he could buy enough wheat for $2.50 to make flour that sold for $14.00, and it was no trouble to make money at milling. What threw the Pillsbury-Washburn mills into the hands of receivers was their inability to pay dividends on millions of money never invested in the business. The ability to convert barley into beer has scarcely been able to bear that burden.

The news that the way has been made clear for Elihu Root to succeed Tom Platt in the Senate of the United States is full of encouragement for a new and better order of things. It would inspire California with hope if only California had an Elihu Root, or even a fair counterfeited him, but has she? Political life in California, since the advent of the Southern Pacific influence, has not been attractive to men of the Root quality of mind.

If conditions which obtained in Cuba ten years ago were intolerable in American eyes, so intolerable as to justify going to war to relieve the situation, why is not the prevailing condition in Hayti equally so now? Both of those pretended republics have outraged civilization for a century. It is time to bring the miserable fiasco to a close and Uncle Sam is the only power that can be permitted to perform that service. Why not do it now?

Let Emmons Out.

Alas, poor Emmons! He wants to be let out of jail. Everybody who ever got into the Sacramento County jail has wanted to get out, and with reason. It is not an up-to-date institution. Emmons was in jail more than three years and that should be rated as the equivalent of five years in either state prison without benefit of credits. Besides, Emmons has been given the worst of it when he was not entitled to harsher treatment than the others received. The door to oblivion was opened to French by a jury more kind than discriminating. Harry Bunkers went to San Quentin, served his time, earned his credits, and has been restored to society a wiser if a sadder man. Eli Wright made faces at the newspapers, then packed his grip for Patagonia where he wrestled with the aches and pains of nostalgia until a sympathetic prosecuting attorney had proceedings against him dismissed that he may come home and see the folks. These men sinned because they loved sin and preferred sin to righteousness. It was not so with Emmons. When he is in the right mood he prefers righteousness to all else and can lead a prayer meeting as readily as, in another mood, he can head a procession "down the line" or loot a money drawer. He is as unstable as a jellyfish and amazingly good or despicably bad owing to the veer of the wind that blows his way. Turn the wayward rascal out. No doubt some evanescent reform movement is waiting for him to lead it. Having sunken to the depths, the next place to look for him is at the heights just this side of glory.

Distinguished Consideration Shown.

Jackson Hatch was, until something more than a year ago, held in high esteem and the political party to which he belongs ungrudgingly did him the honor to offer him to the State as candidate for judicial preferment. Something more than a year ago he was charged with having looted an estate the management of which was entrusted to his charge. The truth or falsity of the charge should have been ascertained months ago, a reputation vindicated or a guilty man punished. However, it is only just now that the judicial machinery in Santa Clara County has begun to make ready to begin to do justice. Being a man of distinguished bearing, and much social consequence, the deference has been shown the accused of awaiting his pleasure in the matter of his trial. His state of mind, condition of nerves, the embarrassments attending a situation so entirely novel to one in his station in life, evidently all these things have been taken into account in the case of The People vs. Jackson Hatch. Would this delay have occurred had the accused been just a plain citizen, no matter what the condition of his mind or the state of his nerves? The people of California rightfully demand that the law shall not be a respecter of persons and that justice shall be prompt and evenhanded.

He Should Have Died Hereafter.

In the absence of certainty as to the manner of his taking off it is no more than just to the memory of Chief of Police W. J. Biggy to accept the most likely rather than the most unlikely explanation of the event. Suicide is exceptional, quite contrary to the ordinary hazards of life, while the hypothesis of accidental falling into the water from a lurching launch in the darkness of night is not an unreasonable one. In seeking to explain similar phenomena nine hundred times out of the thousand he who accepts the more ordinary and usual explanation, rather than the more extraordinary and unusual, will have his wisdom justified when the denouement takes place. Peace to the memory of the dead chief! He should have died hereafter.

Congress Upon Us.

Congress will soon be upon us. The session will be important as the skirmish ground preparatory to the tariff fight to follow in the extra session after the fourth of March. The rest of the work will be of routine character. The President will no doubt recall Congress to its unfinished business, but it is likely enough that the Roosevelt influence may wane as his term of office approaches expiration. "The king is dead; long live the king," had its origin in human nature and congressmen are human, and, in the forthcoming stepping in and stepping out, nothing will be gained in the good graces of the new President by slightly treating the old, but quite to the contrary. Nevertheless, the Roosevelt policies, in Congress, are likely to mark time until President Taft, in his message, makes them his own. Then they'll go again.

At the Risk of Being Churlish.

It springs eternal in the newspaper breast to extend the hand to every new journalistic enterprise and to every new management that undertakes an old enterprise. Therefore it is with regret that The California Weekly, itself the thankful recipient of so many congratulatory sayings, must withhold words of cheer from the Evening Globe under its new control. For it is announced that the change of management does not imply a change of policy. That alone should prove fatal to the Globe's longevity. No greater harm can come to any community than to have it become possible for newspapers of the Calkins Syndicate type to be prosperous. This is said with no ill will toward that syndicate or any of its members, and with no wish to do them harm. Their ideals are unhealthy and the execution of them has been hurtful wherever they have cast their lines. May we not therefore hope that the new proprietors of the Globe will see their way to announce, or put into practice, an entire change of policy. In that event we shall hasten to bid it a hearty good-speed.

AS GOOD AS HALF OF THEM.

She was splendidly tall and possessed a figure so well proportioned as not to fail of being noticed in any company or any crowd. Her features were regular and complexion exceptionally good. She spoke with a vivacity and intelligence that made those sitting near her eyes-droppers in their own despite, and yet, with all her culture and sprightliness of mind, there was a certain "setness" to her facial expression that made against her. Otherwise she had been as fine a specimen of a perfected womanhood as one could find in many a day. All that she said to her companion while coming across the bay, that made any impression upon the writer's inattentive ear, was this: "I never go to church myself, but I believe that I am just as good as one-half of those who do."

Doubtless she was and is as good a woman as one-half of those who go to church upon occasion, and it may be that she is as good a woman as one-half of those who go to church habitually, but how about the other half? The writer has been wanting to ask her this question ever since. How about the other half?

It may not be far from true to say that one-half of the women who go to church go to hear the music, go because others go, go to be entertained by an interesting talker, go for intellectual and social refreshment. This woman thought herself as good as these and perhaps she is, yet it is possible that something of the deeper significance of church attendance soaked into their consciousnesses and made them better women than she after all. They ran the risk of it.

But how about the other half? How about the women who go to church because they love God, because their hearts have gone out to the gentle Nazarene, because they feel and know that they are not sufficient unto themselves but must lay hold of and lean upon that unseen power which pervades all things and shapes all destinies, so far away to many, but nearer to them than hands and feet? How does this woman compare with such as these? The answer is to be read in her face and in their faces. The one thing she lacked they have. The many charms, she has most of them may lack, but that one which she had not is worth them all.

It is mainly a question of atmosphere and spiritual nourishment. Out-of-doors is good for the complexion, for elasticity of movement and for that plus condition of mind and body which gives sprightliness to the mind and piquancy to the conversation, but it is as rare that a soul can be developed outside of a worshipping atmosphere as it is that a rose can be developed away from the sun, and there is no power under heaven that can prevent the difference showing in the face.

Man is a worshipping animal and, unless the quality of worshipfulness is in him, he is only an animal. The habit of worship is to the human soul what perfume is to the rose and the apple and, whether it be church or synagogue that affords the opportunity, it is as well worth while to attend religious services of some sort habitually as it is to plant our gardens with reference to sunshine and atmosphere. Good as one-half she may have been, but in the nature of things she cannot be as good as the other half. That would be expecting figs from thistles.

THE PEOPLE'S OWN LOBBY IN TWO STATES

By E. FRENCH STROTHER.

Governor Hughes' phenomenal success in forcing the Legislature of New York to enact constructive reform laws, in the face of the opposition of every organization clique of both parties, was made possible almost wholly by the co-operation of the People's Lobby. Throughout his political career he has deliberately isolated himself from his party and from his friends, but he has been able, notwithstanding, to compel a hostile legislature to pass laws distasteful to its members but demanded by the people.

Sometime before Governor Hughes' first election, the Citizens' Union of New York City established a branch office in Albany, for the purpose of following the progress of legislation there, with special reference to bills that might be against the public interest of New York City. This work was entrusted to a young lawyer and two assistants. They examined every bill as it was introduced into the legislature, analyzed it for possible hidden motives, and reported the result to the Citizens' Union. Where a bill proved to be a blind to cover a "grab" of public property for private use, the Citizens' Union would immediately call mass meetings, organize public sentiment against it, send large delegations by special trains to Albany to protest, and so alarm the legislators that they would defeat the bill for fear of their constituents. In this way dozens of scandalous measures of a kind that had hitherto passed daily unchallenged were now defeated with equal regularity. One such bill, if uncontroverted, would have relieved several of the richest corporations in the city from a large share of their taxes; another would have given a franchise in perpetuity without cost to a street railway company to use one of the main thoroughfares of the city; and dozens of others would have handed out, free of charge, valuable special privileges to corporations. In short, the lobby stopped the steals, so far as they affected New York City.

This lobby soon found another way to make its righteous influence effective. An alliance was gradually developed with the newspaper correspondents at Albany. These men, representing daily papers in every constituency in the State, had been handicapped by the fact that they had no legal training to help them in analyzing the huge mass of bills that were introduced every day. The People's Lobby supplied this deficiency. Every evening, within half an hour after the day's batch of bills had been introduced, the correspondents found in the office of the lobby a typewritten analysis of every bill, showing not only its professed intention but also what its actual effect would be when enacted into law. These analyses were absolutely impartial, and with rare exception offered no comment, but they made perfectly plain the real intent of the authors of the bill. Gradually the correspondents learned to place implicit confidence in these reports, and to rely wholly upon them for the news about legislation. With this confidence and this reliance came a growth of friendliness toward the People's Lobby, so that eventually, when the lawyer in charge printed a comment on the undesirable character of a bill, the correspondents gladly considered this comment to be news, and included it as part of their news letters. Thus the People's Lobby established a State-wide medium of publicity through which it made its influence felt instantly whenever it wished to do so.

This influence proved to be a weapon of deadly efficiency, for when the next campaign was opened, and the legislators went back to their constituencies for re-election, they found that their record followed them. It was done in this way: At the opening of the campaign the leaders of the Citizens' Union carefully reviewed the record of every member of the Legislature from all the boroughs of Greater New York, prepared a concise summary of that record, and gave it out to the correspondents. The day following, in nearly every influential paper in New York, there appeared a series of paragraphs like the following:

Senator John Smith, Borough of Brooklyn, Senate District No. 1. Voted yes on bill to grant postal franchise to gas company under guise of amending the charter of cities having more than one million inhabitants. Voted in favor of allowing New York Central to grab Eleventh Avenue Generally friendly to the corporations Should be defeated.

Reports similar to the above resulted in the defeat of eleven senators from the Borough of Brooklyn alone. The People's Lobby had achieved a new efficiency. It could not only defeat bad bills in the Legislature; it could go to the root of the evil and put corrupt men out of public office.

Its activity had also effects in other directions. Fewer bad bills were introduced. They were wasted effort. Fewer men voted for the bad bills that did get in. It had proved to be poor politics. Legislators became more attentive to their duties. They examined more carefully the bills that they were asked to introduce. It was becoming too embarrassing to be sponsor for a bad bill, and men who had often really quite innocently introduced such a bill out of friendship, without examining it closely for hidden motives, became very cautious of repeating the indiscretion. Altogether, the People's Lobby accomplished a genuine reform in legislative procedure in New York.

When Governor Hughes was elected for the first time, the Citizens' Union, after carefully considering the wisdom of the step, placed this People's Lobby, with its organized machinery of publicity, wholly at the governor's service, and toward it, alone of all his friends, he relaxed his inflexible attitude of isolation and accepted its co-operation. The result was that in his fight for the enactment of the Public Service Commissions Act and of the anti-race track gambling laws, his sole weapon was this publicity. But this weapon was sufficient. In every legislator's home town the home paper daily chronicled his state of mind toward the governor's campaign for reform legislation, and as the governor's campaign was the people's cause, the people promptly gave the lawmakers to understand that they must face the issue squarely and stand or fall by the choice they made. The effect of this concentration of public opinion was visible from day to day. One after another of the wavering and the bought yielded to the pressure of the public will, until the bills were brought squarely to issue and passed, under bitter protest but with equal acknowledgment of the compulsion. The People's Lobby had simply supplied the facts to the public, and the public did the rest.

This lobby for the people is still maintained, at the private expense of a comparatively small proportion of the public-spirited citizens of New York. But in Wisconsin much the same result has been brought about by a bureau of the State government. In this case, the work is almost wholly constructive in character. So many of the laws enacted by the legislature were declared to be unconstitutional by the State courts, or were found to be defective, so that they were either insufficient to achieve the purpose for which they were designed or incidentally affected adversely previous good statutes, that a general public demand arose for greater care in the original drafting of bills. A young man who had attracted attention to himself by some work similar to that done by the People's Lobby in New York, was thereupon chosen to help the legislators in the preparation of proposed laws, and an office was created for him for that purpose. He and his assistants were consulted before bills were introduced at all, the purpose of the proposed statute was explained, and they carefully consulted all the previous statutes and the courts' interpretations of those that could possibly be affected by the change before drafting the new bill. In this way the objections of the courts were forestalled, and previous good laws were not disturbed. The results were an immediate reduction in the number of bills introduced and a reduction in litigation arising from conflicting laws. The time of the legislature was economized by the elimination of worthless bills, with the result that more attention was given to a consideration of the business before the houses. The time of the courts was economized by the elimination of unnecessary cases, with the result that the period between the filing of reasonable cases and the judgment of the courts was shortened.

AS THE WORLD WAGS

San Francisco.

Now the great white goal of the great round earth who knoweth the ways of men,
How they build and they build till their structure falls, and then they do build again;
How palace and cottage, or steeple and dome with their upward-reaching spire,
Are first but a thought that springs into life in the train of His creature, man,
He chose Him a place in the wide, wide West where the hills slope down to the sea,
Where the landlocked waters are bright and fair as the dreams of life's morning lay,
Where step after step the hills come down to the shore of the mighty bay,
Till their feet are flecked by its drifting spume and laved by its sparkling spray,
And He hemmed it in with shine of the suns and smiles of the tranquil sea,
For He said, "Here is room in this world abloom, and here shall a city be."

Then a city arose, stone piled upon stone, and the robe of her grace was fair,
With the blue of the waters for eye at her feet and the sunlight for eye in her hair,
She danced through the seasons that knew not a change, our own San Francisco, the bright,
And she waltzed through days with their glory allday, and she danced to the lure of the night,
Oh, fairer a maiden than ours of the West was never and never I trow,
A laughing coquette and a siren, and yet with loyalty wholly abiding,
And the fame of her graces went out through the lands, the love of their folk to beguile,
Till she trusted in folly to those who betray, believing in men who were vile,
Then the gutter, the gutter, the buyer of men, all vil tures that prey on a land,
Heed sways, and debauched, and dined with their touch in the city the Architect planned.

Then chaos came down, lost chaos again. The crepitant demon of fire Ran rioting on through the places of men, mad leaping o'er steeple and spire,
And the homes of our love in their ashes were laid; but palace and hovel were there,
And this was the time that the hoolster and knave selected for laying their snare,
They dashed their plots on our ocean of tears; man's anguish they seized as a prize,
And a mad moral chaos both matched and outmatched the chaos that greeted our eyes,
And now, San Francisco, how straight wilt you stand? Shall the bribe be as solid as his hold?
Then walk you unheeding the whispers of men, small men who are lighthearted for gold,
Stand straight, and strong with the strength of your youth, when scant was the shift robbers knew,
And the God who had set our foundation of yore again shall be builder with you.

United Railways Transfer Rules.

A large number of people travel over the lines of the United Railways in San Francisco, and all of them use transfers at one time or another. This makes the rules relating to these precious slips of paper of very general interest, and consequently it is felt that no excuse is needed for presenting them here. It should be said in this connection that in giving the rules I rely upon my memory, and hence there doubtless are verbal inaccuracies in them. I am convinced, however, that I convey the spirit of the rules with absolute fidelity and unflinching accuracy—yes, I am confident that there can be no doubt of that. Here, then, are the rules as thus remembered and spiritually portrayed:

Rule 1.—A transfer will be issued only upon request when passenger pays fare. If he is a stranger in town, unacquainted with this rule, and consequently does not request when he pays his fare, let him suffer. The wretch has no business to be a stranger.

Rule 2.—Transfers are not transferable. If you transfer a transfer you will not be transferred on the car; so get ready to take your medicine.

Rule 3.—A transfer is good only "on first car passing transfer point." If the first car thus passing is going in the wrong direction you can take it or let it alone as you please. We believe in giving the public its choice in these matters.

Rule 4.—Transfers are good only at the transfer points, so, if you are compelled to go down the street for anything, take the point with you.

Rule 5.—Passengers must travel over the most direct route to reach destination. If the road doesn't happen to run over the most direct route, walk. The exercise may help your dyspepsia.

Rule 6.—Transfers will not be issued on transfers except to enable passengers to continue ride on a terminal line. We find the extra nickel convenient to use.

Rule 7.—A transfer will be refused on any line which will return passenger to or near original point of departure. You can't come any of this circular business on us.

Rule 8.—Conductor will punch transfers in space provided to validate. In case of oversight, punch the conductor. He is paid to square matters with the public.

Rule 9.—If any controversy arises passengers are requested to pay their fare again and report the matter promptly to the General Manager, being particular to give time, car number, conductor's number, his age and the condition of his teeth, whether married and, if so, why; previous condition of servitude, amount and character of the family laundry, and any other little particulars that may be of general interest as well as a subject for light-hearted laughter. The General Manager will inspect this bill of particulars and do what he pleases about it.

Other rules will be promulgated from time to time, as the interest of the company may demand, and it is enjoined upon the public to look pleasant, please.

The Opinions of Rufus.

Some folks allers remind me of my black hen. She clucked louder an' o'fener than any other hen in the barnyard, but she laid the smallest eggs an' dern few of 'em.

I argue that they's suthin wrong with the reelection that ain't es good in a hoss trade es it is in prayer-meetin'.

Ef you're thinkin' of gittin' married it's just es well to remember that the mockin' bird don't make much of a show 'long side of a peacock, but it's a more satisfyin' domestic companion.

I hope the Lord will realize how I was tempted when I fell, an' make allowance. But it's different with St. Boggs; anyone can see that he sins deliberately.

I don't claim they ain't no exceptions to the rule, but I'm bettin' consid'ble that, in the long run, the boy that has one of these old-fashioned prayin' mothers will pull 'round to purty near the right track.

Don't tell me they ain't no such thing es worshipin' both God an' Mammon successfully. Ever hear of John D. Rockefeller?

The feller that differs with us materially may mean all right, but anybody must see that they's suthin wrong with either his intellect or his morals.

Don't git discouraged too easy. After the calf had butted pa over six times when he was tryin' to teach it to drink milk, it turned out to be the best heifer in the lot.

He Scorned to Answer.

"And now," said the political orator, as he was about to conclude his address, "if anybody desires to ask any question, I shall be pleased to answer it. I consider the right to ask reasonable questions and receive reasonable answers an essential part of the palladium of our liberty, and I—"

"Say," broke in a harsh voice, "what is a palladium?"

"Hey?" said the orator.

"What's a palladium?"

"A palladium is a—it is a—a—a palladium is—a pal— See here," the orator suddenly interrupted himself to remark in ringing tones, "I refuse to answer so childish a question. Everybody knows what a palladium is, and I will not consume the time of this audience by replying to you. The orchestra will please strike up."

So he escaped from a sad dilemma.

Moral:—If a political orator doesn't have his nerve with him, where does he get off?

A Tragedy of Whiskers.

"Whiskers, carry cars." Therefore, cut off your whiskers. Advice of H. A. Hogcholine, city physician

A young and charming maiden lay moaning on her bed, While the stricken mortals gathered to hear the words she said,
And to note her evolutions when she twisted in her pain When another germ, arriving, would prod her once again. The maiden moaned fully sorely, and the mortals also moaned,
And nearly tears stood in their eyes when'er the damsel groaned. While she murmured, oh, so tenderly, "Your sympathy I crave,
To think that I am passing 'cause my Chawlie wouldn't shave!"

"He is tall and straight and manly, and his whiskers are so sweet;
And they felt so very funny that they made my jaw complete.
And I knew not, oh, I knew not, as I state in plainest terms,
That those whiskers, all so lovely, were a nesting-place for germs."

So I took the awful chances, and I took them somewhat off.

And if you had mentioned microbes then I'm sure I would have scoffed.

Oh, pity me, and wipe the eyes that dimming teardrops have.

For I'm passing, I am passing, 'cause my Chawlie didn't shave.

"For those awful chances then, as my sad state confirms,
For I was not a scientist and was not up on germs."

And then they came and camped with me, a billion tiny bugs.

And each one had a fiery dart, the kind a microbe lugs. They hurled their darts most recklessly and made my life their pawn.

I'm passing, such! I'm passing 'cause—" A sigh, and she was gone.

Oh, pass young men and Willie-boys, your answer now I crave:

If you're so fond of Ethyl why in thunder don't you shave?

The Lawyer, His Client, and His Fee.

"It is a peculiarly vile case," said the Higher-up, with manifest dissatisfaction. "I am accused of bribery, you know."

"But you didn't bribe, did you?" the lawyer inquired, with an airy wink.

"Did I! Well, seeing as this is in professional confidence, I don't mind mentioning that I did. I have to look after my business, you know."

"Of course," said the lawyer.

"And the defense will have to be conducted with great acuteness. The right newspapers will have to be seen, and the right jurors will have to be approached quietly, and the dynamite will have to be located properly and with the highest legal acumen, and—Well, here's a good, stiff retainer for you."

So the lawyer, being a member of an honorable and time-honored profession, accepted the retainer and sent out for the dynamite.

And the Bar Association maintained a great silence, as well as a masterly inactivity anent the matter.

Post-Thanksgiving Paean.

There isn't a notion at all in my head,
And my gratitude proved by passing my plate,
And if you'd know the cause, way, in one word it's said:
Thanksgiving.

I was grateful, of course, so I ate and I ate,
And my gratitude proved by passing my plate,
And I said to my neighbor, "Tis really a great Thanksgiving."

Don't ask me to say that my grandpa came
That night on a heliglog with optics of flame
To take a mad part in the very queer game
Thanksgiving.

For my dear grandpa, who was much of a snob,
Was a much finer man than I'm able to do,
And he never would mix with the cutters. I saw Thanksgiving.

Dull aches and we pains in my system now lurk,
And labor's a feature. I'd much rather work,
And yet I am grateful. That I'm not the Turk!
Thanksgiving.

The Odor of Otis Again.

"Well or ill, whole or wounded, we cannot modify in one jot our opinion of this man (Francis J. Heney). He is ignorant of the law, violent in disposition, a bluffer by breeding and long practice. He is as tempestuous a blusterer as ever disgraced the practice of the law. He is a bundle of selfishness seeking after vainglory, merciless in his cruelty when he has some helpless wretch to badger."—From Harrison Grey Otis' Los Angeles Times.

Ay, shame him with your slame. There is a vile
And crawling creature, leashed and more than foul,
Which none may touch unmoved by reeking life,
That marks its path where'er it crawl or prowls.
The leathsome slime of its mantle like life-veils
And leaves its ooze on all things sweet and fair—
Where Otis goes, his ink of hell to spread,
Let all that's clean beware, and yet beware.

Even while the felon's bullet held its place
In quivering flesh of him who dared to do
Your work and mine, this Otis paused no space
His venom o'er our martyr there, and there
The slame of it! Disgrace that knows no name!
Fates of old would fainhold here and now!
Well might all demons chortle in acclaim,
"Hell hath a laurel saved for Otis' brow."

The Price He Has Paid.

Speaking of Harrison Grey Otis, going into a Los Angeles bank, not long ago, a certain man met him and then passed into the bank.
"I am sorry for Otis," said the cashier.
"Yes," said the man, inquiringly.

"He needs pity," the cashier continued.
"Why so?" was a not unnatural inquiry.
"He just said to me," the cashier responded, "that he had made a million dollars in the newspaper business, and that he hasn't a friend in the world. Poor old chap!"

Aye, poor old chap! He is old, gray, worn and ready to step over the precipice into the gulf of infinite silence, and his life's history is summed up in, "I have made a million dollars, and I haven't a friend in the world." Pugnacious, combative, overbearing, pettily conceited, he has gone through life without a friend because he is no man's friend, for "whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap" is no less true of the emotions that sway man than it is of the grain of the field. Harrison Grey Otis has valued having his own way and securing money more than he has valued ought else in life, and the price he has paid for self-gratification is "I haven't a friend in the world." How could he have? He has deserved no friendship.

Is that accumulated million dollars worth the price it has cost its owner? Can any glittering pile compensate for such enmity or despal as grimly faces Otis wherever he turns? Answer the question for yourself as you please, but for my part I will hold that there is such a thing as paying too much for coin, and I would sooner be some humble and unknown man who nightly goes from his toil to a little home where wife and children believe in him and love him, and where neighbors sometimes come to give him cordial greeting, than to be any Harrison Grey Otis, possessor of a million dollars, but without a friend in the world. Ay, infinitely better the laborer in the ditch whose life is made beautiful by love and friendship than he who sits him down, alone and friendless, in a glittering palace.

But what do you think about it? Isn't there such a thing as paying too much for money?

The Downward Path.

Among the private papers of Peter Van Vlissingen, who was convicted and sentenced in Chicago the other day for forging mortgages of enormous aggregate face value, was a document written by Van Vlissingen and relating to the case of Paul O. Stensland, who wrecked the Milwaukee Avenue State Bank. The document is introspective in its character. Van Vlissingen clearly having had himself in mind as he wrote it, and the lesson it conveys should be of interest to young men who are about starting out in life, not to mention some older ones. Says the forger, in beginning—

"It is not to be supposed that Paul O. Stensland deliberately resolved at some particular period of his life to rob the poor people whose confidence he had gained.

"Such is not the history of the defaulter. "His downfall begins with some apparently trivial irregularity, followed, unfortunately for him, with no unpleasant consequences."

The convicted forger then cites one of these "trivial irregularities." He tells of a trustee who has money in his charge and who draws a portion of it to meet the last payment on an investment, although having enough money of his own, but taking the other person's for the sake of convenience.

"Surely you have done nothing to be ashamed of," he then asserts. "What you have done is to make a little breach in the dykes that keep the raging ocean of dishonesty out of a man's life.

"Again you yield to the temptation and again you find it has done nobody any harm. Nobody, that is, except yourself, for you are on the downward path and stand in grave peril of becoming a defaulter and a felon."

He speaks of the defaulter in a corner, his hopes of "squaring" himself gone.

"Choose he must between forgery on one hand and the total wreck of his hopes on the other," declares Van Vlissingen, and then speaks of when the dishonest man adopts the alternative of forgery. "Though racked with fearful misgivings, he still keeps up appearances," he says, "and looks his friends straight in the eye." But the time comes when the hope of restitution has receded further and further into the distance, and he is face to face with the naked conviction that he is a common felon.

"Groping down to his bedrock character, he chooses whether to pass the remainder of his life as a fugitive from justice or make a clean breast of it and serve out his justly earned course in the pen.

"Considering the number of defalcations, great and small, which are disclosed only when some carefully arranged business ventures go awry, one cannot help wondering how many of his respected neighbors are being saved from disgrace by the success of their enterprises. If most men who use other people's money prosper in their speculations what gulfs of undetected dishonesty must yawn on every side."

He finishes his discourse with a paragraph which would not be badly timed coming from his lips to-day. He says:

"Have you ever used another man's money —innocently, you may say—but as you had no right to use it? If so, remember how easy is the descent, how hard the recovery, and that to relax the stern rules of honesty by the breadth of a hair is to dally with the seductions of the primrose path that leads to ruin."

The Ass.

By D. S. RICHARDSON.

I am an ass, and take great pride
In being this, and not a child.
How do I know? Why, Mike De Young
And Willie Hearst and the Barge
Have pressed this conceit home to me,
And they, in matters of this sort,
Are umpires of the last resort.
I know I have no right to think,
Or even think I think I think,
I have my thinking done each day
By hired scribbles who draw their pay
From "Higher Up" and thugs who stand
With dynamite and gun in hand.
These thinking men are right of course,
They simply ask that we enforce
Such laws as make it safe for men
To lose the only thing they hold dear.
A claim most rational and clear
To men who have no God to fear.
They ask with reason, why not I,
Can you send

The kid-gloved genius, out on end,
Across the bay because, forsooth,
They did not always tell the truth,
Or simply have a quality
Of supervisors, more or less?
Is that a crime, in this fair age
Whose freedom is our heritage?
Such laws like Glass and Pat Calhoun
Break rocks like any other stone.
And wear the stripes, because they thought
That crime consists in getting caught?
The bare idea suggests the sense
Yet popular impotence.

What is the crime when coming to
When men demand that we review
The actions of the sacred few
Who wear banded shirts, and exercise
A right derived from Paradise
To rub it into those who dare
"Lift a protest, here and there?"
Calhoun is right. How do I know?
Because Pat Calhoun told me so.
It is no crime, at dead of night,
To host a man to whom I am sworn
Who told me that? Why every day
The "Mutt" cartoons have told that way.
To show a man the degrading how
Is but an incident to crown
The reign of those who hold the right
With cries for justice and the right
While press and pulpit all resound
With cries for justice and the right
And made to tremble 'neath the tread
Of frantic thousands, stern and dread,
Who, marching, march the degrading how
That they may chance to pull a rope;
With all the ruckus in the air
Why don't the people sometimes meet
To cheer Calhoun or voice their praise
Of all his heaven-descended ways?
Why don't they meet to shout their glee
In murder, graft and anarchy?
Why don't they scream their mad delight
When they are ridiculed and called "right?"
Why don't they clasp their hands and screech
That jury fix is a "heck!"
To which they one and all subscribe—
It wrong is such a sacred thing,
It is to wrong that I would sing.
If slavery is good, why then
I sing the slavery of men.
All had injustice. Aye rare!
All had the smell upon the air.
Who named thee black or stamped thee wrong?
Injustice is a thing that never ends
Hurrah for crime! Hurrah for graft!
Hurrah for murder, here and there!
And, while we're shouting, it were well
To go the limit!—Rah for Hell!
I glory in my shame, this you?
Well that is what I'm taught to do,
Between the sneers for righteousness,
The lawless and the slow press,
Between the greed for gold and all
The pitfalls of the lawless crew.
How can I tell, as others might,
What right is wrong or what wrong right?
And so, it sadly comes to pass
That I subscribe myself an ass.

He Compiled.

A distinguished Belgian lady, says a German paper, wrote the following note to the famous cellist, Servais: "We give next Thursday a banquet, followed by a reception and ball, M. de Z. and I shall be most happy to see you with us. Cordially, Baroness de Z. P. S.—Don't forget to send your violoncello."

The baroness had not long to wait for the artist's reply. It ran as follows: "My Dear Baroness: A pressing engagement necessitates my leaving Brussels immediately, so I am forced, though with great regret, to decline your very kind invitation for Thursday. Sincerely, Servais. P. S.—In accordance with your wish, I am sending you my violoncello."

WHAT THE LEGISLATURE WILL BE LIKE

A SURVEY OF ITS PERSONNEL.

When the Legislature of California is in session, and it soon will be again, it constitutes a large-sized fact in the eyes of many of our two million people, and well it may, because of its ability to interfere in the affairs of all of them, and to make them uncomfortable or otherwise, the Legislature is more potential than anything else in the commonwealth. But with limited exceptions people view Legislatures in the aggregate and do not come to know much of the personality of the men who compose them; they are too far away to become interesting. Yet this is a mistake, because to understand anything of the acts of a Legislature it is necessary to know a good deal about at least a few of the men who compose it. Generally to know a few of the members is enough, since in Legislatures as well as elsewhere, the few always control the many. A hundred and twenty Senators and Assemblymen cast the votes, but not to exceed twelve do the controlling, and these are men of marked individuality, very interesting when one gets to know them.

It is not too early for citizens and taxpayers to begin studying the Legislature of 1909.

A study of the complexion of the Legislature recently chosen by the suffrages of the people of California reveals many changes in membership since last session, a few losses of valuable members, some gains and a large degree of uncertainty concerning the quality of the masses of new material introduced into the legislative body. The Assembly is so far made up of raw recruits that out of the eighty members only twenty-one were on the roll at the last session, although several of those here counted as new men have in times past served in one or the other branch of the Legislature.

There is not so much change in the composition of the Senate, because at the beginning of each session half of the members are holdovers, and because a number of Senators long ago formed the habit of coming back term after term. Twenty-four out of the forty who will sit in the Senate this winter were there last session; six others have just been promoted from the Assembly, and ten are beginners. All these and the other figures here presented presume the correctness of an official list issued by Secretary of State Charles F. Curry.

In a party sense the new Legislature is not quite such a one-sided affair as was the last. Two years ago there were only eleven straight-out Democrats in both Houses, while this time there are twenty-five out of a total membership of a hundred and twenty. In the Senate the Democrats gained two, raising their number from six to eight, while in the Assembly they now have seventeen as compared with five last time. In 1907 there were thirty straight Republicans in the Senate, and this time twenty-four.

In the Assembly there are now forty-seven unhyphenated Republicans as compared with fifty-six last time. The hyphenated form a class by themselves, or, we might say, several classes, all due to the peculiar conditions of politics in the metropolis. In the Assembly, for example, there are two Republican-Union Laborists, and two Democrat-Independence League-Union Laborists. It may be safely predicted that in spite of the hyphens most of these Assemblymen, and also the Senators who ran on more than one ticket, will put in an appearance at the Republican caucus, simply because that is the place in which things are expected to be done.

Of the raw recruits the rawest, as a class, are the San Francisco Assemblymen; only three out of the entire eighteen having been in the Legislature before, so far as the roster of the last session shows. On the Senate side six of the nine were members two years ago.

At least four or five of the men who took a prominent part in the business of the Legislature at its last session, and who will not be present when the roll is called next January, are real losses to the State. For example, W. F. Chandler, who had represented one of the Fresno County districts in two sessions, is a sturdy character and possessed a growing influence, which was always exercised for good. He would have made an almost ideal chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means. But Mr. Chandler had the misfortune to run against a young Democrat named Odol, who lived in Coalinga, and the old county division animosities were revived and resulted in Chandler's defeat.

Another Assemblyman who made a reputation in the last session, and who would have been welcomed back without much distinction of party, was Mr. J. O. Davis, Democrat, of San Benito County. He was a candidate again this year, and his election was generally expected, but he was opposed to a Republican nominee who was a member of the famous Flint family. W. R. Flint, the brother of Thomas Flint, once candidate for Governor. Family influence must have been potent in the little pocket county, for Davis was beaten and Flint elected.

Frank R. Devlin of Solano County, well known as president of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League, was an Assemblyman who had made an admirable record in several sessions, but he was chosen Superior Judge and consequently was not a candidate for the Legislature. Assemblyman Eshleman of Berkeley, who made the memorable fight against race-track gambling two years ago, removed from Alameda County to Imperial, was made district attorney and therefore does not return to Sacramento to renew the contest against the gamblers.

Other Assemblymen who are out, and who were notable for one cause or another, are W. D. L. Held of Mendocino, author of the direct primary amendment to the constitution; Warren M. John of San Luis Obispo, who made a valiant fight against Henry W. Lynch for the office of Senator; R. H. Jury of San Mateo County, the man who stirred up an investigation of the State Printing Office; W. L. McGuire of Kings County, who introduced the bill to divide Fresno County, which precipitated one of the great combats of the session, and F. M. Walsh of Oakland, who has been prominent in several sessions as one of the trusty workers for the machine.

From the Senate there are missing Charles M. Belshaw, who had been in the Legislature, in one house or the other, continuously since 1897, and who had done a lot of valuable work as chairman of the Finance Committee and in other capacities; G. Russell Lukens of Oakland, chairman during two sessions of the Judiciary Committee, a man of ability and also of a considerable faculty for getting on the wrong side of things when he ought to have been on the right side; Howard Broughton, famous as the author of the Broughton bill, who moved from Los Angeles County to San Francisco and thereby gave another and better man a chance to fill his old seat; Henry W. Lynch, of San Luis Obispo County, who beat Warren John for the nomination through a kind of politics which only a few men would wish to play, and then could not be elected himself; and A. E. Muentzer of San Joaquin, who was Lynch's closest rival for the reputation of being the most subservient follower of the machine, and who is now the holder of a Federal office.

There is still left in the Senate a group of able men—not so able as used to belong twenty years ago, when some of the best lawyers in the State were counted among the members of the California Senate—but men who, at least by contrast with their associates, are able, and some of whom enjoy the advantage so inestimable from the point of view of effectiveness of having served a long time. Two very notable examples of this class are Senators E. I. Wolfe of San Francisco and Frank W. Leavitt of Oakland. Their influence is, in the main, a malign one; Wolfe is the maintainer of the race track machine, and Leavitt represents the race track interests; but Wolfe is the possessor of undoubted brains and Leavitt has a forcefulness which is often fairly overwhelming; both are such masters of tactics that it is difficult to get anything through the Senate which they oppose or to defeat anything which they support.

Leroy A. Wright of San Diego and Henry M. Willis of Redlands are two southern Senators who are different types from Wolfe and Leavitt, but who have up to this time followed close behind the machine; both should be capable of better things and probably are. In John B. Curtin of Tuolumne County, George W. Cartwright of Fresno, E. O. Miller of Tulare County, J. B. Sanford of Mendocino and A. Caminetti the Democrats have five members of more than average ability combined with considerable legislative experience. Caminetti is too partisan and makes the Republicans so angry that they cannot work with him; but Curtin gets along with them excellently—in fact, they almost forget that he is not a Republican, and Sanford, who was once a radical, has grown more tactful and therefore more efficient.

Of the newer men in the Senate there are several who should develop as leaders and should be on the right side of most things. Senator A. E. Boynton of Butte County made an excellent record two years ago, and with the aid of the experience he now has ought to come to the front at the coming session. The same may be said of Senator Marshall Black

Allen's Press Clipping Bureau has now had experience in six National and five State Campaigns. In this time has had the honor of serving hundreds of public men, including members of the Cabinet, U. S. Senators, Congressmen, Governors, State Senators and Assemblymen, Mayors, and State and County Central Committees.

It has aided these men by bringing them quickly, easily, and cheaply, what the entire press has to say of them or the measures in which they are interested.

A thorough clipping service discloses the state and trend of public opinion, brings to attention false charges that should be denied, true charges that should be parried; shows what editors need argument, and what editors need encouragement.

In short, aids in handling the most powerful and important of political engines, the Press.

Having three offices, a staff of thirty people, and reading 2,000 papers every week, we have no unsurpassed facilities for very high-grade and thorough work.

We can cover counties, districts, the State, or the Pacific States.

Rates will be furnished on application.

of Palo Alto. Mr. C. P. Cutten of Eureka, who served last time as an Assemblyman, and made one of the best records scored by any member, returns to Sacramento this winter as a Senator, having run against and defeated that paladin of Humboldt Republicanism, George T. Rolley. John W. Stetson of Oakland is in the same class: he was well to the front in the Assembly last time, and now he will occupy the former seat of G. Russell Lukens, whom he defeated easily in a primary election fight.

Senator N. W. Thompson of Los Angeles is another man who has received a well-earned promotion from the Assembly. In this roll of honor we should include E. S. Birdsall of Auburn, whom the railroad machine made such desperate and happily unavailing efforts to defeat for a Senatorial nomination. Mr. Birdsall's offense was that he was an Assemblyman two years ago and was not an obsequious follower of the machine. If he was independent then he should be ten times as much so this winter, after his remarkable victory over the machine. Another man of whose independence of thought and action there is no question is Charles W. Bell of Los Angeles County, who is classed in the official list of members as Non-Partisan and Democrat, because he was elected by a combination of that kind but who is in party politics just as much a Republican as anybody.

Coming to the Assembly, Grove L. Johnson of Sacramento illustrates what has been said of control of a Legislature. Feared by many, admired in a certain way by all, but esteemed by few and loved by none, Grove Johnson has controlled more California Legislatures than any other man unless it be Mr. Herrin. At the present time his influence is not large in the Senate, where some of the most influential Senators dislike him cordially, but in the Assembly he has ever been a dominating factor. As chairman of the Judiciary Committee his hand is on so many measures of so many members that few care to antagonize him, and on the floor of the Assembly chamber he always commands attention and oftentimes is able to overbear opposition. He is so adroit, so bold, so resourceful that he lacks only the confidence of the members to be all powerful. That he will be returned to his old post at the head of the Judiciary Committee, whoever may be elected Speaker, is not questioned. From that coign of vantage he will shoot his poisoned arrows at all reformers and at all reforms except the few he chooses to believe in.

A certain sort of deference is paid in the Assembly to men like Coghlan of San Francisco, the boy orator, Beardslee of Stockton, who was Speaker in 1907, and Stanton and Transue of Los Angeles, who possess the influence that goes with activity and persistence. Then there are a few solid lawyers, like Wyatt of Monterey, Hewitt of Sutter County and Drew of Fresno, who have come back to the Assembly to serve another term and who will contribute to whatever good legislation may be accompanied. Frank Otis of Alameda is another who has made a record and of whom much is expected this winter. It is believed he will have charge of the anti race track bill.

Of the many new members there are a number of whom good things are predicted, but it will be time enough to name them when they have won their spurs. In this as in most Legislatures, there will be a sufficient number of well-meaning men to control if only they can work together and if they have the courage of their convictions—two essentials which are usually lacking. It takes time to make leaders and the leaders already made in this Legislature are generally not those who want to lead it aright. If Leavitt and Wolfe are permitted to seize and keep the leadership in the Senate and Johnson in the Assembly, there cannot be a question of the sinister nature of the influences which will predominate.

Quaker Talk.

Sheriff Gildersleeve of Nassau County, New York, who recently seized near Cedarhurst a lot of roulette wheels with electrical cheating devices, said the other day, according to an exchange, of this fine feat:

"I am glad, I admit, that I succeeded in proving this cheat. The gambling crook is a more difficult problem than he looks. It seems easy to show him up, but try it once and see how hard it is—as hard as talking Quaker."

The sheriff laughed. "Visiting Philadelphia," he said, "a cousin of mine thought that, for a joke, he would do a little Quaker talk.

"Well, on a country walk one day, he saw, sitting on a fence near Conover, an old man who was, he felt sure, a Quaker, for this old man wore dove-gray garments and a dove-gray stove-pipe hat.

"I'll amuse him and myself with my skill at this talk," thought my cousin, and he began: "Good day. How do thee—I mean, how dost thee—do? Art—er—is thou well?"

"From his seat on the fence the old man frowned at my cousin.

"'Hey?' he said.

"And my cousin smiled, resolved this time to utter a swift, glib, graceful flow of Quaker.

"These fertile fields—they is thy's—that is, thee's—oh, hang it all, I mean, thou's? These fields are thou's?"

"The old farmer with feeble haste got down from the fence. He took a plug of tobacco from his hip pocket, bit off a piece and hurried away. He turned his head as he hastened, and snarled at my cousin:

"Go to Bedlam! I'm a farmer, but, thank goodness, I'm not a loonatic!"

Not Building Ships Against Us.

The liberal naval program in England, declared to be the maintenance of a navy with efficiency ten per cent in excess of that of any other two navies, has brought forth a declaration from the London Nation that the Liberal party will not include the United States in its calculations of that efficiency, for two reasons: That it is preposterous to tax 40,000,000 people (of Great Britain) to maintain a fleet able to cope with the fleets for which 140,000,000 people (of the United States and Germany) have been taxed; and furthermore, that the sentiment of the Liberal party toward America is so friendly that the thought of building fleets against us is hateful to the party. The Nation's statement is unofficial, however.

Cuba's Republican Hopes.

The new republic of Cuba will be established on January 28, 1909, when General Jose Miguel Gomez will be inaugurated as president. The election at which General Gomez was chosen was the first truly representative and fair election that has ever been held in Cuba, and the orderliness with which it was conducted and the general acquiescence in the result seem to indicate a promise of more stability for the new republic than it has ever had.

The coalition of the two wings of the Liberal party, led by General Gomez and Dr. Alfredo Zayas, the vice-president-elect, was made possible by the pledge of Gomez not to be a candidate for re-election in 1912, but to work for the election of Doctor Zayas as president. This coalition was responsible for the sweeping Liberal victory, which included the election of a Liberal majority in both houses of the Cuban Congress. The chief danger that threatens its post-election existence is the greed of the office-seekers of the two factions, to both of whom the offices had been promised by Gomez and Zayas. The scramble for offices may disrupt the alliance, but there is reason to believe that it will not.

The Conservatives have accepted their defeat with good grace, but there is a widespread fear that they may secretly encourage disgruntled politicians to stir up another revolution, in the hope of forcing American intervention again, in the belief that if such intervention takes place it will be permanent. The Conservatives generally would be glad to have the stability of American rule, as it would restore confidence in business circles with reference to Cuban investment.

Cuba, of all the Latin republics, has been given the most auspicious entrance into political independence, and the success or failure of its experiment in self-government will have a determining influence upon the attitude of America toward similar experiments in Central America. With the completion of the Panama Canal, the United States will have an increasing interest in preserving the peace in Central America, and Cuba's failure would discourage American statesmen in trusting the ability of Latin races to maintain that peace.

THE UNIVERSITY AND THE COLLEGE

By DAVID STARR JORDAN.

The next forward step in higher education in America must be the separation of the university from the college. The college is English in origin, the university German. The one is generalized and elementary, the other is specialized and technical. Both exist in America, but they are unhappily telescoped together to their mutual disadvantage. In common language the two words have virtually the same meaning.

We have in America some twenty institutions fairly deserving the name of university. Those bear the reproach that their contribution to advanced knowledge is far less than it should be. Their professors are not scholars in the creative sense—at least very many of them are—not their students are treated like school boys, without either personal or intellectual freedom, and the standards of advancement fall short of the best ideals of the universities of Germany.

On the other hand and in equal degree, we hear this complaint of the colleges: Their professors are not teachers, but rather young men of intense special training and narrow sympathies, men who hope to be investigators, or at least who have scanty patience with research, and who have scanty patience with the elementary drill which the college assigns to them as their work. It is further urged that the freedom of the universities is granted to immature boys, not ready to receive it. The freedom of study and freedom of action is used for snap-hunting, for hysterical athletics, and for the many beginnings of vice within the reach of the "gregarious mediocrity" which is the chief component of the college.

The college students are taught in droves, thousands in a yard, with no incentive to the development of personal individuality, and with teachers too intent on other things to be able or willing to call it out.

Without insisting that these extreme statements are everywhere and at all times, or even anywhere at any time, justified, the fact remains that the university suffers from its fusion with the college and that the college suffers equally from its confusion with the university. That the relative deficiency of America in advanced research (a deficiency by no means so great as is currently believed—but real nevertheless) is due to this confusion, no one can doubt, and we cannot doubt that to the same cause we must attribute in large degree the lack of pedagogic enthusiasm, the inadequate discipline, the want of purpose and the spread of contagious vices within the college.

A university in the proper sense is a place for life-training of the highest order. It should embrace technical, professional, and research work, and each part of it should be intensely specialized and under direction of men of the highest personal fitness and personal achievement in their particular line of work. The university demands enormous libraries, highly developed laboratories, and a general concentration of all materials for work, each part giving strength to the others. Each professor should be a great teacher, but the greatness of his teaching should lie in example and in the contagion of personality, rather than in skill in class-room pedagogy. The salary of the professor should correspond to the demands made on him by way of preparation for his work, and of maintenance of leadership in his field.

The college is a place for general culture, for the acquisition of basal conceptions and for the development of personal manners and manliness. Its students are lost in great libraries and their presence embarrasses the administration of the libraries. The need of books in a college is primarily for the teachers. The college students do not need highly specialized apparatus in science, and their teachers should be those whose primary interest lies in making boys into men. To this end, accumulation of resources beyond a certain reasonable point is a doubtful advantage. The college reaches its most effective limit when it can do its work well with less than two hundred thousand dollars of income. Larger numbers impair effectiveness, and this disadvantage is not made good by the presence of great libraries and great laboratories which the college student cannot use. The weakness of the small college to-day lies in the starvation of its faculty. If it could pay better salaries and demand better teachers, it would find its opportunity at once. Colorado and Knox, Amherst and Trinity, Wabash and Oberlin, lack only this to do better collegiate work than is possible at Harvard or Stanford or Cornell. But this again is the vital point and not much can be said for the small college while it is weak in its pay-roll, low in its ambitions, narrow in its sympathies, and vacillating in its standards of scholarship. Much of this weakness is due to the struggle of the colleges to be universities, to be rivals of the great schools, rather than to be their feeders.

If we separate the college from the university it is the college that needs most help; it now falls short of the best ideals farther than the university does. The university in Germany meets the definition given above. It is devoted solely to the professional and research training. But in England the word university has a meaning quite different. In Oxford and Cambridge, the university is merely the alliance of the various colleges, joined to form an agency for granting degrees. It is the examining board of the colleges. A college is a place of residence and instruction, the value of the instruction being tested by professors, not collegiate teachers, selected for the purpose by the university. Hence university becomes primarily synonymous with the system of examinations. From this, in England arises the anomalous distinction of "teaching universities" and "examining universities."

The university of London, though now controlling various detached schools, is primarily an examining board. It is a device for standardizing education, but at the same time it conventionalizes it and tends to destroy originality and spontaneity in teacher and student alike. Very lately the modern university of Cambridge has become organized on the German plan as an agent of advanced training. It has become, in a high sense, a teaching as well as an examining university, and the chief obstacle in the way of its success lies in the conservatism and the inertia of the colleges represented in its board of control. For these colleges of Cambridge, as a whole, are only remotely in sympathy with professional training or independent research, which is the most distinctive attribute of the true university. At Oxford, the university as a body of teachers scarcely exists, although in Oxford there are many professors who possess university ambitions and the university spirit. Yet many of the ablest of these professors have never had a student, and others have sought for them in vain. For the first duty of a great investigator is to leave his impress upon a group of disciples. Research without students is a species of race suicide.

When the first little colleges were established in the American colonies, Harvard, Yale, William and Mary, and Kings College, they were isolated, and could not be grouped in universities. Hence the professors perforce did their own examining, granted their own degrees. From this fact arose our confusion of terms, college and university, these meaning in America practically the same thing. And to this day, the "college course" is the chief business of most of our universities. For various reasons—mostly bad ones—the professional school in America has grown up as the rival of the college. Only relatively lately, under the lead of Harvard and Johns Hopkins, has the entrance to a profession been based systematically and consistently on a college education.

The English college requires a three-year course for the degree of A. B. In America, this course has required four years. In the last twenty or thirty years the entrance requirements of our colleges have been steadily pushed upward, so that the bachelor's degree now implies two years more work than was required in the seventies. It is generally admitted that it has been pushed up too far for the advantage of the student who is to add to it a university course in professional training. It is pushed too far, if the university is to begin where the college leaves off. It is not too far if the main purpose is general education, broad training, as an end, with reference to the special demands of professional life.

To remedy this condition two changes are proposed. At Harvard and in some other colleges the course required for the degree of A. B. is shortened so that a good student can complete it in three years. The fourth year then becomes a graduate year, and with it the university begins. No suggestion as to a physical separation of the university from the college has been made in this connection, except in Clark University, which stands unique in its method of organization.

The other proposal is that the first two years of the present collegiate course be relegated to the college alone and that the university begin its instruction with the present junior year. In this case, the junior year should be given to preparation for research or professional work, the latter beginning properly with the fourth or senior year. In this arrangement, after entrance to the university, two years would be required for the degree of A. B. (which degree would probably, as in Germany, become obsolete as a university degree); four years would lead to the degree in law (Juris Doctor, or J. D.); five years to the degree in Medicine (M. D.); three or four years to the degree of Engineer, and four or five years to that of Doctor of Philosophy, the badge of the professional investigator or teacher. The value of these degrees would not be materially changed from that now recognized. The essential feature is that the university would confine itself to the costly work in education, the work it can do best, while to the college or to the supplementary high school the freshman and sophomore work, the work in elementary language, science and mathematics, would be relegated. The term "junior college" was some years ago framed by President Harper for this work, and the junior colleges affiliated with the University of Chicago now grant at the end of the sophomore year the degree or title of Associate in Arts. This title serves for admission to the university college of the University.

The work of these two higher years, or of the university college, the small college in general can not do well. These years involve libraries, laboratories, the beginnings of research, the beginnings of professional training. To postpone all these until the degree of A. B.

is attained is for many students a loss of time, a waste of strength. The German university begins virtually with our junior year. It would be a mistake for the American university to set its entrance standards any higher. The college may retain for four years those of its number who want not a university course, but rather what the college can give. It might advantageously lower its entrance requirements to cover not two, but three or even four years below the entrance to the university. If it took the four years it would be on the plane of the college of thirty to forty years ago. If three years, it would be on the general level of the British college. If A. B. were to be lowered to the level of "A. A." (Associate in Arts) a collegiate degree from an approved college would admit to the university. But these adjustments will come in one form or another, when the essential, the inevitable change takes place. This is the separation in place, in organization and the method of the university in America from the American college.

This separation of the first two college years from the university would be in every way to the advantage of the few well-equipped institutions fit to bear the university name. It must come sooner or later, and there is no large or insuperable reason why Harvard or Yale or Cornell or Chicago or Stanford, or the State university of Wisconsin, Michigan, California or Illinois, could not accomplish it at once. There are many advantages in leading in an inevitable movement, as there has been several times shown in the history of Harvard, Johns Hopkins, and Cornell.

But for the college the advantage of the sur-render of the junior and senior years would be less clear. To the well-equipped college, the change would be unwelcome, and it would not be accepted. There are many students whose wants are adequately met by the college course of to-day. These do not expect to become engineers or professional men. Their purpose is personal culture, and if they find in the small college, as thousands now find and have found in the past, conditions adequate to their ends, they do well to remain in college for the degree of A. B., or longer for similar work if conditions are favorable. If the small college wishes to maintain the continuity of its alumni roll, it has only to grant two years leave of absence to the members of its junior class, enabling them to attend the university for two years, to be certified back for graduation at home, these students thus, if desirable, receiving at once the degree of the college and the Bachelor's degree of the university. But the granting of the Bachelor's degree of America or of England is not really a university function.

In this case, the institutions worthy of permanent place in our system of higher education will be these: the university, the college, and the junior college, with its equivalent, the supplemental high school. Each of these for a time may duplicate part of the work of another. The need of specialization with growth will tend finally to give the university a definite stamp and character of its own, and it is just as well to have a variety of intermediate schools or feeders leading up to it.

The general aim and purpose of the real university everywhere must be the same, and it is for us to follow the best models possible in extricating ourselves from the present confusion.

In Germany at present, the local high school or gymnasium leads directly to the university. It carries the student through about two years more work than is required in our American high schools. There is a proposal in Germany at present to establish the college between the gymnasium and the university by cutting off the last three or four years of the gymnasium for that purpose. It is also suggested that these colleges be made co-educational.

In the interest of these propositions, a commission of German professors has lately visited the United States. If this should be carried into effect, the conditions in higher education would be very similar in the two countries. In all which concerns universities Germany, the home of the university, offers us much better models than England on the one hand or Latin Europe on the other. The organization of universities must, in any event, and in our country, have much to learn by the experience and the success of Germany.

Let us imagine a German university with two thousand students and three hundred professors. Let us suppose that as many more students from the last two years of the gymnasium were added to this number, with an equal number of teachers drawn from the same source, all in the same building, under the same discipline. It will be at once seen that Leipzig as we know it, the German university as we know it, would be at once rendered impossible. But exactly this condition holds to-day in Harvard, in Cornell, in Wisconsin, in Michigan, in California. To escape from it, to take up its own special function, and to leave the college to develop its own, is the next duty of the American university.

The Magic of Optimism.

Optimism is being coined into good money; it supports thousands of people industrially; it is employed as a therapeutic agency for which thousands of wonderful cures are claimed with apparent justice; it creates great religious sects; it has only recently stilled with its magic oil the troubled waters of one of our greatest financial panics; and, in short, it has become the principle of conscious or subconscious action for millions of human beings.

It is used as every other force, from steam to piety, has been used in America; it is put to work; it is made to be useful; it plays a part in the everyday life from—well, from the dining table to the church.

Scientists set themselves to demonstrate the value of cheerfulness, hope, courage, joy in such a material and matter-of-habit thing as eating and drinking for instance. Horace Fletcher, preaching the gospel of optimism in eating, secured hundreds of thousands of readers, and tens of thousands of devoted followers, from army generals and college professors and captains of industry and clergymen to laboring men and women.

Elmer Gates of Washington and Dr. Cannon of Harvard and Chittenden of Yale and Kellogg of Battle Creek prove by scores of experiments that worry interferes with digestion; fever-thoughts produce actual, tangible, analyzable poisons in the human system. The stomach will not execute or secrete the necessary digestive juices if your mind is worried, angry or gloomy.

During the financial panic—and at last checking it—far-sighted business men and newspaper editors, touched by the new spirit of optimism, set themselves against the tide of depression by determined efforts to make people in general see the strengthening and recuperative power of optimism—of faith and of courage. "Look on the bright side" became a text of many sermons, of editorials, of letters to the press, of button hole badges, of printed cards that hung by the thousands behind the desks of business men.

In other words, this new optimism, when tested by a condition, not by a mere theory, "made good"—the acid of reality showed it to be true metal and not pinchback. To use a helpful and forceful phrase of the vernacular, "it delivered the goods." It worked, in the pragmatic sense. And it is working right along among us everywhere in America to-day.

A more general recognition of the power of thought exists to-day than ever before. To think right means largely to live right. It is coming to be generally recognized by expert and layman alike, says Michael Williams in October Van Norden Magazine, that man has power within himself to govern his conditions and plane in life; that every person can develop this power by his own will; that optimism—the power of courageous, hopeful belief, as opposed to fear, anger or worry—is the instrument by use of which the will of any person can develop the power to govern his conditions.

A Child's Etiquette.

Shortly after the removal to the suburbs of the household in which Claire, aged four, is the controlling spirit, she was taken ill, says the New York Times. The nearest physician was called in. After her mother had explained what she thought was wrong, questions were directed to the little lady herself. In contrast to her usual display of volubility, Claire became extremely noncommittal.

"Does your head ache, little one?"

"No-o."

"Is the pain there?" asked the doctor, softly, pointing to the patient's stomach.

"No," very emphatic.

"Are you cold?" and the professional hand sought the pulse.

No answer, simply a tolerance of conditions that gave him the right to touch her.

"Now, please tell me just where you don't feel quite right," coaxed the doctor.

Dead silence.

"Precious, tell the doctor where you feel sick," coaxed the mother.

"I don't feel sick anywhere—not now."

The man of medicine gave directions, wrote prescriptions, and went his way.

"Why, Claire!" the mother reproached. "You've acted very badly. Mother never knew her little girl to be so rude. The doctor came to help you get strong so you can run and play. Aren't you sorry to displease mother? You always told Dr. Regan how you felt."

"Mother, I'm sorry, but not much. It's this way: Dr. Regan always comes in his carriage and his horse stands at the door. This doctor—with a note of contempt—"just sneaks in with a little black bag—and all the other children will think we've got just a common doctor."

A Religious Difficulty.

A Scotchman who is a prominent member of a church in Glasgow one Sunday recently put by mistake into the collection plate a piece of silver instead of a penny, says the New York Tribune.

On returning home he discovered the serious blunder. He spent the afternoon in considering the matter and talking it over with his wife.

"Ye see," he said to her in explanation of his loss, "I might stay awa' for twenty-nine Sabwaths to mak' it up, but then I wad be payin' seat rent an' gettin' nawthin' for't. I'm thinkin, lassie, this maun be w'at the meenister ca's a religious defecuity."

Rich and Foolish Father.

Arthur Stringer, the well-known poet and novelist, was talking at a dinner in New York about the poor sale that modern verse has.

"Yes," said Mr. Stringer, "there is very little demand for poetry in the twentieth century. I recall a conversation about a friend of mine.

"My friend is a minor poet. Two men were discussing him. The first said:

"By the way, I understand that his wife helped him to get out 'Pale Hands,' his volume of verse. I didn't know she was literary, did you?"

"She isn't literary," said the second man. "What she did was to persuade her father to stand the expense of publication."—Exchange.

POLITICAL TABLE : : : : TALK : : : :

Whether or not the "organization," which it is assumed will dominate the coming Legislature, will permit the enactment in good faith of direct primary legislation is a subject which has been the occasion of not a little quiet discussion among politicians. That direct primaries are not good for organizations is the universal belief, and experience in Minnesota, Kansas, Oregon and Washington tends to confirm it. Why, then, it is asked, should the organization which has prospered so much in California under the old order of things tempt its fate by enacting a law likely to prove its undoing? Is it not more probable that, on some pretense, the direct primary bill will be smothered to death, or perhaps passed in such form that it will be useless for the purpose for which desired?

This might raise the other question why the organization ever permitted the Republican party to be so strongly pledged on the subject that it cannot ignore or violate the pledge without being guilty of one of the worst stultifications which a party ever committed. The latter is, indeed, the harder question of the two and cannot be answered except by saying (and it is true) that it is characteristic of politicians of the machine order to look forward only to the one election which is nearest and to be willing to promise anything that will help to win that one for them. This habit of mind sufficiently explains why the "organization" was so careless at Santa Cruz as to allow a direct primary plank to be inserted in the party platform, for certain it is that there was not a politician there who had the smallest use for a direct nominating law or anything akin to it.

This brings to mind a bit of convention history not generally known. It is that Abe Ruef was the man who took the direct primary plank in to the resolutions committee at Santa Cruz and secured its adoption, and he did it because his bluff was called by a friend to the direct primary idea who forced the issue upon him. Although the Herrin forces had financed Ruef's campaign in San Francisco in the sum of $14,000, and fully expected him to throw his following to Mr. Harriman's candidate for governor at the critical moment, Ruef was looked upon as of so slippery a character that nothing could be depended upon for certain until his delegations had been counted. Therefore the Herrin combination was paying all sorts of court to Ruef and his following. Knowing this, Ruef declared to an outside friend, one of the best in the political life of the State, that he (Ruef) could get anything he wanted into the party platform. The person addressed said: "We'll just see whether you can or not. I'll call that bluff." Taking a scrap of paper from his notebook he hastily wrote the direct primary plank as it appeared in the platform of the party, handed it to Ruef, and bantered him to go into the committee rooms and offer it for adoption. Ruef took the resolution to the committee, made a short argument for it, secured its adoption with little difficulty and came back triumphant. This shows by what a simple process a party of great moral ideas may be started on the right track.

Notwithstanding the fact that no "organization" politician can have any use for a direct primary law it does not seem probable that the organization managers will dare to go against the enactment of a direct primary law of some sort. All that they say in public is that they consider it necessary to make the concession. Two courses are open to them: One is to pass a law that will be so full of faults as to be inoperative and lead to a revulsion of public feeling against any direct nominating law at all. The other is to make a virtue of the necessity and enact as good a direct primary law as possible and then claim all credit for it. If the "organization" will adopt the second policy they may wrap themselves in the robes of self-praise until they are as snug as the traditional bug-in-a-rug and no one will seek to disturb them in their serenity. But when that time comes luscious rags will no longer be the dearest find in the markets of California. The thistles of the San Joaquin will yield figs in such abundance that they will be cheaper than carrots.

The Ruef Case, and Others.

On the 25th of November Andrew M. Wilson, formerly State Railroad Commissioner and one of the San Francisco supervisors at the time of the boodling operations, took the stand as a witness for the prosecution in the Ruef case. He swore that Ruef and the supervisors-elect held various caucuses before the latter were installed in office, Ruef acting as advisor and counsellor. Later he (Wilson) was paid $500 by Supervisor Gallagher as his share of the right-trust bribe, Gallagher assuring him at the time that the money came from Ruef. Still later, according to his testimony, Ruef endeavored to get him to act as his "go-between" with the board, but Wilson was after the railroad commissioners and refused to accept the proposition. He told of seeing Henry Ach in Ruef's office, while Judge Conlan was awaiting an audience with Ruef. He swore that after Ruef was indicted he (Ruef) asked the financial assistance of the supervisors, but they denied it. Wilson also testified that he had received $5,000 from Theodore V. Halsey as a bribe in behalf of the Pacific States Telephone Company. He left the stand on December first.

As a link in the chain of evidence, Frank A. Leach, director of the United States Mint, swore that he received instructions from the United States Treasurer to credit Patrick Calhoun, president of the United Railways Company, with $200,000, which he paid, under instructions, to Tiry L. Ford.

The imposition of a sentence on E. A. S. Blake for attempting to bribe a prospective juror in the Ruef case was continued last Friday.

Castro, Enigma.

President Castro, of Venezuela, en route to France, has strewn his path with political pardons and amnesty to political refugees after the manner of barbaric kings. Ostensibly he is in search of a surgical specialist to treat an obscure malady from which he claims to be suffering, but it has been suggested that he has reaped a rich harvest from his years of tumultuous labor in the field of Venezuela politics, and that, in common with many other ephemeral Latin-American dictators, he will retire to an old age of ease and magnificence on the continent. Of obscure origin, every chapter of Castro's career has been veiled in equal obscurity, and no surmise about him seems too strange to be credible. As the New York Sun inquires, who knows anything about Castro, anyway? We should be glad to hear the question answered.

THE PLAY OF THE : : : : WEEK : : : :

"Paid In Full."

An audience expectant of great things greeted the performance in San Francisco of this work by the new American writer, Mr. Eugene Walter. The play comes to us by means of a road-company, one of many, I understand, that are gathering profit in the wider field from the proclaimed success of the play in New York and Chicago.

The first performance at the Van Ness Theatre on Monday night, was awaited with some eagerness by those who hope for an assurance that the stage is to become, once more, a vital element in American culture.

"Paid in Full" is an interesting play; of that there is no question.

Mr. Walter has studied his Ibsen and applied the methods to a recurrent problem of American life. That problem is the relation of a wife to her husband, under the stress of poverty; under the heavier stress of an illegitimately obtained prosperity; and in the face of the moral disintegration of the man.

The story is briefly this: Joseph Brooks, married to Emma Harris, is the collector for the Latin-American Steamship Co., whose president, Captain Williams, has been the partner of Emma's father, as he is now the employer of Emma's husband. Brooks' hatred of Williams is bred of his intolerance of capitalistic injustice and is fostered in the irritation that follows upon the palpable inadequacy of $18.00 per week to maintain two human beings of decent ideals and tastes, in selfrespecting independence. Emma's dislike and distrust of Williams goes back to that earlier period when she believes that Williams crushed her father into failure.

The first act is capital. The stuffy flat in Harlem after a sweltering July day in New York. The husband, worn to the last shred of nervous endurance, is doing his share in the tidying up after a dinner the close odors of which seem to reach one across the footlights. It is a merciless picture—the open door showing the disorder of the little parlor, which the janitor has been persuaded to repair; the efforts at taste in the furniture, that one knows was purchased on the installment plan; and in and out of the confusion moves the tired young man in the gingham apron, venting his rage upon an imbecile patent carpet-sweeper that gets back at him as only the patented sweeper with a reversible handle can get back at the novice.

From the clatter of dish-washing issues the voice of Emma in gentle admonition to the raucous complainings of her husband. Now these principal actors—the impersonators of the man and woman—in the play, are so of the low average of our players that it is difficult to properly judge the values of this act which yet are solid enough to survive and convince one.

Enter, to these two, with the ruin of their happiness imminent above them—"Jimsie," the cheerful friend, and later Captain Williams and the superfluous female relations of Emma—mother and sister. To all of these Brooks makes display of his bad temper, even coming to threaten Williams. Brooks flings out of the room and Williams, for the sake of Emma, magnanimously puts by the offense and consents that Brooks shall still continue his service to the corporation at $18 per week, and under his own immediate and personal oppression.

The act closes with Jimsie's invitation to the unhappy pair to accompany him to the theatre; whereupon Joseph turns upon him and defines the fact that Emma is his wife and that he can take her to the theatre himself. Brooks proceeds to appropriate certain monies which he has with him, belonging to his employer, in order to afford Emma an evening of gaiety, and, prudently turning off the lights in the red-tissue shades, they go out together—to what gaiety we can, oh so pitifully! picture.

The next act shows Emma established in a New York hotel—"the limit of elegance"—her superfluous mother would name it, and Emma is beautifully gowned and says: "This is living again."

From this moment the truthfulness of the first act is steadily diminished.

Joe has told her that this opulence is justified by a raise of salary and six months' back pay, and on so slim a justification they have splurged. There never was such a woman as Emma! After years of a punctilious attention to household accounts, she now dresses in white satin and doesn't think of expense but just "lives again." Having mothered a disagreeable husband for the long term of marriage, she now only perceives that he is still somewhat nervous, while the least observant in the audience must see him doing his best to show that he is a physical and moral wreck. Emma, you see, who was a cheerful, practical American woman, in the flat in Harlem in July, has become by mid-September in the New York hotel, a beautiful lie (which is surely a slander upon the consecutive good sense of the American type she is meant to portray). "Jimsie" comes back from South America and tells Joe that the Captain has discovered his defalcations and has already stationed detectives in the hotel, for his arrest in the morning. Joe communicates this fact to Emma and appeals to her protective care for him; urges her to go alone to Williams' apartment (though it is close upon midnight) and "fix it up with him," and while he telephones to Williams, she gathers the full influence of such an appointment—and—she goes!

The third opens with Williams at the telephone, his barbaric room hung with the trophies of his unspeakable adventures in his earlier career as a trader upon the seas. When Emma comes (very pale, still in white satin), it is of that same career that he speaks. He doesn't for a moment spare her his jovial compassion, and he puts her womanhood to the full test by a frankness of speech and intention distinctly unpleasant. She stands that test, and a tense situation is concluded by his handing her the paper which he had written before her coming and, with honorable words, releases her husband and receipts the sum of his defalcation as "Paid in Full." "Jimsie" comes in to witness the establishment of a friendship, based upon the purity of a woman and the triumph of the nobler part of a coarse man; than which nothing is finer to bear witness to as the audience attested.

The fourth act is frankly "Cats victuals." Enough to say that Emma, quite unnecessarily goes back, and sitting gracefully under the light of a piano lamp, very languidly, very nobly, tells Joe what she really thinks of him and then, in her beautiful clothes, goes home to Mamma.

This is an unfair synopsis of a play that is powerful in effect and yet sums up as disagreeably as any performance I can recall having sat through.

What brings in the element of discomfort in this play? I believe it is the result of the admixture of truth and falsity.

The first act is as beautiful as Ibsen; as is Howells' "Modern Instance." But it is also the first time that we have seen American life disclosed under the Ibsen method. The unhappiness of middle-class lives so exposed; comes close enough to touch the quick of our memories; for most of us have suffered the irritation of just this same struggle with poverty, and yet we know that there were mitigations, rewards, at every turn, that took the poison out of poverty. Emma, in the author's conception, was to have embodied these mitigations and rewards, and he was not beyond his right in showing, in her husband, a special instance of the breakdown of nerves, of courage, of moral fibre, under the strain. His choice of the flat in Harlem; of the stifling July night; these attest the clarity of his first intention, since they are true.

With the second act, enters the untruth. I suspect Mr. Walter is too clever to be wholly truthful. He knows too well the value of the accepted emotional conventions and contrasts that make a play commercially acceptable, and he sacrifices the integrity of his first conception—sacrifices his Emma of the first act—to make of her a theatric puppet who will bring the play down to the unthoughtful audience of the commercial theatre.

He is too clever in construction to make a poor play, but his cleverness finally overwhelms his truth. Once, late in the play, he recovers it (and I hear the logical Ibsenist cry out against me). It is at that moment when Williams renounces his gross intention of beating down the last barrier of Emma's defense. That would have been, perhaps, illogical in a European dramatist, dealing with European society, but Mr. Walter perceived truthfully that what might seem illogical to people of an older civilization was true to the American sense of things; true to that rough American chivalry that is not yet spoiled by the march of materialism against our earlier, simpler ideals.

Harvard's Monument to the Living.

Harvard alumni are raising a fund to provide for President Eliot and his wife after the president's retirement next spring. This is a practical expression of a gratitude earned many times over, and loses none of its graciousness by being in the form of a gift of money. It is in pleasing contrast, too, with our American habit of compelling our best citizens to retire from self-sacrificing public service into a struggle for a livelihood, and of reserving our praise for their epitaphs.

President Eliot's position in American education is unique. To have raised Harvard College to be the ranking American university is glory enough for one man to be able to claim as his own. To this, however, President Eliot has added the distinction of being one of the most influential personalities in American life. His words have the authority of Scripture, almost, with a vast body of Harvard alumni upon whom his character has impressed itself, and this, too, in spite of a temperament that shudders at the thought of mere popularity. Altogether, he is one of America's great men, and his memory will bulk larger with the years. In the meantime, it is well that he shall not have cause to reflect upon public ingratitude. The Harvard alumni have set a worthy example.

R. J. MACHEN, 654-656 MARKET STREET
OPP. PALACE HOTEL SAN FRANCISCO

Supported on the shoulders of four stalwart men, swaying high above the heads of the anxious crowd, the little Virgin approached the church. From a distance, under the pale, light trees, in a tremble of pure color, her uplifted radiance seemed always the central point on which the sun shone in a blaze and sparkle of jewels and flowers. The dim flames of the candles, the white dresses of children and young girls, the encrusted gold in the chasubles of the priests—all were subordinate to the concentrated brilliance of that slender, moving, crowned figure, dominant in its air of triumph, of delicate gaiety.

Leading the procession came two old men grey, wrinkled and bent, clad in fantastic garments like Greek shepherds and blowing on their slender pipes weird strains, barbaric and melancholy. Distending their cheeks in a final effort they emerged from under the green twilight of the trees and passed across the square. Long before they had reached the Pardo, the summer-palace of the king, the wild music, shrill and penetrating, had stirred the dormant emotions of the crowd, made up in picturesque confusion, in the sombre, deep coloring of strong yellows and blacks and vivid whites—of peasants and bull-fighters, of tourists from Madrid, of soldiers and water-carriers. Women, too, were there in numbers—the young and the old—under black shawls, under gaudy kerchiefs, under the transparent shadow of lace mantillas.

Overhead the sky was swept with clouds, tattered banners of blue flying before the drifting splendor of blowing rose and grey. Against it the great church loomed dark, the wide doors open, and in the rich gloom of the interior the candles gleamed like yellow lilies among the altar, the windows shone in jeweled radiance.

Rosario Escobar stood close to the foot of the stone steps, a rigid figure of tense expectancy; his face set, his black eyes roving ceaselessly, his lips fixed in a grim smile. To ease his anguish of impatience he kept the fingers of one hand tight locked around the treasure in his belt. Stealthily searching the faces around him he tried to discover whether there existed a determination as fierce, a desire as passionate as his own. Who, rather than he, he brooded, should buy the right to carry into the church the precious burden that approached so rapidly, swaying lightly, all a-glitter? Had it not been for her—fervently he crossed himself—Blessed Virgin of Rosario, that with her last breath, his dying mother had named him—though a boy? Her day of triumph was also his own; who was more thrilled than he at the sense of her nearness, of her high intercession in his affairs? Was it not by the grace of her favor that he had prospered, unique in his good fortune, in his miraculous preservation from harm? And now that for one savage moment, in a blind lust for vengeance, he had crucified himself—who, more than he, needed absolution for his sins? A groan escaped him but instantly he covered it with a laugh and then a shout, grinning and nodding in reply to astonished glances and low murmurs of disapproval. He was furious at his own lack of caution, it was most necessary for him to go unnoticed and already he had attracted attention. A tourist from Madrid, spending an idle afternoon at the Pardo, turned his camera upon the scene and, to avoid its large, gleaming eye, Rosario ducked, his swarthy face suffused with color.

Nearer and nearer came the sound of the high, shrill piping and, like a winding wreath of roses, children and young girls carrying tall, lighted candles, passed between the massed crowds that parted as they approached. A thin haze of smoke hovered over them like a veil tossed back from the blowing flames.

Rosario held his place doggedly against the pressure around him. Three women in black had gained a similar position on the opposite side but Rosario, blind with suspense, strained his eyes only for the first glimpse of the smiling Virgin, his lips moving in prayer, his glance one of despairing exhortation. The horror that had possessed his soul for days, sleeping or waking, had given place, for a moment, to a keen excitement. It was not for himself he had feared, he knew no dread, either of discovery or of the swift vengeance of the law. Alive, he had scorned his enemy—but dead—alas, he had himself armed him with invisible weapons, with a terrible, inscrutable power! His own strength, expressed in the last violence, had flattered his pride, barbaric, stern, invincible—but now the sinister spirits that brooded over the unmarked grave had cast their shadow upon him and from that huge, enveloping darkness he knew there was but this one hope of escape. It was absolution for his sin that he craved, through the intercession pledged to him with his first breath, by his Lady of Rosario. With the privilege of carrying her into the church this absolution would be granted, without further penance than he would suffer in the deprivations that the great cost of it would force upon him and upon his family.

Knowing full well that he had before him a long day's journey for man and beast he had wasted no time in repentance, vouchsafed no explanations for his absence. Before creeping out of his hut he had paused only for one instant, to make the sign of the cross over his sleeping wife and his little sons. Haggardly he had regarded their peaceful faces; could the angry spirits strike at him through their innocence? Bitterly now he regretted his refusal to share, even with his own children, his unique distinction. He had left them exposed, he had called them only Dagon and Florito in jealousy of that divine protection for which he knew his mother had so gladly surrendered her life.

In silence he had ridden forth, in the chill October twilight that precedes the dawn, erect, dark, compact, man and beast looming up in the mysterious shadowland of tall trunks and interlacing branches, like a monument in a dim church. He had emerged from the thick shelter of the trees into the deepening light of the morning—the towering Sierras dwarfing him to a mere grey spot, moving on the pine-covered precipitous mountain side. Quail and woodcock had risen before him, in the rough bridle-path, but he had heeded them no more than if they had been gnats. With his eyes fixed on the horizon he had ridden hard, straight into the blinding glare of the sunrise over the naked plains, that stretched endlessly before him, tawny, arid, treeless. The dust had risen in clouds and lay white and thick on his great saddle-bags, on his folded cape; now and then he had rubbed it with his elbows from his inflamed eyes.

His destination in sight, he had stopped at a wayside cantina, a mere hut of reeds, and, stabling his ass with his own hands, he had begged permission to change his begrimed clothes for the heavy sombrero, the embroidered shirt, and the short, braided coat of rest and feast days. Without breaking his fast, he had paid contemptuously for the glass of wine that he had not touched. The consciousness of the unusual distinction that had been his from his cradle had given him a superior bearing, an air of proud gravity that challenged attention. The woman who served him noted with dumb admiration the clear pallor of his face under the intense black of his hair. She was a handsome creature, of a rough, neglected beauty; the careless knot of her hair disguised its abundance. Her bare neck and arms were superb and the rags that covered her, faded red and brown, were like autumn leaves clinging to a gleaming statue in a deserted garden. She moved like an animal and her magnificent young cubs—half naked, wholly savage, showing shining eyes and teeth in faces of bronze—tumbled, playing and quarrelling around her.

Rosario had neither seen nor heard them. His imagination was peopled with strange figures—formless, impassioned images, that moved only to threaten, with the terrible simplicity of the antique.

Once arrived in the square, his rude, formidable purpose had forced him through the crowds, to the very foot of the stone steps, where he had not had long to wait for the supreme moment. As the bearers bent their backs before him and carefully set the poles of the baldachin on the ground, Rosario bent too, making the sign of the cross, daring only then to lift his glance to the delicately carved, slightly-begrimed face of the little Virgin. A ray of sunlight, falling into her eyes, glistened on a drop of varnish and gave the liquid semblance of a tear. Rosario felt his throat contract with uncontrollable emotion; he would have liked to fall upon his knees. She grieved for him, his sin had touched her pride in her child. Even at that moment he could not repent; he made mute protestations, it had not been his choice to kill, he had been but the grim instrument of justice. If she would but quench the fires that burned in his breast; still the voices that mocked in his ears; crush the winged, noiseless creatures of the grave to whom his deed had given life and power!

The crowd pressed closer; made way for a woman in a black shawl, her child at her breast, who rose two steps above him and leaned against the broad pillars. She seemed to Rosario of great size, of massive proportions, sharply defined against the stone wall of the church. In a flash of insight he wondered whether this might not be the living personification of the Madonna. In his mind she became confused with the little wooden figure, splendid in rich robes, scolding under her gold-bedecked crown. A loud, peremptory voice startled him to instant attention.

"How much is offered for the position in front to the right?" There was a moment's silence. Rosario held his breath, waiting. At last a woman's voice, high and plaintive, broke the stillness. "Three pesetas!" she sighed.

Another bearer raised the question: "How much is offered for the position in front to the left?"

After a pause a man stepped forward, nodding and smiling. "Two pesetas," he declared, with a pretense of jocular indifference. "How much is offered for this position behind to the right?" queried the old man who held it.

"—is offered for this position behind to the left," eagerly interpolated the fourth bearer before the reply to the previous question had been heard.

With set lips Rosario listened while the monotonous voices reiterated their calls. At the third round he could contain his impatience no longer. "Ten pesetas," he venturously and loudly, and then looked about him with an air of frowning defiance that he again covered with his uneasy grin, but the attention of the crowd was now absorbed in the contest. Rosario lay doggedly, his tones harsh, but sometimes he failed to hear the voice that so gently, obstinately oppressed him. Once, in an agony of terror, he had even feared they would pronounce the competition closed and, shaking with passion, he no longer awaited the end of the long sentence but interrupted it with his cries: "Fifteen, sixteen, twenty puestas."

The paper flowers that adorned the little Madonna stirred in the light breeze, the lengthening shadows flickered across the round brow that shone in a kind of high serenity above the fixed appeal of the thin, pale smile. Rosario was pierced by its pathos, by its sharp accusation and reproach. He swallowed a sob in his throat and, his eyes unswerving, whispered: "Twenty-five puestas" in a voice so low that it almost escaped the ear of the vigilant bearer in front. For an instant the bid hung in the air, but "Twenty-six" came from somewhere, and "Thirty" groaned Rosario, trying with hot glances to discover the source of this soft, determined rivalry.

The priests stood silent as statues, in the white and gold of their robes; their faces fixed and immovable as that of the little Virgin above them.

The position in the back to the left was the first to be disposed of; a picador from the bull-ring, with a savage, dissipated face, took up his triumphant position, his strong fingers clenched around the pole of the baldachin. The position in front to the left was secured in the same instant as the one behind to the right, for the bidder for the more important place surrendered it for the certainty of the humbler one in the rear and both men sprang to claim their own, with loud exultant laughter.

Rosario now became the central figure in a knot of men, every eye fixed upon him; his own still seeking in anguish for the rival standing near the coveted position, screened from his sight by the burly form of the bearer.

Slowly, from thirty to forty puestas, the hotly-contested privilege rose in value. Rosario's face gleamed white, his brow was beaded with the sweat of fear. He knew, to the last copper, the sum in that hard lump one hand clutched in his belt. His imploring glance besought once more the painted face that showed so small under the flowers; the light was fading, there were no longer tears in the wide eyes, they stared dully, impassively.

"Forty-five puestas is offered for the position in front to the right," called the harsh voice of the bearer impatiently. "Fifty puestas" gasped Rosario with the desperation of a gambler who stakes his all on a final throw.

The old priest standing near him made a faint sign and instantly the end of the contest was proclaimed. With a suppressed shout Rosario sprang forward but the powerful hand of the bearer thrust him roughly aside, and a woman, her black veil thrown back from a countenance pale with ecstasy, slipped between them and clasped the pole with her arms, her cheek pressed against it.

"Signora," cried Rosario, "it is I who have won, it is I who offered the fifty puestas!"

"The Signora said fifty-two," growled the bearer. "Here, stand back, hombre. Out of the way in front!" A voice in the crowd laughed out that the women always have the best of it; this was a clear case of favor. Rosario, however, hurled himself forward as if he would acquire, by main force, the privilege denied him, but, as he glanced up, in an anguish of protest at the little Virgin, the dispassionate serenity of her smile had changed, he was transfixed by its mockery and disdain. His own face became distorted; the secret dread that so tormented him settled into the conviction that he was lost—lost absolutely; abandoned, without pity, to the doom that lurked for him in the shadow or in the sunlight, in sound or in silence, behind every trembling leaf. He shivered with impotent rage and despair. As the procession moved he saw the little Madonna sway up the steps, following her with burning eyes, as she hovered over the heads of the crowd in the church, shining faintly with her back turned to him, till, finally, the last gleam of her jewels was lost in the radiance of the flaming altar. The deep notes of the organ broke upon the sombre silence and the great doors closed. Instantly the musicians struck up a gay refrain, dance music of the wildest, and, piping shrilly, marched down the street, followed by the singing, shouting populace, who, relieved from the strong tension, walking interlaced, by twos and threes, began to dance even before they had reached the marketplace, where already, in the waning light, a crowd of moving figures surged in blurred and indistinguishable masses of dark color against the dim white walls of the houses.

A young girl approached Rosario, still standing motionless before the church. Her bold, inquisitive glance regarded him with favor.

"Dance with me, dark my lord?" she ventured to urge, and put her laughing face close to his.

He thrust her aside with violence and strode away, his sombrero pulled over his eyes. Walking swiftly he soon gained the fields and the open road, at this hour silent and deserted. The flaming sun sank slowly behind the hills and the penetrating chilliness of evening lay over the vast, treeless plain. Before he had regained the cantina the short twilight had ended and the low building rose black against an ashen sky. The woman who had served him in the morning stood in the lamplight shadow of the overhanging roof. She greeted him with the persuasive softness of the Andalusian voice, but he shook his head for sole reply.

She watched his quick movements in silence, vaguely disturbed.

Having mounted at last, he threw her a coin.

"¡Vaya con Dios!" she called to him wistfully. Rosario turned upon her, for an instant, a wild and desperate face, then, striking his knees against the sides of his patient animal, with his long cudgel, like a lance, under his arm, he rode forward into the vast, enveloping gloom.

The woman remained for a long moment motionless at her open door, then, moving reluctantly, closed it with a sigh that the wind seemed to echo, filling the deep, moonless hollows of the hills with plaintive sounds like the sighs of all the lost creatures wandering in darkness.

The Test of a Failure.

Physical experts are not in favor with the top-floor girl. Recently she attended a lecture delivered by one of the red-turbaned variety, whose text was the unerring accuracy with which the truly emancipated could detect the approach of a person in whom the heart is centered. After the top-floor girl had had time to think that theory over she decided to put it to a test on Mr. Blakeslee. The top-floor girl was modest. She had never admitted outright, either to herself or to Mr. Blakeslee, that her heart was centered in him, but she was very fond of him, and she knew that if the plan would work with anybody it would with him.

She tried it last Wednesday. She had an engagement with Blakeslee for luncheon at a downtown restaurant. As usual, the meeting was St. Paul's. The top-floor girl was ahead of time, so she went into the church and sat down near the door.

"I shall not," she said, "keep bobbing my head around every few seconds this time as I usually do when looking for Fred. I shall depend upon psychic forces. I shall just sit here with my head bowed devoutly, and then when he comes in, my soul, if I truly love him, will tell me he is here. If it doesn't tell me, then I shall know I don't love him, and that we might as well call the deal off."

For many minutes the girl dug ridges in her forehead against the back of the pew in front of her. Many a footstep passed down the aisle, but none awakened in her heart the expected sense of affinity. Finally the girl looked up dispiritedly.

"It is no use," she said. "Fred and I are not twin souls. I have waited more than two hours. He has certainly been here, yet my heart did not tell me when he was near, neither did it tell him in what pew to look for me. We had better part."

The top-floor girl went around to a restaurant in Park Row and ordered a cup of coffee and cocoanut pie. Thus fortified, she called on Blakeslee.

"Fred," she said sadly, "I will detain you only a minute. I think it best to tell you right now that all is over. We are not mated and—"

"Oh, let up on that, please," interrupted Blakeslee. "I don't blame you for being huffy, but I couldn't help it. I had an old codger here from Binghamton, and I couldn't get away from him to save my life."

"Oh, dear," said the girl faintly. "Weren't you there at all?"

"Why, no. I thought that was what you were raising all that row about."

"No," she said. "It was something else. I think I'll stay downtown and have dinner with you, if you don't mind."—Exchange.

"Well," finally remarked Mr. Staylate, "I must be thinking of going. What time is it?"

"Oh," replied Miss Patience Gonne, "I'm sure it's later than that."—Philadelphia Press.

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

The Course of Liberty.

America is a new Europe. Europe was a new Asia. From the earliest dawn of the history of the Aryan race, to which Europeans and Americans mainly belong, to the present day and this western coast of the continent of North America there is hardly a link missing in the chain of events which binds us all to one family and one never wholly forgotten aspiration. As a family we have loved liberty and have ever sought to possess it. That love has been bred in the bone.

But this was not so of that Orientalism which grew up south of the Himalaya Mountains. Our progenitors hailed from north of those mountains and fought their ways westward in successive streams until they reached the eastern shores of the Pacific Ocean. Indeed there are those who now place the frontier of Aryan activity only a few hundred miles to the eastward of the western shore of the Pacific and who believe that it will soon encircle the earth, but as we cannot now know about that we shall not take it into account. Suffice it to say that the Orientalism that grew south of the Himalaya Mountains gravitated toward a benevolent despotism and through all the intervening ages has remained satisfied with it. If it ceased to be benevolent, and became wholly oppressive and cruel, in obedience to a never-failing tendency, the sword or the dagger effected a change from one despotism to another, with or without improvement as to benevolent quality, and so the history of the world rolled on. It was accepted as the will of fate, and the only thing humanly possible was to school one's self to endure without flinching whatever unreserved autocracy might be fated fit to bestow.

The great plain of Europe, connecting the Aegean with the Baltic, has, in the main, been the never-ceasing battle ground between Aryan aspiration and Oriental resignation, and there the conflict is still waging. It has resulted in the absurd amalgamation of types of mind essentially Oriental with Occidental aspirations. It is only within smelling distance of the North Sea and the Atlantic that the innate Aryan love of liberty has been able to work itself into institutional form, and even there it has had to fight foot to foot and hand to hand for liberty to live. The twenty miles of storm-swept water between Britannia and the continent of Europe aided the spirit of liberty to found the Common Law and write into constitutions the rights of man.

These liberty-born institutions were transported in "hearts of oak" across 3,000 miles of storm-swept water and set up behind that barrier against Orientalism to work out its perfect purpose, a government of, by and for the whole people. Even here, as stated last week, the Oriental taint has endured to plague us. Love of liberty has still to do battle with that tendency toward inertia of effort that prefers a reasonably benevolent despotism to the bother of attending to the duties of citizenship. This tendency is toward giving us the shadow without the substance of liberty. Our dictator-governed republics to the south are examples of what is left the people when the substance has gone and only the shadow of liberty remains, but our own corporation-ridden Republic dares gibe at them little because of their short-comings.

This has been a short and superficial review of the course of free government from its inception in the fertile but snow-laden plains north of the Himalaya Mountains to our own wave-washed Pacific shores, a course that has eaten up thousands of years in point of time and fed the thirsty earth more gallons of blood than the Sacramento, at a good stage of flow, pours gallons of water into San Francisco Bay in four-and-twenty-hours, but it may serve as a hint to the thoughtful youth of what has been the human cost of what he now enjoys much as a matter of course, even with more of the shadow and less of the substance of free liberty than should content our racial aspiration. Also this may supply a needful background for what is to follow.

Romantic Politics in France.

If promises are fulfilled and Mme. Steinheil is credibly connected with the death of President Faure of France, and with the agitation for revision of the Dreyfus case, there should be an appreciable decrease in the sale of Dumas' romances, for these entertaining fictions are no more replete with the elements of story—love, jealousy, intrigue, the treason of woman's beauty, and the tragic episodes of death—than this routine investigation by a police court in Paris. Fiction reads drab beside this flaming rainbow of fact. By comparison, American national politics are pale and commonplace. But unfortunately California—San Francisco, at least—alone of America, can rival the drama act by act, save that a sordid motive underlies the action here where possibly a chivalrous motive inspired the first of Mme. Steinheil's alleged crimes.

Do You Hear Well?

The Stolz Electrophone—A New, Electrical, Scientific and Practical Invention for those who are Deaf or Partially Deaf.

MAY NOW BE TESTED IN YOUR OWN HOME.

Deaf or partially deaf people now may make a trial of the Stolz Electrophone at home. This personal, practical test serves to prove that the device satisfies, with ease, every requirement of a perfect hearing device.

This new invention renders unnecessary such clumsy, unsightly and frequently harmful devices as trumpets, horns, tubes, ear drums, fans, etc. It is a tiny electric telephone that fits on the ear and which, the instant it is applied, magnifies the sound waves in such manner as to cause an astonishing increase in the clearness of all sounds. It overcomes the buzzing and roaring ear noises and, also, so constantly and electrically exercises the vital parts of the ear that, usually, the natural unaided hearing itself is gradually restored.

THE PLEDGE OF CITIZENSHIP

I, a citizen of the United States of America, realizing that a free Republic is an impossibility unless the citizen performs his civic duty, hereby pledge myself upon my sacred honor never to fail to exercise my right of citizenship by voting at every election, primary or secondary, wherever it is possible and legal for me to render that service to my country, my health permitting me so to do.

In taking this pledge it is distinctly understood that I in no way obligate myself to vote for any particular party, any definite candidate or any certain measure. I am binding myself only to my Country, and pledging myself solely to the faithful performance of the duty I owe to her as a citizen.

WHY TAKE THE FOREGOING PLEDGE?

Those taking the foregoing pledge, signing and sending it to this office, will be enrolled upon The California Weekly's "School for Citizenship," which will be a permanent feature of this paper. It will entitle the person sending in his name to have answered, either through the columns of the paper or by letter, any rational question he may ask concerning public affairs, and, generally, by the person best equipped to afford the desired information. It will also entitle the signer to such special literature bearing upon the obligations and opportunities of good citizenship as may from time to time be issued. While this pledge is open to persons of all ages it is especially desired that it be taken and sent in by young men lately become voters or who will cast their first votes two years hence. It will take but a moment to clip out the pledge, sign, enclose in an envelope, stamp and address to "School for Citizenship," office The California Weekly, 26 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, and it opens the way for a liberal education in citizenship.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Readers of The California Weekly will have seen (and we hope read) President Roosevelt's last annual message to Congress, printed in the daily newspapers. Space forbids a detailed synopsis of it, and the message is, moreover, unusually perfunctory in those concrete recommendations which lend themselves to synopsis. The importance of the message is in the general discussion, in which the most constructive statesman who has occupied the presidential chair in this generation delivers his valedictory to the judgment of history, and expounds his philosophy of government.

The significance of this philosophy is its recognition of the newness of modern conditions, and of the necessity of fundamentally reshaping our point of view to meet them. We have outgrown, economically, the individualism of our fathers. Therefore we must also outgrow it in our legal theories and personal prejudices. Production by associated effort has come to stay, on the sides both of capital and of labor. To ignore this fact, in anti-trust laws of labor decisions, is futile, and to attempt to undo it is foolish. But to allow the masters of this associated effort to control its powers in pure unregulated individualism would be fatal. Society, organized into government, has acquired a new duty to its fractions, organized into trusts and unions, just because they are organized, and because the organized force that must finally control is necessarily the organization that represents all the people and all interests—which is the government. So while individual liberty must be preserved the mere theoretical individualism, which preserves by legal decision the alleged liberty of the individual, for instance, to contract away his life and health in dangerous occupations implies simply a refusal to look modern facts in the face.

The President discusses separately the capitalist and the labor aspects of the problem. And, curiously, he emphasizes on the capital side the importance of National rather than State control, while on the labor side he explains the necessity of leaving much of the control to the States. The reason, of course, is obvious. Business is general; labor is local. Every big corporation does business in many States, and most railroads extend physically beyond State lines. Conflicting State regulations, under such conditions, mean confusion and injustice. Each laborer, on the other hand, lives in one place, and in only a few instances of railroad trainmen does his labor cover two States. The general government may, in these few instances, and in the District of Columbia where it has jurisdiction, set a model for State legislation, but most practical cases come under State jurisdiction alone. The exact reverse is the case in the regulation of the capitalist side of business.

History will probably regard this message as crystallizing the executive movement in our National evolution quite as much as the decisions of John Marshall embody the judicial movement. The fathers, borrowing from England a theory which time has since overthrown even there, fondly imagined that they could make the three departments of government co-ordinate, independent and equal. Actually some one department has always dominated. For a time it was Congress. John Marshall, having the final say at a critical time, established the supremacy of the judiciary, and we have ever since been ruled by our courts as no other nation is or ever was. Below the courts, the power of the executive has been at times supreme, at times subordinate. Legislatively, power has centered at times in the speaker of the House, at times in a coterie of veteran Senators. Now comes Roosevelt, at the close of an administration in which he has made his principle a fact, to justify theoretically the dominance of the executive, as really the most directly representative of the people, as well as the most practically efficient, and to urge the subordination of the judicial department even to the legislative. And in solemn truth, President Roosevelt is right, both theoretically and practically.

The message is a bold one. It defies without discrimination the Van Cleave, Parry and the Gompers point of view. Courting unpopularity in all quarters, it will doubtless achieve popularity as well as inspire conviction. On what President Roosevelt himself calls its philosophic side, it will rank easily as one of the great State documents of American history. In other respects it is, doubtless by intent, of subordinate importance.

The article in this issue of The California Weekly upon the rebuilding of San Francisco, written as it is by an engineer of high standing and known sincerity, should help to reassure persons living here and elsewhere as to the permanent character of the new city. "The earth hath bubbles as the water hath," and if one of these earth bubbles chances to burst under San Francisco, or any other city on the globe, the work of the hands of man is not likely to fare better than the earth itself but, barring such a calamity, little more likely to happen here than in New York, the new San Francisco should be as enduring as the pyramids of Egypt.

LET THE CHOICE BE FULL AND FREE.

It is announced that the persons who have committed to their charge the drafting of a bill to be presented to the coming legislature as a basis for a direct primary election law have taken the precaution to prevent the occurrence in California of such a condition of affairs as obtains in Oregon, where a Republican legislature stands pledged to elect a Democrat to the United States Senate.

To the mind of the politician no greater catastrophe could happen than that which has happened in Oregon, but is it so serious? The people of Oregon have found a man in whose integrity and intelligence they have confidence. They have honored him as far as they can without making the whole State Democratic, unless they can further honor him in this way. Is it good policy for the Republican politicians of Oregon to force the issue of making the men of Oregon choose between Chamberlain and the Republican party? The situation is unusual rather than critical.

In California many thousand Democrats recently voted for William H. Taft, a Republican, for president. In Oregon many thousand Republicans voted for Geo. E. Chamberlain, a Democrat, for United States Senator. What essential difference is there between the two situations? If the Constitution of the United States did not presuppose that the legislators of Oregon were to be so advised by their constituents how to vote for United States Senator neither did that constitution presuppose that the electoral college was to be instructed for whom to vote for President. In both cases the relation of the voter to the representative body is advisory, with the advantage that the advice is likely to be taken.

By what right does the Direct Primary League, in its primary bill, assume to make no provision whereby the men of California shall enjoy the same freedom of choice that the men of Oregon have enjoyed? If the men of California are to be permitted, under the law which our masters have promised to give us, to advise legislatures whom they prefer for Senators, why attach limitations to the advice that may be given? The case of Oregon does not warrant the placing of any such limitation upon manhood. No mistake has there been made. The men of Oregon knew whom they wanted for Senator and the only miscarriage possible is that of defeating the expressed purpose of the voters.

Let those who have the drafting of a direct primary law in hand be advised that nothing less than a full recognition of the right of direct nomination will suffice. Nothing short of a free field will comport with the dignity of free men. The convention system is to be discarded because it ceased to represent the wishes of the voters. A system of direct nomination, so devised as to fail in like manner and measure, is what is to be anticipated from "organization" sources. The people are afraid of it. They have reason to be, but from the Direct Primary League they have a right to expect better things. Yet any primary law that will

IMPENITENT AND OBDURATE.

A prison warden, who had been thirteen years in charge, stated that not once in all that time had he heard a word spoken by a prisoner who had taken life that gave evidence of contrition for having slain his adversary. Many had expressed the opinion that they had been punished enough, and all of them were sorry for themselves, but not one out of hundreds had expressed sorrow for the deed itself or remorse for the stains of blood upon his soul! Each still felt as he felt at the moment of the commission of the crime, that the other fellow "got no more than was coming to him," and his own act was justified by that fact.

Those under indictment in what is known as the San Francisco graft cases have generally held their peace so far as public utterances are concerned. The public has no direct means of ascertaining their state of mind, but if expressions employed by public journals known to be in sympathy with, or under control of, the accused men may be accepted as indicative of the state of mind of their principals then those gentlemen are not only impenitent but obdurate, and look upon themselves as victims of a persecution at once malevolent and gratuitous. If this be the true state of mind of the accused and their friends and sympathizers, then the most melancholy feature of the graft prosecution is not that so few persons have been found guilty of criminality by a jury of their peers, but that so few in their walk of life have been convinced of their own guilt and moved to penitential, not self-pitying, tears.

Somehow, through fire of criticism or strain of the powers of the law, these people must learn that which is right from that which is wrong. The man who feels that if, perchance, a public official stand in the way of his accomplishing an end he has much at heart, and cannot be gotten out of the way otherwise, then and in that case it is right and proper to buy him out of the way, has lost his moral bearings and only needs temptation to make him an enemy to social order.

There is evidence going to show that the attitude of the accused men and their friends toward the issue is that grafting has been a disagreeable necessity but a necessity of such pressing quality as to justify it. So long as men are in that frame of mind they have no claim upon clemency either from the law or from public opinion.

But how differently would the public feel toward the accused if it could know that they feel a genuine sorrow, not for themselves merely, but for their fault? What if the people could be made to know that these men, one and all, say in their hearts: We have sinned in the sight of heaven and before the faces of our fellow citizens, and from this day forth we will neither submit to blackmail nor seek to seduce any public official or private citizen from the path of rectitude in order that we may gain an end advantageous to ourselves or to those whom we represent!

Instead, if we are to judge from those persons and prints that assume to speak for them, the accused men are both impenitent and obdurate. They assume that the end they had in view—the making of money—justified the means employed in its acquisition. Their sorrow is for themselves. They are not ashamed for anything they have done, but only for the disgraceful position in which others have placed them, and toward those who have so placed them they entertain feelings of bitterest resentment. Impenitent and obdurate, the accused men are not claimants upon the magnanimity of the people of the State of California nor upon the leniency of the law.

RECLAIMING THE SACRAMENTO BASINS.

Eastern capital, furnished by a New York and Boston syndicate, has been enlisted to reclaim the American River basin. This means, in the first instance, the redemption from winter and spring floods, which now make cultivation impossible, of 55,000 fertile acres lying just north of the capital city of the State. But the undertaking means probably more than that, because, if it succeeds, other organizations of capital will be formed to attack the problem of reclaiming four other river basins—the Butte, the Sutter, the Colusa, and the Yolo—containing altogether half a million acres of land, which are capable of doubling the present agricultural production of the Sacramento Valley. Of the six basins bordering the chief river of the State,—four on the east side and two on the west—but one, the Sacramento, lying south of the city of that name, can be said to be reclaimed at this time, although the others are cultivable in spots.

Merely as an engineering problem the reclamation of these river basins is one of the greatest in the west and brings the powers of nature and man in combat face to face.

Heretofore reclamation has been attempted with the limited resources of the local land-owners, organized in levee districts, and it has succeeded only in exceptional instances and in rather small areas. In the last great river flood, that of 1907, crops were destroyed on no less than 300,000 acres of land. For the first time reclamation is now to be tried on a large scale, backed by millions of ready capital and by the best engineering skill money can buy. Under these conditions it may be possible to construct earthen dykes so powerful that not even the continued floods of five rivers pouring down into the basins can overwhelm them.

The dykes of Holland have for centuries held in check the waters of the ocean, and in late years the government of the United States has practically reclaimed the basins of the Mississippi River by building bank levees. These are the classic examples which go to prove that our California river basins may be reclaimed when the right means are adapted to the end.

But the doing of it is going to make the river problem acute. Under natural conditions the basins are safety valves for the river; when the flood comes it pours into the basins, which have an aggregate capacity sufficient to store a week's overflow, thus giving relief to the channel. How the channel can be made to carry the flood waters when they are shut out of the basins is the great problem. One would be inclined to say it is impossible of solution if it were not for the success of the United States engineers in dealing with the floods of the Mississippi, as already mentioned.

In 1904 a distinguished commission composed of three of these same engineers studied the Sacramento River and sketched a plan according to which, by an expenditure of some $25,000,000, the whole flood problem in the valley could be solved and all the basins reclaimed. But this commission, despite the eminence of its members, was working more or less in the dark, because of the inadequacy of the data it possessed. Since then the State of California and the United States have been working co-operatively to measure stream flows, so that when the flood of 1907 came along they were ready to take its dimensions. The result was a surprise. Where the commission of 1904 estimated a maximum flood discharge of 250,000 cubic feet per second, the gaugings of 1907 indicated a maximum of at least 500,000 cubic feet, showing the problem to be just twice as great as it was formerly supposed to be.

LOBBYING TO BE MADE REPUTABLE.

Lobbying bids fair to become respectable. The San Francisco Labor Council is to have a representative at Sacramento during the session, there is at least one movement under way for the establishment of a People's Lobby, in the general interest, the presidents of the normal schools have appointed one of their number to represent them in their necessary demands for exceptional appropriations this year, and other interests, including possibly the city of San Francisco and the State university, will be legitimately and publicly represented. The Commonwealth Club has pledged itself to promote certain legislation for the reform of criminal law, and is raising funds to maintain a permanent paid executive officer, who will doubtless also act as legislative agent during the session. The Bar Association may have other representatives, also promoting reform in judicial procedure. The Islais Creek interests will doubtless have a lobby, at least for a time, and there may be private corporations properly represented. There is, in fact, no reason why even the Southern Pacific should not be represented by an attorney to present its side of the case before the proper committees, in the event of proposed railroad legislation. The sort of lobbying the Southern Pacific has been doing is scandalous and criminal, but there is a legitimate way of lobbying, even for the railroad, and lobbying may be made a legitimate and laudable function of legislation. But it should be legitimately done. The best way to bring that about would be, perhaps, to recognize lobbying by law, to compel the registration of lobbyists and define their functions, and effectively suppress all unauthorized and illegitimate lobbying. The distinction is easy. It is as plain as the difference between the legitimate argument of an attorney before the Supreme Court and the illegitimate approach of a judge through private motives. But the law can only prevent the one by recognizing and regulating the other.

Let us not be too harsh in thought and speech toward those who, charged with the commission of crime, do all in their power to escape punishment, no matter how richly deserved. They are only obeying an impulse akin to the first law of nature, but what shall we say of those hired Hessians who, having solemnly sworn as officers of the court to uphold the law and aid in establishing justice, nevertheless use every artifice, even to that of stuffing jury lists and bribing jurors, that justice may be defeated? A purging of the bar of all those who get admitted to it that they may the more successfully and safely practice rascality would do as much as any other one thing toward rendering the establishment of justice more expeditious, certain and even handed.

There are those, not too friendly to the President, who venture the hope that, as President, Judge Taft will do as much good as Theodore Roosevelt has done while contenting himself with talking very much less. Perhaps so, but President Roosevelt has done little that counted for more than his talks to the American people. They have listened.

Among the things which, in the late campaign, were "beaten to a frazzle," as Ambassador Reid pointed out, in London, on Thanksgiving Day, was the superstition that the party in power when a panic comes is certain to be driven out of power by an irrational but vindictive voting constituency. American voters are not as likely to be overmastered with blind rage as many have supposed. Any lack of the power of a fine discrimination that may be imputed to them does not imply tendencies distinctly bovine.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

A WAY OPENED FOR GROWTH IN GRACE.

Bishop Williams of Omaha has been reading his women parishioners a lesson upon the irreligion of big hats and rustling silks in church. He has admonished them to wear small hats, hats that will not obscure the free vision of those sitting in the pew behind, frocks that do not too much rustle to the distraction of worshippers, and he has done these things, not to rebuke the vanity of women, but to deepen and enhance the spirit of worship during the service hour.

Heretofore this subject has been one for snarling criticism or press-humorous gibe, and these the women have resisted without the ruffling of a feather, but it is not impossible that Bishop Williams may have found the right avenue through which to usher in a much needed reform. The women are not to blame for the situation. It was not of their making. They do not set the styles any more than the men do. They follow the styles as the men do, but, however the fact came to be a fact, it is a fact that pastors in all our churches are forced, Sabbath after Sabbath, to preach to variegated pansy beds interspersed here and there with sullen, bald, protesting toadstools in no humor to listen to the still small voice. The whole situation is rebellious so far as a worshipful atmosphere is concerned. It is as impossible to bring one's offerings to the sanctuary in the right spirit while one is not reconciled with his sister as it is while estranged from his brother, and no man can sit in a spirit of reconciliation with a sister whose nodding plumes and broad expanse of straw shut off his vision of pulpit and choir.

Nor is an atmosphere of overdress, or dress unbefitting the environment, more conducive to a worshipful frame of mind among women than among men. It cannot be that any woman, not altogether lost in self, can sit through a religious service supporting a large hat without being conscious of trespassing upon the rights, or lessening the comfort, of whoever sits behind her, and no woman so sitting and so feeling can be in a frame of mind conducive to the act of worship.

With some women the feeling is of stolid defiance. Such a one knows full well what those behind her must be thinking, but she says to herself: Fashion decreed that I wear this and I will. She does, but no woman so sitting and thinking can say "Our Father," and not have the words sound hollow and hard even to her own ears. Others feel sorry for those behind them and out of patience with those ahead, rather impersonally it may be, but with sufficient definiteness to make theirs a perturbed spirit, and worshipping the Father in spirit and truth implies a calm mind and a soul at peace with all the world.

Whatever else may or may not be true with regard to communion of the individual soul with the Soul of the Universe, true of that closer walk with God for which many million lonely lives have longed, of this we may be certain, it is not possible with anything between, and who knows but the movement for modest dressing for church attendants inaugurated by Bishop Williams of Omaha may open a way for a genuine and general increase both in church attendance and in a profounder and more reverential spirit of worshipfulness in all the churches of America?

Caught in the Act.

The California Weekly has no desire to see the emoluments of its contemporaries ruthlessly curtailed. On the contrary it wishes them all godspeed when they do things that God would be justified in speeding them for, otherwise not. In another column we recite the bare facts relating to a sale of news space in the columns of the San Francisco Chronicle which should cause the blush of shame to mantle to the top of the Chronicle Building. The dereliction is self confessed and so unhesitatingly as to raise the presumption of its being a common practice in the Chronicle office. Mr. Heney has bitterly complained of the custom of selling news space in newspapers and has repeatedly charged the Chronicle with the pernicious practice, but it was hardly to be anticipated that the Chronicle would, of its own volition, thus plead guilty to the charge. Interested readers will find it worth while to procure copies of the Chronicle of November 24th and 25th that they may see for themselves just what was done and the way it was done. Than this there is no more pernicious practice in any newspaper office. The editorial columns of a paper are mainly filled with opinions, and whether opinions are purchased, hired or what not, is of secondary importance because they are only opinions after all, and likely to be of trifling importance, but news has the quality of evidence. As an intelligent jury finds its verdict from the testimony rather than from the arguments of attorneys, so an intelligent public makes up its mind from the news rather than from editorial expression. If the subject matter is primarily of private concern, then it has no place in news columns. If it be of public concern and is colorable for pay, it is on a parity with corrupting the fountains of justice by selling evidence to order. From whatever standpoint viewed the practice here complained of is indefensible and is to be remedied only by a public sentiment that will not tolerate a newspaper that resorts to it.

Punishment After Death.

West Virginia believes in punishment after death and is trying to make a practical application of that belief to the case of the late Senator Johnson N. Camden, who died after a long and successful career in tax-dodging. Like many another of his class the richer he grew the less he felt like paying his taxes ratably with his neighbors. To reach such cases the law-makers of West Virginia, apparently without the knowledge of Senator Elkins, possibly when the Senator was looking after the elusive d'Abruzzi, enacted that twenty per cent of the value of property not reported for assessment for five years preceding the death of the owner should be forfeited to the State. The State's attorney has figured out that, judged by this law, the Camden estate should forfeit to the commonwealth and common good $1,770,452.98 and he is proceeding to claim the forfeit. For the Camdens who are living no compassion need be felt though the State win the suit and recover the money, principal and interest. They will have left enough and to spare, but for the old Dives who has gone to the Dry Tortugas to learn that his soul-damning deceptions were as vain as unpatriotic, well, that does seem to be rubbing it in on the old man. If some multi-millionaire were sometime to manifest such a filling-full of the capacity for acquisition as would prompt him to give in all his property to be taxed, as the property of the middle-class man is taxed, we should hear less of social discontent than we now do. Even Carnegie is growing richer year by year despite his boasted benevolences.

Peanuts.

Governor Glenn of North Carolina has taken up the cudgel in defense of our sister States of the South once in rebellion. He declares that they must be given their just due for their many virtues and for the great service they perform for the common good. By way of sustaining his ultimatum to the American people he affirms that ninety-nine per cent of all the "goober peas" produced in this country are grown in the sandy bottoms of Old Dixie. Therefore when one hears the whistle of the peanut-stand on the corner let him reflect that were it not for the South there would be no such sound to cheer him on his way, no warm and rancid delicacy to munch while homeward bound, no way of preventing the olive growers of California becoming proudly opulent in their monopoly of salad oils. The position of Governor Glenn is impregnable. The South is worthy of being taken to the chill heart of the North to warm it into affection. The South does not, as many suppose, devote itself wholly to rearing Democrats and "pestering" the negro. It has given the world the peanut with all that the endearing term implies.

A Pitiful Instance of Imbecility.

The first State railroad commission was elected in November, 1879, and took office January 5, 1880, almost twenty-nine years ago, and now we are gravely informed that there is and has been, during all these years, no law in California for establishing justice between common carriers and those whom they serve. The public mind has dawdled over it, the press has driven upon it, legislatures have side-stepped the issue and only the political bureau of the Southern Pacific Company has had an intelligent idea in relation to it. That bureau has wanted no laws, has seen to it that no laws were enacted and that successive commissions were elected to draw their salaries, lay low and do nothing disagreeable.

Meantime the national government has asserted its power to control interstate commerce, to regulate common carriers, to insure reasonable rates of freights and fares and equality to shippers and passengers in services rendered them. It is worthy of note, too, that every forward step taken, whether in the direction of protecting the public or railroad operatives, has been taken at the cost of whipping the transportation companies out of their boots. They have conceded everything to superior force, nothing of consequence to justice or fairness.

So it will be in California. Discriminations will be practiced, the public safety disregarded and the powers of State government subverted to corporate ends just as long as they can be.

Roosevelt as a Socialist.

President Roosevelt is not a Socialist. He violently denies any such imputation himself, and has even threatened to write a book against Socialism. A cynical critic in a yellow journal has remarked that such a book might be almost as valuable as a primitive Patagonian treatise on wireless telegraphy, which may be more or less true. President Roosevelt, in the scholastic sense, is not a profound economic scholar, and he is perhaps the safer practical leader by reason of that fact. Even on the simpler matter of railway rate regulation, the author of the clause which President Roosevelt himself regards as the vital one in the whole law has been quoted as saying that he doubts if the president understands that clause yet. President Roosevelt is the type of man who gets practically right, without always mastering the theory. And President Roosevelt is doubtless right in regarding himself as an anti-Socialist, and in practically opposing Socialism, even though he might not shine in the academic disputation with the scholastic experts of Socialistic theory.

Nevertheless, on one side of his thought, President Roosevelt would be claimed by the school of Socialists as belonging to them. These are the Socialists who do not pretend to know what evolution is ultimately to bring forth, but believe in recognizing the progress of evolution away from the present economic system. They regard the wage system as a transition from the time when the laborer individually owned the tools of his own production, and personally sold or consumed the product of his labor, to the time when labor will collectively own the tools of production, and divide the product. President Roosevelt, taking his cue from Judge Grosscup's doctrine of the "peopleization" of industrial ownership, expressly recommends a step in just this direction in his message to Congress. He would not accomplish it by law, and he would probably not look forward to any ultimate identification of industry and government. He would, in fact, probably deny most of the conclusions of the very Socialists who would claim him. But he does accept, very positively, some of the positions on which they base those conclusions.

The League Will Hold the Balance.

It was possibly intentional good politics, and at any rate it is fortunate that the advisory committee of the Direct Primary League is composed of two Democrats and three "organization," or at least not radically anti-organization Republicans. The opposition to a thorough-going and genuine direct primary law will come, if anywhere, from the "organization." The effort to make the law radical and impractical will come, if anywhere, from the Democrats. The Lincoln-Roosevelt League Republicans can be trusted to support a good law, from any honest source.

A GLIMPSE OF THE WORLD AT LARGE

A meeting of British manufacturers was held December 2nd to take action to protect British commercial interests in connection with the revision of the tariff by the present American Congress.

Herr Richard Calwer, an authority on social questions, declares that there are nearly 500,000 workmen in Germany out of employment, and that working hours have been generally reduced.

Lau Sz Kiv, an imperial investigator appointed by the Chinese government, recently declared that "in ten years there will not be a Chinaman left in the United States or Canada." A syndicate of Chinese merchant princes has been formed to build railroads and steamships, to develop mines, to farm, and to engage in banking and general business, and this syndicate is persuading Chinamen trained by their experience in America to come back to China to enter its service.

Mutiny in India threatens the British with deepening blackness. Activities significant of unrest are everywhere, and especially pregnant is the growing spirit of insoulation upon the part of native servants toward English masters. Attempts at assassination and street mobs are more acute symptoms of the situation. The English are arming their wives and preparing places of refuge for their women and children. At this distance it appears that Britain, having educated the natives, has let in the light of progress upon them with the result that its few rays have bred a desire for the full sun of liberty.

The eleventh annual session of the American Mining Congress opened in Carnegie Music Hall in Pittsburgh, Pa., on December 2nd. Representatives of mining interests of practically every State in the Union were present.

An international monetary conference will be held in Holland in 1909, at which the feasibility of issuing coins current in many lands will be one of the subjects discussed. The convenience to travelers and the advantages to commerce of such a coinage seem obvious, but three efforts (dating back to 1867) to engage the governments of Europe and America in such an undertaking have failed.

The Porto Ricans are complaining somewhat of the conditions in the island under American rule. Though they are loyal to the United States and would vote against secession, they want the right to vote and to have some representation in their government. They are in the anomalous condition of being citizens of Porto Rico, which has no standing as a government, but not citizens of the United States which has taken the place of the Porto Rican government. Practically, this means that they cannot claim the protection of any recognized government in case they travel abroad and become involved in troubles with foreign officials. They claim also that the coeducational school system introduced by the Americans is a failure and should be changed.

The island is, however, in prosperous condition and the natives are hopeful of the future.

Richard Croker, ex-boss of Tammany, spent ten days in New York recently, revisiting old scenes and meeting old friends. He was urged repeatedly to re-enter politics in the city, but to all such appeals he replied that he was too old, and that he had full faith in Murphy's ability to swing New York's vote for the Democratic candidate next fall. Many prominent Democrats do not share this confidence, and there is much talk of a possible Republican victory in the approaching majority contest.

On January 1st the two-cent postage rate goes into effect between Germany and the United States. In this connection, the postal authorities have called attention to the fact that though mail sent to England under this rate is delivered safely in England, it cannot be forwarded from England to France, Italy, or other continental countries without additional postage and a penalty besides being collected at the point of delivery. This should be borne in mind in mailing letters to Germany also.

The dogs of war are baying from their kennels still in the Near East, while all the resources of European diplomacy are being used to keep them chained. Francis Joseph, emperor of Austro-Hungary and the greatest apostle of peace in Europe, is compelled against his will to lend his name to a scheme for the extension of the empire's territory and its commercial advantage at the risk of provoking a general war. Russia refuses to recognize Austria's annexation of Bosnia and Herzegovina, and continues to insist that Austria shall pay Turkey for what she has taken. The Treaty of Berlin, which has been the main support of the "balance of power" in Europe, seems to have been thrown in the fire, and conference of the powers to replace it with some new understanding seems remote. War is unlikely before the winter breaks, but is entirely possible next spring.

In the meantime, the heir apparent of Austro-Hungary, the Archduke Francis Ferdinand, has become ruler in everything but name, as he would be in fact if the emperor were permitted to abdicate as he wishes to do.

WHAT HE REALLY DID SAY.

To rescue the truth from where it has been obscured in the daily newspapers is a part of the mission of The California Weekly. There are public characters who complain, with justice, that they can find no way to get the truth spread before their fellow countrymen, and to all such as these the weekly paper is the star of hope.

To illustrate: Professor Edward A. Ross, formerly of Stanford, now of the University of Wisconsin, made a speech in Chicago and of it there was made by the press one of those reports which are intended to work up the maximum of sensation without resorting to absolute falsehood. Here is the report of the Ross address as it was telegraphed to California:

"A gloomy future for American femininity was sketched for the benefit of the Chicago Association of Collegiate Alumnae yesterday by Professor E. A. Ross, of the sociology department of the University of Wisconsin. The situation seems to be this:

"Man wants woman to be helpless, cowardly, afraid of mice. Woman would like to be strong minded, but she also likes to be dependent on man.

"As we get farther away from the primitive conditions of civilization," Professor Ross said, "men comes to have less and less of a desire for a helpmate and insists more and more that woman shall present herself to him in the light of a luxury. There is a large proportion of American men who really prefer wives who don't know too much. They want an over-sexed woman—one who will scream out when she sees a mouse and has to be helped down from a street car step."

The California Weekly has in its possession a letter from Professor Ross in which he explains what he really did say, as follows:

"The excerpt is not at all a satisfactory resume of my remarks. Being invited to discuss before the Chicago Association of Collegiate Alumnae the subject 'Is there a growing divergence between the interests of men and of women?' I first pointed out some evidence on the negative side, such as the admission of women to higher institutions of learning, their discussion of and participation in public affairs, their association into clubs and societies, their increasing participation in the government of mixed bodies such as churches, and their entrance into the learned professions.

"I then went on to say that this by no means guaranteed woman's emergence into her full moral and intellectual stature. I pointed out that so long as most women will marry and in marrying become economically dependent upon a husband, the type preferred by men exerts a very powerful influence in determining the kind of personality women try to develop. As we recede from the stern pioneer struggle it is found that a part of the men really prefer the ultrafeminine type. They like not the rational and stable woman, but the woman that is somewhat perverse, emotional, and unstable. Women in general, therefore, will not be able to develop the sort of personality they prefer to develop until this type of man has declined into a negligible minority. The uplift of women is, therefore, a part of an intellectual and moral movement that acts upon the men also."

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE

Coming By and By.

When the earth is brown and dreary and the sea of sky is gray.
When the sun peeps out to whisper, "Guess I'd better go away."

When the chill of evening merges in the keener chill of morn,
And your breath floats out and upward like an exiled wreath of foam,
When the days are growing shorter, while the nights are black and long.

And you hear a doubtful cadence in the latest songster's song,
Then 'tis the time that hearts grow weary and for vanished graces sigh
But the springtime and the suntime, they are coming by and by.

Sometimes, when we've borne the burden through the heat and stress of day,
We are weary, oh, so weary of the struggle and the fray.

Then, as twilight shadows gather and the even' drops with dew, Hearts turn back o'er dreamland meadows to the glory that we knew

When we played, with shuffling laughter, in the rose-red flush of dawn,
Ere we reached the land of specters and our fairyland was gone;

And the eyes have tears unbidden, and grim Doubt is standing high
But the bluest time of the rest time, it is coming by and by.

Oh, I hold this solace to me through the struggle and its pain,
Have the fairest flowers faded? Just as fair shall bud again.

Have the sweetest songsters flitted to the land where summers burn?
Summer soon shall turn her northward, and the songsters return.

Would the soul cry, "I am conquered, for the blackness and my heart to be lost,"
Lo, look outward and look eastward where the dawn-light tints the skies.

Look you, brother, if you weary, and for buried blisses sigh:
Just beyond the misty curtain, peace is coming by and by.

Girl Students and the Rules.

"An' I notice," said the man who talks on and on, shifting lightly to another subject, "that the dean of women students of Stanford University has been promulgating some rules for her fair charges. She means well, the dean, and I understand that she is a fine woman, but I'm fearin' that she's forgotten several things since the halcyon days when she didn't mention to everybody how she felt about John. Listen to this now. Says the dean:

"(Women students must not appear on the quad or about the university buildings wearing frou-frou skirts."

"When Eve first donned her figleaf, away back yonder in a forgotten garden, she looked her wardrobe over carefully, and finally selected leaves that were particularly dry."

"Why do you do that?" Adam inquired.
"Why, it sounds so musical when I move," Eve replied. "Don't you think it is perfectly lovely?"

"It's great!" Adam responded.

"I knew you'd like it, love," says Eve. "I'll order some of the very driest leaves from Paris this very day, and my garments shall be made of nothing else hereafter."

"Thus was recorded the primal feminine instinct in the heart of the woman whose ghost still blushes when it notices some of her descendants, and the instinct was approved and indorsed by man. And shall a dean come along and knock it over now? Not on your life! She would do better to try to remember John."

"'Tis written in the soul of woman to desire somebody, some day, to ask her to marry him. She doesn't necessarily want to be married, you understand, but how would you like to be the only peach on the tree that nobody thought it worth his while to pick? Well, there is nothing that will work a man up to the proposing point so quickly and certainly as a frou-frou skirt. Many a young man has gone to visit a young lady, expecting nothing except to pass a few pleasant hours.

"I won't propose to marry Mabel, at present, anyway," he says to himself, "for I value my personal liberty too much, but—"

"Just then there's a musical swish and sough of silken skirts. Mabel's in the room with him, and it's all off. He might have stood off Mabel, but he can't withstand the allurements of the petticoat, that delicate, wierd music which costume of man never yet made. Ah, many a man is married and full of information to-day who would be a bachelor and care-free were there no frou-frou skirt in the world! And shall any dean denude the feminine wardrobe of that article of apparel? Well, hardly! No, girls, we cannot endure that it shall be so.

"And women students must not wear hosiery of light or pastel shades." I do not know what a pastel shade is, but I have it on good information that it is not inherently vicious, and so why should it be barred? No, vive pastel! say I, and I hope the girls will stay by me.

"All men students calling on women students in the evening must have said their good-bys and taken their departures prior to 10 o'clock."

"Oh, John, John, John, where are you? If she who has forgotten you had but said that all men students must begin to take their departures prior to 10 o'clock, how much better it would be. Why doesn't she recall, John, how he used to begin to say good-by prior to 10 o'clock, and that he sometimes then got home before two a. m.? Ah, those were happy days and happier evenings, John, but she has forgotten—alas, she has forgotten!

"I suppose that deans have to make their rules, and I am not protesting, but it is going to be a long, long time before the eternal feminine will be educated out of itself, and frou-frou skirts, peekaboo waists, pretty hosiery and evenings of 'linked sweetness long drawn out' are a part of that self. Don't you think so?"

"Er—ah—what were you saying?" said I.

A Tip on the Races.

I heard you say, William, that you made a nice little stake in playing the races! Fine thing to do. Shows great cleverness on your part. By the way, I knew another young man who made a nice little stake in playing the races. He is in "the jug" now. The jury decided that it was a clear case of embezzlement. You see, he happened to have some of his employer's money on hand, and he could see how to make money for himself by betting it on a horse that was sure to come in first, and the shameless creature failed to do so.

I heard you say, too, that luck was your way and you believed you could get rich by following the races. I knew another chap once on a time who held a similar belief. Perhaps he holds it yet, but his wife and two children are living with her mother, as they seemed to need sustenance and clothing.

Talk with any of your adult friends, William, and they can tell you of similar instances, and I think that all of them combined ought to lead you to a reasonable inference that the men who manage horse races are not in the business for their health. This inference ought to impress you, I say, but it will not; at any rate, it will not if you have the race-track fever. Ephraim, who was joined to his idols, was a conservative when his idolatry is compared with that which the race-track victim gives to his tips or his system. The latter may lose his last dollar again and again, but always—if only he can make another "raise"—he returns to make another venture. Ah, the race-track managers know right well the bait to which the suckers rise. It is a shining bait, and many and many is the man whom it has lured from the bright waters of honesty and happiness to the foul atmosphere of crime and woe. And still the suckers bite, and—well, let's say it this way:

Oh, the race-mad fools, and the track-mad fools, and the fools whom the bookies skin.

Who bet, on a tip that is counted sure, on the horse that never comes in.

They are losers to-day, and they're losers always that is, in the long, long run.

And they drop their "wad" to their bridled goul, as they have since the game begun;

And sometimes they turn to a crime black way, and sometimes their babes in penury stray;

But the race still runs, while the wretched ones are there in a maddened pack,

And they leap and lunge at the bait in sight, for of fools there's never a lack.

The Patience of the Public.

Sometimes, in the hurry of life, I pause to wonder at the almost unwearied patience of man in the mass. Man, the individual, often is impatient and frequently is irascible. If Mary does not have his dinner ready at the appointed hour he is prone to tell her in language that burns what he thinks of women who delay the sacred hour of eating. If small Johnnie or Susie lift their voices unduly high in childish sport he is likely to order them to bed in words that are more vigorous than conciliatory. This is man, the individual, but man in the mass—well, the much-enduring sheep might learn patience of him.

Don't you believe it? Then you are not a commuter, and you don't, with commuters, stand (when you really should be sitting) in a mob the car has canned. If you are a gentle, sad-eyed commuter you know that you have your choice, at certain times of the day, whether you will stand near the bow of the boat several minutes before it reaches the pier or will stand in the car all the way to your home station. No other choice have you; stand somewhere you must, as hundreds of people do every afternoon in returning from San Francisco to their homes on the other side of the bay.

Of course this condition is due to the incompetency and inefficiency of the railway service. You have paid for a ride with the privilege of sitting down, and—you stand. The case is much like that of the lawyer and his client in the old story.

"The law won't permit you to be placed in jail," said the lawyer.

"But I'm in jail," the client responded.

Is not that about our case? We have paid for a seat, it is ours by right of purchase, and—we stand. We are not particularly in love with our situation, but—we stand, anyway.

Perhaps you don't commute. Then, as you go home at night, do you manage to get a strap, or do you merely stand on your neighbor's toes and listen to his language, while your other neighbor stands on your toes and listens to your language? Incompetency, inefficiency and disregard of the public again, this time on the part of the United Railways.

Suppose the cars were allowed to carry only as many as they could seat, as is the case in some parts of Europe, don't you imagine the railway companies, with fine regard for the condition of their exchequers, would manage to carry and seat us all? But, not the less, we stand.

And man in the mass—man, who, as an individual, often is irascible, fiery and spectacular—hangs to a ship, if he can get one, or apologizes to the young lady into whom he bumps while standing, and is patient—oh, infinitely patient. It is as if he said to himself, "Well, I am not getting that for which I am paying, but I guess I will have to grin and bear it;" and, thus saying, he bears, and as a grinner he is unapproachable.

Wherefore this tribute to the masterly patience of man in the mass, but it is freely conceded that it is less tribute to the management of railways.

Nothing for Sue.

There will be bright things on the Christmas tree
For Bessie and Willie and Ben,
And they'll laugh about it in their childish glee
When Santa Claus visits them.
And we will be glad, the mother and I,
As they shake their young heads.
But all of the time we will know, with a sigh,
There is never a gift for Sue.

Oh, the tree will be bright with its candlelight,
With its candles and nuts and gables,
And the laughter of children will tinkle its song,
Sweet as in days of yore,
And Santa will pass the stockings about
To all of the children young,
And happily he'll wonder, and move, with doubt,
There is nothing at all for Sue.

For dear little Sue of the baby eyes,
Who folded her hands long ago,
Just as the children was turning the skies,
And silently drifted away,
And even some time when Christmas comes,
The joy of the world to renew,
There are trumpets and dingles and marbles and drums,
But there's nothing at all for Sue.
And that's why they're weeping, the mother and I
We said it last night when the glow
Of sunset was painting the western sky,
That in where the stars go,
A Christmas tree stands in the light of the sun,
All perfect and wordless and true,
And there in its branches, oh, sweet little one,
Is something God means for our Sue.

He Didn't Read the Examiner.

Congratulations to William Randolph Hearst. Would you know wherefore? Then listen to a story which is guaranteed to be absolutely veracious.

It was during one of those frequently recurring periods when the Examiner stands in opposition to that which is for the welfare of San Francisco and the State, and it chanced that Mr. Hearst was in the city. Certain prominent business men who regretted the paper's course determined that they would, if possible, ascertain the cause of the Examiner's unfortunate attitude, so they approached Mr. Hearst at a club one day and began a conversation with him concerning the question in controversy. They told him that they were deeply concerned about the situation—so was Mr. Hearst. That they felt that certain things must be done for the public good—so did Mr. Hearst. That certain other things must not be done, or evil would result—Mr. Hearst looked at the matter in that way, too. In short, Mr. Hearst felt precisely as they did, only he felt it a little more keenly, as he indicated by fairly taking their sentiments out of their mouths before they had half expressed them.

"But why," inquired one of the gentlemen, "does the Examiner take a position in precise opposition to your views concerning the welfare of the community?"

"That—what?" said Mr. Hearst.
"The Examiner."

"Oh, the Examiner?" remarked its proprietor. "I never read the Examiner."

Wherefore these congratulations to Mr. Hearst? Whatever the trials he experiences in life, he escapes one of considerable immensity. The people of San Francisco and of the State have not escaped it, but—congratulations again; this time to the people—they are doing so more and more, and very rapidly, as time passes.

Carry the News to Willie.

In the recent election, according to figures given out from Secretary of State Curry's office, Californians cast 385,597 votes. Of this number 214,398 were cast for Taft, 127,492 for Bryan, 28,939 for Debs, 11,770 for Chafin, and 4,278 for Higgen. That is, about 55 men out of an average hundred voted for the Republican, 33 for the Democratic, nearly seven and one-half for the Socialist, slightly more than three for the Prohibition, and a little more than one (or about one in ninety) for—S-S-S! Be still! Have you no respect for the dead?—for the Independence League candidate.

Carry the news to Willie, and break it to him mild,
That not one man in ninety here was good into his child.
Our hope, where summers linger to gladden winter's pain,
Our joy in ninety only, it really saddens me;
Wouldn't you little darling, his own sweet Bonnie dear,
Oh, age him now to batten here, let him trumpet
For one of ninety men was true—and he may get away!

Rain-Maker Re-employed.

Over on the west side of the San Joaquin Valley, last year, certain farmers united in employing a man named Hatfield to make rain for them. It was a business transaction throughout. The agriculturists wanted the rain, and so they bought it of Hatfield—three thousand dollars' worth of it—and if that is not business, what would you name it? Unfortunately, however, through some misarrangement of calculations, Mr. Hatfield did not furnish the contracted amount of rain (it being a dry year) and the farmers would have been dissatisfied had not the rain-maker immediately explained that he was not to blame; that his machinery worked better in wet than in dry seasons. Naturally the farmers were content with this explanation, and so they again have employed Hatfield to furnish three thousand dollars' worth of moisture for them, which he probably will do—if this is a rainy season.

All of which demonstrates—what? That the fools are not all dead yet? What's the use? None of us, after brief introspection, needs that sort of demonstration. That Hatfield is a faker? It proves nothing of the kind. In fact, I am inclined to think that Hatfield believes in his ability to compel the clouds to drip with moisture. Many a man has large faith in palpable absurdity; and if you doubt it look about you.

On the whole, I fancy that the case of Hatfield and the west side farmers indicates nothing save that this is a queer world, in which queer things are done by queer people; and perhaps we might have guessed that without the Hatfield instance to demonstrate it.

Thomas Dixon, Jr., whose play, "The Clansman," recently toured the Coast, is a Virginian. He is very tall, very lean, and very dark. He has been a preacher (in Boston), an actor, a lecturer, and a Socialist, and has abandoned all these.

Charles Branch Cabell, the romantic novelist, has the artistic temperament so highly developed that he cannot compose his works until the mysterious hours past midnight have put their spell upon him.

Edward Bok, the editor of The Ladies' Home Journal, has a weakness for red ties, and smokes Turkish cigarettes.

Personalia.

Authors and Artists.

Upton Sinclair, the author of the brutally rugged and powerful novel, "The Jungle," is a frail, undersized boy with a weak voice, who suggests in no particular the possession of the primitive passions depicted with such terrible realism in his book. Most of his profits from the sale of "The Jungle" went up in smoke soon after the book achieved its wide popularity when the dormitory of his communal settlement at Englewood, N. J., burned to the ground.

Maynard Dixon, the young San Francisco artist, has joined the art staff of Scribner's Magazine in New York City.

Eugene P. Lyle, Jr., the author of "The Missourian" and "The Lone Star," has joined the country life movement and is farming on the James River in Virginia. He married about two years ago, and recently became the proud father of E. P. Lyle, Jr., II.

Miss Miriam Michelson, of San Francisco, the author of "The Masqueraders" and other popular novels, devotes much of her time to work for civic reform. She is an active member of the woman's branch of the Citizens' League of Justice, and on December 1st made an eloquent address before the California Club of San Francisco in support of the graft prosecution.

The signature of the short-story writer, O. Henry, is a pseudonym, suggested, so one report has it, by the ecstatic exclamation, "O Henri!" of a Creole girl with whom the author was discussing his literary ambitions one evening at dinner in the Latin quarter of New Orleans.

Chas. G. Norris, of San Francisco, younger brother of the late Frank Norris, author of "The Octopus," "The Pit," etc., has gone to New York to re-enter the editorial field as an assistant editor of The American Magazine. Mr. Norris has been for several years circulation manager of Sunset Magazine. Before that he was one of the editors of Country Life in America.

S. S. McClure, publisher of McClure's Magazine, began his business career as a peddler of tin cups. He has many of the "eccentricities of genius," and on one occasion invited a half dozen of his highest salaried assistants up to his home on the Hudson, "to help him work out a difficult problem." When they arrived they found him in his shirt sleeves laying carpets, and they had to turn to and help.

Mr. Dunne, the creator of "Mr. Dooley," does not look like his photographs. He is short, stout, and has a very rugged complexion. York Harbor, Maine, is his favorite resort in summer.

Maude Adams' summer residence is near Lake Ronkonkoma, Long Island, forty miles from New York City. It is a Queen Anne cottage with a huge living room with rustic decorations, and a great fireplace of natural round boulders.

A RESUME OF THE GRAFT CASES TO DATE

THE EVIDENCE AGAINST RUEF.

Now that, after long and wearisome waiting the case of the State against Abraham Ruef has at last dragged itself to its belated culmination, it will be of interest briefly to review the evidence. In doing this let us endeavor to place ourselves in the position of the jurymen, compelling ourselves, so far as is possible, to forget that out of his own mouth Ruef once condemned himself, and dispassionately reviewing only the evidence presented in the case, as a juror should do.

The direct evidence of Ruef's bribing operations was given by former Supervisors Gallagher, Wilson, and Furey. The first testified that, acting under Ruef's instructions, he paid bribe money—ranging from $500 to $5,000—to each one of the former supervisors in the night-trust, Parkside, Home Telephone, and overhead-trolley matters. Wilson and Furey testified that they received these moneys, that Gallagher told them they were from Ruef, and Wilson testified also that he went to Ruef in reference to the money he received to vote for the Home Telephone ordinance, and Ruef advised him to keep the money, and, further, that he (Ruef) would not discuss money matters with anybody but Gallagher.

This evidence was clear and explicit, and it should have been sufficient to convince a jury were it not that it was given by persons who were accomplices with Ruef in his operations. Hence, under the well-known rule of law, it became necessary to corroborate it in some degree by the evidence of those whose hands were clean of all guilt in the matter. Such corroborative evidence was found, and, it would seem, in sufficiency.

George B. Keane, former clerk of the Board of Supervisors, testified (as showing Ruef's relations with the board) that Ruef gave him that office. He testified further to caucuses of the board, Mayor Schmitz and Ruef (the latter lacking all official connection with the proceedings) both before and after the installation of the board.

Morris Levy wrote that, desiring to arrange a boxing contest, he went to Ruef to see about securing a license. Ruef told him to go ahead; that it would be all right. He went ahead, but the license was not forthcoming. Again he went to Ruef, and was advised that he had better see Eddie Graney about the matter. He saw Graney, and the latter asked him to join a corporation—the "fight trust," as it has come to be known—and subscribe $5,000 to its capital stock. Acting on Ruef's advice, he did so, and shortly thereafter, according to the testimony of Gallagher, Wilson, and Furey, Ruef sent $500 to each one of the supervisors, and the desired ordinance was passed.

G. B. Umben testified that he went to Ruef and asked him why the Parkside ordinance was being "held up." Ruef replied, informing Umben that if the Parkside people would employ him as their attorney he would see what he could do for them. After consultation with those he represented, Umben consented to this, although the $50,000 Ruef first asked for his services finally was reduced to $30,000, Ruef at the same time announcing that the Mayor's consent would have to be obtained. Umben got the money from Secretary Douglas Watson of the Parkside company, and it was paid to Ruef. Shortly thereafter, according to the testimony of Gallagher, Wilson and Furey, each one of the supervisors received $750 in the matter.

William J. Dingee testified that about this time Ruef came to him (Dingee) at his office and told him that Mayor Schmitz objected to his (Ruef's) acting as attorney for the Parkside people. "And," Ruef added, "there is no necessity for my employment, but the Parkside people seem to have money to throw at birds, and I should like to have them consider me a bird."

The Home Telephone Company ordinance was passed March 5, 1906. Before that, according to the testimony of George B. Keane, Ruef "lined up" the supervisors for that company. The Pacific States Telephone Company, according to the testimony of the supervisors sworn, then became interested, and, through Theodore V. Halsey, paid various sums of money to the supervisors, Wilson receiving $5,000. (This was the money which Ruef advised him to keep.) Dr. Pohoim swore that he met Ruef in the Pup Restaurant about this time, and Ruef said to him: "They tried to take my supervisors from me, but I'll fix them—they won't get a one."

Patrick Calhoun came to San Francisco about the end of April, 1906—while the city still lay in ashes—and immediately thereafter activities began in behalf of the passage of an ordinance providing for an overhead trolley for some portions of the United Railways tracks. According to the evidence, Tiley L. Ford and Thornton Mullaly, representing the United Railroads, began to write to Ruef, and Ruef began to bring pressure to bear upon the supervisors in behalf of such an ordinance. The application for an ordinance and franchise was filed on May 14, 1906, on May 21st it was passed, and on May 24th it was signed by the mayor. Note these dates, for they are of interest in connection with the following facts sworn to in the evidence:

On May 21st the ordinance passed.
On May 22d $200,000 was placed in the United States Mint in San Francisco subject to the order of Patrick Calhoun.

On May 23d or 24th Calhoun ordered the money paid to Ford.

On May 24th Mayor Schmitz signed the ordinance.

On the same day, May 24th, Ford asked of the mint officials that $50,000 of this money be paid to him in currency.

On May 25th Ford, accompanied by William M. Abbott, conveyed the currency from the mint to his (Ford's) office, in the United Railways barns.

On the same day (May 25th) Ruef deposited a large box—contents unknown—in his bank. Aleck Lathan, Ruef's former chauffeur, who escaped and was brought back by process of law to testify in the case, was an unwilling witness, but he swore to taking Ruef to Ford's office and that a large box was there secured and taken to the bank.

Although this was a large financial transaction, the books of the United Railways carry no record of it.

W. W. Sanderson testified to a conversation between himself, Ruef and Calhoun, in which he was urged by Ruef to come before the board and address it in favor of the overhead trolley. When he expressed himself as indisposed to do so, Ruef said, "This thing will go through on Monday. It's all settled," and Calhoun said, "I don't think we need you, Mr. Sanderson."

THE MURPHY CASE.

The jury to try Frank J. Murphy, a former attorney for Abraham Ruef, on the charge of attempting to bribe John Martin Kelly, a prospective Ruef juror, was secured on the fourth day of this month, and on the following day the presentation of the case to the jurors began. The circumstances leading to the trial, as alleged, are as follows:

On the third of last September Kelly charged E. A. S. Blake with an attempt to bribe him, a prospective juror in the Ruef case, and the next day Kelly implicated Murphy and Adolph Newburgh, both then attorneys for Ruef, in his charge. Blake was arrested, tried and, on October 10th, convicted. On October 29th he confessed his guilt before Judge Dunne, again implicating Murphy and Newburgh. The indictment followed.

Blake was placed upon the stand as the first important witness for the prosecution. He told how Newburgh introduced him to Murphy last July. Later Murphy asked him if Kelly was not a poor man, and, upon his replying that he was, Murphy told Blake that he would give Kelly $1,000 if he would vote for Ruef's acquittal. This proposition, on Murphy's suggestion, he carried to Blake and later reported to Murphy that Blake agreed.

In the latter part of August, according to Blake's testimony, Newburgh called him into his (Newburgh's) office and told him that Kelly had betrayed them, at the same time telling him he must sign an affidavit that he had gone to Kelly only to ascertain the state of his mind, whereupon Kelly had demanded $1,000, which Murphy had refused to pay. Such an affidavit was signed by him.

After he was arrested, he swore, Murphy gave him fifty dollars and promised to give him thirty dollars a week while his trial was in progress and $5,000 at the end of the trial. After his conviction, Blake testified, Murphy agreed to give him $10,000, and $100 a month, for the support of his wife, while he was in prison. He announced that his testimony was given voluntarily and without promise or hope of immunity. He was subjected to a severe cross-examination, but without apparently affecting the testimony he had given. Other witnesses who appeared for the prosecution were John Martin Kelly and William H. Schooler. The former testified that Blake came to him with an offer of $500 to be paid to him if he would vote for Ruef's acquittal; that he (Kelly) pretended to hold out for $1,000 and at once reported the proposition to the prosecution. Kelly was but slightly cross-examined and the value of his testimony was in no way affected.

Schooler, who is an attorney, swore under

THE WORK OF Allen's Press Clipping Bureau FOR PUBLIC MEN

Allen's Press Clipping Bureau has now had experience in six National and five State Campaigns. In this time it has had the honor of serving hundreds of public men, including members of the Cabinet, U. S. Senators, Congressmen, Governors, State Senators, Congressmen, Mayors, and State and County Central Committees.

It has aided these men by bringing them quickly, easily, and cheaply, what the entire press has to say of them or the measures in which they are interested. It has, through clipping service, disclosed the state and trend of public opinion, brings to attention false charges that should be denied, true charges that should be parried; shows what editors need argument, and what editors need encouragement in short, and in handling the most powerful and important of political organs, the Press.

Having three offices, a staff of thirty people, and reading 2,000 newspapers a week we have no unsurpassed facilities for very high grade and thorough work.

We can cover counties, districts, the State, or the Pacific States.

Rates will be furnished on application.

protest that he went to Blake after his arrest (although he did not know Blake) and offered to act as his attorney at the solicitation of attorneys Murphy and Newburgh.

AND NOW LUTHER BROWN.

Now it is Luther Brown, head of the detective force of the United Railways, who is in trouble. He is charged with attempting to bribe John Lawlor, a member of detective Burns' staff, to betray the secrets of the prosecution in the graft cases. At this writing the matter is before the grand jury and it is expected that it will act upon it before long.

Games and Government.

Basketball is the only popular outdoor game that was made to order. Football and baseball are growths, and reached their present character through centuries of development and improvement. Basketball, on the contrary, was deliberately invented to fit a written set of specifications, and to fulfill a definite purpose. The rules have remained practically unchanged.

The father of this game is Dr. Luther H. Gulick, the physical director of the New York City schools. Dr. Gulick has devoted a great deal of time to a study of children's games, with some remarkable discoveries. For instance, children of the Anglo-Saxon races are the only children in the history of the world who have developed games requiring "team-work" and the subordination of the individual to the team. Dr. Gulick sees in this fact a suggestion of the reason why the Anglo-Saxon races excel in democratic government. The child who develops the spirit of team-work in his play has the best possible training for team-work in his mature relations with society.

But it must be noted that these team games are only played by boys. Girls, it seems, have developed no such spirit of co-operation in their play. Naturally they would not, for woman's interests are necessarily individual, being mainly directed toward achieving and maintaining desirable relations with her husband. Her work, also, is solitary. She needs no co-operation of other women in her task of raising her children. Naturally a girl's mental attitude is shaped by the inherited tendencies of her sex. Hence the individual character of girls' play. Here, also, there is a suggestion of the reason for the small part acted in governmental affairs by women.

Dr. Gulick believed, however, that the time had come for a team game for girls, and with this thought in mind he drew up a long list of desirable features for such a game, of things to be avoided—in short, a complete list of specifications for an entirely new game. He sent this plan to a friend who was a director of physical culture in a large gymnasium, and this friend drew up the rules of the present game of basketball. The immediate and universal popularity of the game is a matter of history. Whether through generations of team play with it, girls will develop the team spirit that will make them, as women, participants in government, is a speculation perhaps worth considering.

Thoroughly Qualified.

Honorable Herbert Putnam, says the Circle, when he first became Librarian of Congress, was thus approached one day by a representative from a far Western State: "Mr. Putnam, I wonder if you couldn't give a berth in the library to an old friend of mine out in my home town? He's a retired Methodist minister, and I believe he'd make you a good man. He ain't as young as he was, but what he ain't read in the line of a book ain't worth reading. Why, he's the greatest hand to read. I've known that nut to lay in a hammock and read a book all day long."

In the Drug Store.

"No, I can't say that we have a large number of incidents happening here daily," said the drug clerk, according to the New York Sun. "As a matter of fact, the drug business is inclined rather to the serious side of things naturally, but we do have funny things to happen occasionally, like this morning when a little girl came in with a prescription that she said she wanted put up in hatsules."

"Hatsules?" I says, sort of puzzled like, because for the moment I didn't fall to what the little girl meant.

"Yes, sir, hatsules," she says, just like that, and then it began to percolate through my brain just what the little girl did mean, and I says to her then:

"I guess you mean capsules, don't you?" and she says:

"Why, of course I do. Hatsules!" she said, and laughed right out as she said it. "Of course, I meant capsules! How could ever I get it twisted up like that?"

"And so we put the medicine up in capsules and the little girl took it and carried it away."

"And really that wasn't the most comic thing ever happened in the world; but, as I was saying, you can't exactly expect to have funny things happen in a drug store, and so that call for hatsules kept us cheerful here for three-quarters of an hour."

Tangled Up Again.

Mr. Makinbrakes was offering his sympathy to a neighbor whose house had been visited by the fire fiend, says the Chicago Tribune.

"I know just what an—an inconvenience it must be to you, Mr. Markley," he said. "I've never been burned out of house and home, but some boys were playing in my back yard once, and they set my dog kennel on fire. Singed all the hair off a Scotch collie I owned. I remember now, though, that he was just a worthless cur. Still, you feel kind of sorry when such a thing happens, even if you don't lose anything worth mentioning. I'd be sorry even for a dog that had been burnt out—I don't mean anything personal, of course, but—er—I can sympathize with you, you know, just as if it had been you that—or, rather—if it had been any worthless dog that—what I mean to say, of course, is that—don't you think the women's hats this spring are the blameworthy-looking things you ever saw, Mr. Markley?"

Still Searching.

He was young and debonaire, and was seen about the water front looking for an old sailor, says the Philadelphia Ledger. "Any old sailor will do," he remarked confidentially to a big man, to whom he stated the object of his quest, "because all I want is to have some tattoo marks taken out of my arm."

When the tugman informed him that those Indian ink punctures would stick closer to him than a blood relation, and would be on his arm when his death certificate was filed, the young fellow was aghast.

"What in the world am I going to do?" he asked in despair. "There's a heart and two arrows and a girl's initials on my arm and I want to get them off. I've got to get rid of these letters anyway. The girl ran away last week with another fellow, and they're enjoying their honeymoon now. I must get another girl, and I don't want to have a married woman's monogram just above my elbow!"

The case was truly a pitiable one, and the generous heart of the tugman was touched. "I'll tell you what you've got to do," he exclaimed, as a happy thought struck him. "You must find another girl to fit those initials."

When last seen the tattooed man was in search of a damsel who could answer to the initials "M. A. J."

Pronged.

"I have good reason," said the head of the establishment, addressing the cashier, according to the Chicago Record-Herald, "for believing that you are living beyond your means."

"You are mistaken, sir. I am willing to have a thorough inspection of my accounts at any time."

"How does it happen, then, that you are able to have a big automobile?"

"Oh! Ha, ha, ha! That comes of having a wife who can write poetry."

"Poetry! Bah! Who ever heard of anybody earning enough writing poetry to have an automobile?"

"That's all right. She won it in a Limerick contest."

Fred—"My dear Dora, let this thought console you for your lover's death. Remember that other and better men than he have gone the same way."

Bereaved One—"They haven't all gone, have they?"—London Tit-Bits.

THE REBUILDING OF SAN FRANCISCO

By J. D. GALLOWAY.

At first thought it seems useless to attempt to say anything which will be of interest regarding the rebuilding of San Francisco. The stranger, coming for the first time since the fire, is impressed with the fresh and clean appearance of the buildings and he also notes the areas still remaining much as they looked after the fire. A pardonable comment on his part might be that the city was not yet rebuilt in spite of our repeated statements to the contrary. With these two exceptions it is doubtful if the visiting stranger does see much that is remarkable for cities are much alike and this one of ours, although it manages in one way or another to claim a reasonable share of the world's attention, is no exception to the general rule.

As for the citizen, he has been too busy with the work of rebuilding to think that there is anything which can be of interest regarding the tasks in which he has taken a part. Many whose bank account is smaller than it was, prefer not to mention the painful subject. Others look back upon the past two and one-half years of struggle and endeavor as an unpleasant period in which they have been deprived of many of their accustomed enjoyments.

To most of us, however, the period of reconstruction has not been all unpleasant, for as human efforts go, a great work has been accomplished, unconsciously, perhaps, by those most busily engaged. One has only to travel back in memory to that chaos of ruins which has been removed, to appreciate, as no one who did not witness the sight can appreciate, the magnitude of the task. Neither can anyone else who has not been engaged in the work of reconstruction form a very clear conception of the work done or the difficulties surmounted. Even to the actors in the drama it may be of interest to review the play, say from some Nob Hill of memory from which a clear view can be obtained.

When the army guard was finally withdrawn and one could visit the scenes once so familiar without being set to work tossing brick from the streets, it did seem a most hopeless task to rebuild a city in that place. To some it seemed as if it would be well to abandon the place and go somewhere else. The buildings were all destroyed or practically so. A few of them, those with steel frames, had some value in them, the rest were worse than useless. The street car systems were injured by the burning of cars and power houses and the wrecking of the trolley lines and destruction of tracks by the earthquake and fire. Water and gas mains were everywhere broken and sewers had shared the same fate. Streets paved with asphalt were burned and the basal blocks of others chipped and cracked. Practically everything which men held valuable had been destroyed. The standing brick walls were everywhere a menace and the dynamite gentlemen soon made a visit to the ruins one taken at the risk of one's life.

It was not long, however, before evidences were given that we were not to move over to Oakland or anywhere else. Men who had valued their property at thousands of dollars the front foot were not going to see the value obliterated by allowing that which gives land its value, the people, to move to some other town. Nor were they going to see the business district permanently moved to Fillmore Street or Van Ness Avenue. It was to go right back where it had been, and it did. So while some of us labored on a new building law and others on a plan of the city beautiful and still others to steal everything of any value, men were at work clearing the streets, stringing trolley wires and generally trying to bring about the first requisite, a transportation system. The distances were long and a day of walking found one fagged out. One had to take his lunch and a bottle of water in order to be safe. After Market Street was open, a bicycle made a man independent of the hopelessly over-burdened street cars.

The donkey engine soon replaced the senseless and dangerous method of blowing down standing walls with dynamite. After safes had been taken from the ruins, numberless donkey engines were everywhere engaged in pulling down walls and many men soon became expert at the unusual trade. The walls of the old Palace Hotel, firm and rigid from being built in the form of rectangular cells were about the last to go and day after day huge sections one hundred feet high were dropped without accident.

The great immediate problem was to dispose of the refuse. It is certain that had one man of ability been offered the contract for cleaning the city it could have been done at a cost much less than the actual expense. This was impracticable on account of the multitude of men concerned, making concerted action impossible. Some attempt was made to remove refuse by trains and a considerable amount was taken away by that method. The principal amount was, however, removed by the ever faithful horse who conveyed it to low lands or to barges by which it was taken out into the bay and dumped. It was a considerable task but it did not consume the five to ten years time prophesied by certain authorities—mostly from other towns.

Meanwhile the engineers and the architects had been busy studying the effects of the fire in San Francisco and the earthquake in other places. They had formed the Structural Association as a forum where the various discoveries, ideas and conclusions of the members could be debated and tested as to accuracy of observation and truth of deductions. One fact stood out free from all question or date and was appreciated by the man in the street as well as the trained observer. This was that the building with a steel frame was able to resist the destructive forces of a severe earthquake and if properly protected could withstand the effects of not only an ordinary fire but of a great conflagration. Another fact was appreciated and that was the merit of concrete both plain and reinforced as a building material although but few examples were in a position to be tested by the earthquake and the fire. After these points were recognized, opinion varied. Some claimed that brick and stone were all sufficient and pointed to the Appraisers Building and others as an example. Their opponents had lost all faith in brick and cited many ruined buildings to prove their doubts. On this point the opinions of engineers are still at variance, but the majority incline to the opinion that brickwork, however well built, is not a good material for buildings in earthquake countries. It is heavy and inelastic and as every mortar joint is a plane of weakness it is liable to rupture at any point. The pre-eminence of brickwork as a fire resistant is undisputed and as the menace is ordinarily more from fire than from earthquake it is still of much value. Much discussion took place regarding the respective merits of concrete and terra cotta as a fire-proofing. It may be said that after a few major conclusions had been agreed upon regarding the lessons of the fire and earthquake, there was and is a divergence of opinion. If anything, concrete advanced in favor and terra cotta retrograded. Metal window frames with wired glass came much into favor. This wired glass is simply plate glass in which is embedded a mesh of wire netting, the idea being that when attacked by fire the glass will crack, but not fall. There is no doubt but that the Kohl Building, a ten-story structure, was saved by its metal furnishings, all doors, window casings, base boards, etc., being of metal. Cost only has prevented a more general use of this admirable material.

Such were the general ideas upon which the rebuilding of the city was carried out. No one hesitated to build high buildings with a steel frame. Improvements were made in the frame in that the floor members were connected to columns in a more rigid manner than formerly. Steel is by all odds the most uniform, reliable and satisfactory material which men use. None of it is rolled on this coast but a number of factories fabricate the structures and they have all been busy. A building built with a frame of steel which carries all loads is elastic and yet strong. The forces of the shock are almost irresistible and this makes it necessary for the structure to bend a small amount and afterwards recover. The frame must be protected from fire which will tie it into a bow knot. So practice has been to imbed all parts of the frame in a fire-proofing. A few have used a casing of terra cotta blocks, but the great number of steel frames have been covered with concrete with from three to four inches of material outside the important members and two inches on those of less importance.

In a fire the protection will be destroyed but the steel will be preserved. After this is done the frame is provided with its skin of brick, stone or concrete. Here opinions vary, but the general conclusion is, that as the brick walls will stand a fire better than those of concrete it is better to use brick. Also in the present state of the art, brick and its assistant terra cotta is more adaptable as a decorative material. It is sufficient to say that anyone living in a building with a well-built steel frame is in no danger whatever from the effects of an earthquake of an intensity equal to the one of 1906.

Next in order is the building of reinforced concrete. All that exist in San Francisco have been built since the fire. The building laws and prejudice prevented their erection prior to that event. A few examples outside the city gave a good account of themselves in the earthquake and they were permitted, not without opposition, by the new building laws.

There is a distinction between ordinary concrete and the re-inforced material which must be borne in mind. Concrete is composed of Portland cement, sand and broken stone. Sometimes gravel is used in place of stone. The function of the sand is merely to fill the spaces between the rock. The Portland cement, sometimes called hydraulic cement, when moistened with water has the property of adhering to rock and thus in concrete it binds the sand and rock together in a compact mass. The resulting mass offers considerable resistance to a force tending to crush it; from two thousand to four thousand pounds per square inch. But to a force tending to tear it apart it offers little resistance and when cracked, none at all. So engineers in Europe and America have hit upon the expedient of placing steel rods in such position in the concrete that when a pull comes upon the member the tension will be borne by the steel and that where compression is exerted the concrete will resist that force. Certain other coincidences such as the same coefficient of expansion under a rise in temperature makes it a valuable material. Concrete thus built is known as reinforced concrete, armored concrete, concrete-steel and by other names. Tests show that as a material it acts under known laws and thus is susceptible of mathematical analysis and of consistent design. The reinforcing rods are often twisted or roughened to make the adhesion to the concrete greater. Thus in a building of this form of construction the concrete is an active agent in bearing the loads in contradistinction to the steel frame structure where it is an inert mass protecting the steel frame from fire damage except in the floors.

Relatively the material is new and somewhat untried. It became popular in San Francisco after the fire on account of a cheapness more fancied than real. A host of so-called experts and of charlatan builders clamored loudly in its praise and many structures of doubtful merit were erected at a cost far exceeding the original estimate. Also many good buildings were put up and there is no question but that it is a most excellent material for some classes of structures. Were it animate it might pray to be rescued from its friends who claim everything for it. Reinforced concrete structures should never be built unless designed by a capable engineer and erected under most rigid supervision, as a single batch of faulty concrete may cause the fall of the structure. The lack of these precautions has resulted fatally in numbers of instances in other cities.

The type of buildings most numerous in the new city are those with brick walls and wooden interiors. This is but natural as the cost of the better structures would in many cases be prohibitive of any but such building. They stand exposed to almost certain destruction in a violent earthquake and to being destroyed by a fire. Yet owners cheerfully risk other people's lives in such buildings and will pay the high insurance rates in preference to putting up better structures.

Such, briefly, are the ideas which have governed in rebuilding the new city. In spite of those who find most merit in times gone by it is certain that we have now a city immeasurably superior in cleanliness, light and appearance to the old one. It is also most emphatically true that the forms of construction, the studied design and the workmanship are far better than that of past times. Unlimited means would have enabled us to have built all buildings earthquake and fire proof, to have made real the vision which the dreamers saw when they planned the city beautiful on the ruins of the old one destroyed, and to have finished the work that is as yet incomplete. Yet it was a practical question which presented itself to a city many of the men of which were nearly ruined. Business had to be started anew and within reasonable limits of cost and under this criterion we have done well.

One may to-day stand on Nob Hill and review the busy years that intervene between now and the memorable morning of April 18, 1906. If able to repeople the past he will see again the sudden disintegration of the work of a half century. He will see the people, like a disturbed ant hill, rushing back to their ruined city, toiling, laboring, striving and finally bringing out of the chaos that coherent heterogeneity which is order.

The disaster was of sufficient magnitude to affect the finances of the nation. The rebuilding has been accomplished in a relatively short time. The recovery has been as quick as the waters close in over a stone thrown into a pond. Almost immediately all traces of the event are lost. While not of much moment to the ages, the rebuilding of the city has been, as men's efforts go, a great enterprise. And those of us who have toiled in the dust of summer and the mud of winter when viewing as a whole the work done may proudly say, as did he of old of the fall of Troy, "All of this have I seen and of much of it have I been."

The Latest Statistics of Divorce.

The Bureau of the Census has just completed a compilation of the statistics of marriage and divorce covering a period of twenty years, from 1887 to 1906, inclusive. This is the second statistical investigation of this character authorized by the Federal Government.

The total number of marriages recorded during the twenty years from 1887 to 1906, inclusive, was 12,832,044. The number annually reported increased from 483,069 in the year 1887 to 853,290 in the year 1903. The increase year by year was by no means uniform. The marriage rate is quickly responsive to changes in economic conditions.

The marriage rate in the United States in the year 1900 was 93 per 10,000 population. Based upon the adult unmarried (single, widowed or divorced) population, the rate becomes 321 per 10,000, indicating that in each year something over three per cent of the unmarried adult population marry. The marriage rate, based on the total population, is higher in the United States than in any other country for which reliable statistics are available.

The total number of divorces reported for the twenty years, 1887 to 1906, inclusive, was 945,625. For the earlier investigation, covering the twenty years, 1867 to 1886, inclusive, the number reported was 328,716, or hardly more than one-third of the number recorded in the second twenty years. At the beginning of the forty year period, covered by the two investigations, divorces occurred at the rate of 10,000 a year; at the end of that period the annual number was about 66,000. This increase, however, must be considered in connection with increase in population.

An increase of 30 per cent in population between the years 1870 to 1880 was accompanied by an increase of 79 per cent in the number of divorces granted. In the next decade, 1880 to 1890, the population increased 25 per cent and divorces 70 per cent, and in the following decade, 1890 to 1900, an increase of 21 per cent in population was accompanied by an increase of 66 per cent in the number of divorces. In the six years, from 1900 to 1906, population, as estimated, increased 10.5 per cent and divorces 29.3 per cent.

It thus appears that at the end of the forty-year period divorces were increasing about three times as fast as population, while in the first decade (1870 to 1880) they increased only about two and two-thirds as fast.

The divorce rate per 10,000 population increased from 29 in 1870 to 82 in 1905. In the former year there was one divorce for every 3,441 persons and in the latter year one for every 1,218. Since it is only married people who can become divorced, a more significant divorce rate is that which is based, not upon total population, but upon the total married population. The rate per 100,000 married population was 81 in the year 1870 and 200 in the year 1900. This comparison indicates that divorce is at present two and one-half times as common, compared with married population, as it was forty years ago.

Divorce rates appear to be much higher in the United States than in any of the foreign countries for which statistics relating to this subject have been obtained.

Two-thirds of the total number of divorces granted in the twenty-year period covered by the investigation were granted to the wife.

The most common single ground for divorce is desertion. This accounts for 38.9 per cent of all divorces (period 1887 to 1906); 49.4 per cent, or almost one-half of those granted to the husband, and 33.5 per cent, or one-third, of those granted to the wife.

The next most important ground of divorce is, for husbands, adultery, and for wives, cruelty. Of the divorces granted to husbands (1887 to 1906) 28.8 per cent were for adultery, and of those granted to wives 27.5 per cent were for cruelty. Only ten per cent of the divorces granted to wives were for adultery of the husband and 10.5 per cent of divorces granted to husbands were for cruelty on the part of the wife.

Drunkenness was the ground for divorce in 5.3 per cent of the cases in which the wife brought suit and in 1.1 per cent of the cases in which the suit was brought by the husband.

The above percentages represent those cases in which the specified cause was the sole ground on which the divorce was granted. Very frequently, however, divorces are granted not upon one ground only but upon two or more in combination.

In many cases in which drunkenness or intemperance was not recognized in the decree of the court as a ground for divorce it appears to have been present as a contributory influence. Intemperance was in fact reported as an indirect or contributory cause of divorce in five per cent of the divorces granted to the husband and in 18 per cent of the divorces granted to the wife, and appeared as a direct or indirect cause in 19.5 per cent of all divorces and 26.3 per cent of those granted to wives and 6.1 per cent of those granted to husbands.

McClure Gives up Books.

Transfer has been made of the book publishing business of the McClure Company, which has been owned by S. S. McClure, to Doubleday, Page & Co. Mr. McClure will hereafter devote all his attention to his magazine.

Included in the stock and good will of the McClure Company which will pass into the hands of the firm whose head is Mr. McClure's friend and former business associate, Frank Doubleday, will be many books already printed, as well as contracts with authors for their next books. Joseph Conrad, O. Henry and Stewart Edward White are among the authors now under contract to write books for the McClure Company.

Eugene Walter, author of "Paid in Full," and Miss Charlotte W. Haden, an actress whose stage name is Charlotte Walker, were married at the Burnet House, in Cincinnati, December 1st. Mrs. Walter will continue on the stage for the present.

Miss Caroline Hazard, president of Wellesley College, has been granted a year's leave of absence on account of ill health. She will spend this winter in California to recuperate.

Richard Strauss's new opera, "Elektra," will be presented for the first time in Dresden next month. It will be produced in America in November, 1909.

Two sons of Sidney Lanier, the Southern poet, are publishers. Charles D. Lanier is the business manager of the Review of Reviews. H. W. Lanier is a member of the firm of Doubleday, Page & Co., is art editor of their publications, and is the author of several short stories and a novelette.

THE VOTE OF CALIFORNIA.

California's vote at the November election, only now tabulated and published in an authoritative form, is a surprise in several ways. But most of all by reason of its magnitude. It amounted to 386,597, which exceeds by more than 55,000 the total of the largest previous vote, which was in 1904. In the State election of 1906 the total vote was only 311,931, or nearly 75,000 less than the vote cast on the third of November, 1908. These and other figures here given include only the vote cast for regular party candidates, and would be increased slightly if scattering votes were counted.

California is growing in population and the election figures are as good a yardstick as any other to measure how fast it is growing. In 1900, when there was a census as well as a presidential election, the proportion of vote to population was as 1 to 4.91. If this rule still holds good, the population of the State is now almost exactly 1,900,000.

The growth has been rapid, in spots. Los Angeles County cast in the recent election no less than 73,077 votes, which exceeds by more than 24,000 its vote in the presidential election of 1904. This would indicate a gain in population in four years of not far from 120,000 in that one county. A large proportion of the Los Angeles County vote is outside of the city.

San Francisco's total vote was 60,124. Another of the surprises was the size of the vote cast for William H. Taft. When Roosevelt, in 1904 received 205,226 votes, it was thought that a mark had been set which would not be reached again for many years; but the Taft vote exceeded that for Roosevelt by more than 9,000, attaining the total of 214,398. President Roosevelt, who ran against a weaker Democratic candidate than did Taft, still holds the record for a California plurality; it being 115,932, as compared with 86,906 for the Ohioan.

The following figures show the party divisions of the vote in the last four elections in California, the 1902 and 1906 elections being for Governor and the other two for President:

Year	Rep.	Dem.	Soc.	Proh.	Ind. I.
1902	146,332	143,783	9,592	4,636
1904	205,226	89,294	29,535	7,380
1906	125,887	117,645	16,036	7,355	45,008
1908	214,398	127,492	28,659	11,770	4,278

It might be reckoned as one of the surprises that the Socialist party vote for President in 1908 shows a falling off as compared with 1904. On the other hand, the Prohibition vote reveals quite a percentage of increase.

Upon the whole, the presidential vote cast in California in 1908, as in other States, demonstrates that the people were really in earnest notwithstanding the absence in the campaign of brass bands, red fire and large campaign funds. The "indifference" about which we heard so much before the polling was not reflected in the vote cast.

A Sale of News Space Confessed.

In the San Francisco Chronicle of November 24th, on the fifth page, third column, appeared an article of which the introduction is as follows:

"In sustaining the demurrer of Contractor Woodruff in the case of Barron vs. Woodruff Company, Judge Sewell found that Mrs. Barron had no cause of action for the alleged excessive cost of the Bellevue Hotel. Attorney Walter H. Linforth who defended the suit for Woodruff, succeeded in bringing out the true facts. It was clearly shown that young Woodruff, the architect, was acting in good faith for his client and that her financial embarrassment in erecting the Bellevue was due to the stupidity of her advisers. Woodruff's side of the case seems to be as follows:"

Then follows Woodruff's version of the facts in the case, as it "seems" to be. The first four columns on this page are, apparently, news columns. The head over the item is in different type in each column, but there is nothing to indicate that any of them are other than news heads. As a matter of fact, the long article in the third column (referred to above) is a paid communication that discusses a recent court ruling sustaining a demurrer in a case that is still undecided by the courts, and this discussion is wholly in support of one side of that case. But there is nothing in the physical appearance of the article to indicate that it is other than an impartial reporter's version of the facts.

On the following day (November 25th) after protest by the Barron Estate Company, the Chronicle, under the same style of heading, on page 3, printed the following bald admission of the sale of its news columns the day before:

"In yesterday's Chronicle an article appeared under the main heading, 'Woodruff Reveals Bellevue Facts.' This article was prepared by Woodruff, his agent or attorney, and was published at his expense.

"The Chronicle is in receipt of the following letter from the Barron Estate Company:"

Here follows a letter from the Barron Estate Company denying the assertions made in the Woodruff article of the day before.

San Jose, Arbiter of Autos.

The New York Star says: "Broadway's verdict used to settle the fate of a new automobile or a new model. Nowadays the manufacturer awaits the verdict of Des Moines, Ia.; Lincoln, Neb., and San Jose, Cal., says A. Leroy Pelletier.

"This may sound supercilious, but, seriously, the manufacturer who produces in large quantities, say 12,000 cars a year, could well afford to ignore Broadway and devote his attention to the immense demand of the Middle and Western States and the smaller cities. While the fact that our New York representative has contracted for 1,000 cars and could easily sell another 500 is a remarkable record in its way, it does not sound so formidable when we consider that the State of Iowa will take 2,000 of our cars, California 2,500 and the little city of San Jose, with a population of 24,000, has contracted for 100 cars—and the most of them are already sold at retail. Of course the big cities like Chicago, Philadelphia and San Francisco and a score of others are large users of cars, but the manufacturer could better afford to overlook the few places that take cars in hundreds than to ignore the thousand smaller cities that collectively consume a vastly larger quantity of automobiles and which demand high efficiency machines of moderate power rather than the speed monsters and faddish designs."

Asking.

Grant me each day the strength with which to labor.
Grant me each night the heart to take my rest.
Grant me to meet and gossip with a neighbor.
Discussion of the things we think are best.
For this our Country then I'll strive to scramble
Into the garden swing with all the kids.
To tuggle them up close and with them ramble
In Story Land to see if I can find their lids.

When they do wrong, or do better, a little.
Don't let me mope with such small offense.
Give me a sturdy temper and not brittle.
Grant me to be a clear and common sense;
Grant me to never suspect or to fumble.
Their small desires, or to eye them askance.
Grant me to soothe them when they feel a tumble,
To kiss their heads and dust their little pants.

To wait on them at table without fussing,
To hear their plates before I hear my own.
To bend my back upon their childish musing.
To answer always with the father tone;
And if they must to some small stretch or, other
Be what my little baby and child "fanned."
Grant me to leave them speaking to their mother,
Thus saving my heartstrings from being yanked.

Grant me to never be so busy reading
That I'll pass up their "Baby book" unreading.
Or pause to some of their childish musing.
The leaves, and, looking at them, grow, "What is it?"
Grant me to look and smiling say, "That's fine!"
Help me to grow old when they're a child,
To ask them in and to remain and dine.

I guess that that is all of my desiring.
Except that I am anxious to grow old;
I have to wish at all to be old or between
While I am young, with life's tale but half told;
To be with them while they are growing.
I long to lead them for a while I knew,
To help them up the ways they must be going.
Life's rocky way to wear and help them through.

Then at the last to go my way laughing,
With eyes aching while I bid them good-bye,
Glad to the last life's cup was mine for quaffing,
Even in my faith. It truly seems that I Am asking much but just so we're together
We all of us can stand whatever may hap
In wind or rain, or any kind of weather.
If they are smothered in their daddy's lap.
Judd Mortimer Lewis in Houston Post.

Miss Arvey and I, as she can't but acknowledge,
Were, in years gone by, in the same class at college.
But she makes it quite plain to her still, chilly brow,
When we meet, that we're not in the same class now.

The Theatre and the Modern Play.

The writer is one of that unhappy company who, having indulged in youth an inordinate enthusiasm for the theatre, finds now, in the chill, early forties, that the glamor has vanished; that the stage offers, on the occasion of infrequent visits, a paucity of reward.

I recall the moment when the last frayed veil of illusion was torn down and ruthlessly trampled upon. I had gone with an old friend to witness the performance of a highly successful young actress, a charming woman, who read the lines of Shakespeare quite as though they had been written by Mr. W. D. Howells; and this old friend, who had been my preceptor, who had nursed my passion for the stage; who had (illegitimately enough perhaps) planted the seed of that passion in the immature breast of a child of seven, filling my head with the glorious traditions of Macready, Forrest, and the elder Booth—well, she rose at that charged moment, and dragging me forth from the play-house, in her revolt at such decadence, cried, for the house to hear, "My dear, my dear, they're giving us cat's victuals!"

It has been pretty continuously "cats' victuals" ever since; and yet my old preceptor had voiced her protest against the mere misreading of a classic; she had but caught the buff of the first great wave of mediocrity, in the person of a popular star. She did not live to witness the relegation of the classic drama; nor to struggle in the full flood of mediocrities, who have swamped the American stage with their incapacity.

Yet in spite of all these pretty women, these unschooled, unintelligent young men, and in spite of a commercial management that has inflicted them upon us, there is a new hope for the stage. This hope forms itself in the effort of a small group of play-writers, who are now contributing, who are forcing their way to a public hearing and proving that a public is ready, is, in fact, eager, for a serious drama.

This revival in play-writing is due, of course, to the efforts of Hendrik Ibsen. He it was who burst the bonds of Berlin wool and embroidered garters that were strangling dramatic art and he it was who dragged her out (with the violence of the revolutionist) and turned upon her the searchlight of truth. I speak of Ibsen's conception of truth as a searchlight; it was a specialized form of truth that he handled. There was something hard and bitter in the old man, and the fruit of his labor was hard and bitter. He turned the light of what truth was in him, upon corruption—upon the pitiful tangles of human life. He did not see truth as broadly as does the sun, that throws its beams with equal justice upon corruption and upon innocent beauty; nor did he perceive how in the wide prospect the beauty overwhelms the corruption. That sanity, that balance of vision, is the genius of Shakespeare, of Moliere; and is, all unconsciously, the normal possession of the great mass of men and women in the world, who, without its grace, would find life to be an unbearable infliction.

Taking into full consideration the limitations of Ibsen, he remains the master-builder of the modern drama and our debt to him is consequently great. His disciples have, for the most part, taken over his astigmatism along with his methods, and having none of his genius have merely served to keep alive his zest in the problem of bringing contemporary life upon the stage and of stimulating the public mind to its truths.

The foremost of his disciples—Mr. Bernard Shaw—has substituted his own whimsical obliquity of vision for his master's tense outlook upon life, and Shaw has really contributed sanity to the modern drama, through the balance of his humor (even though that humor has too often been merely the carrying of his tongue in his cheek). Interestingly enough, before Ibsen or Shaw were heard of in America, we had our own simple pioneer making a way for the truth. Had Hearn lived until to-day, the opportunity that he had tried so painfully to make for himself would have been freely offered his gifts, and we should have known the full measure of his truthfulness—so richly intimated in certain pictures of American domestic life, in his play of "Shore Acres." His world would have been a clean vision of the clean truth.

Dream of Country Life Dispelled.

Charley Sellars used to be somewhat of a harvester, says the Indianapolis News. Fifteen years ago he went with thrashing machines and participated in the arduous toil and the accompanying jollity of the erstwhile happy harvest. He has two long scars on his hands to prove that he got too close to the band cutter.

A dream of the country life was dispelled recently when he telephoned to his brother-in-law, W. O. Latta, in Morgan County, near Mooresville, and expressed a desire to go and help thrash the ripened grain.

"I'll come down and hold scads, if I can't do anything else," he remarked over the telephone.

"That's all done by machinery, now," came the answer.

"Well, then, I can feel the machine," he said.

"We got a self-feeder," came back over the wire.

"Anyhow, I guess I can get busy with a pitch-fork on the strawstack," said Sellars.

There was a laugh and the information that the straw was stacked by a blowing machine.

"Well," answered Sellars, the last straw of his anticipation broken, "I guess I can get in on the big harvest-time dinner."

"No," came the reply, "the job is by contract; the men all bring their dinners. We don't have to cook for the help."

The city harvester who had been weaned away from the farm was nonplussed when this last illusion was dispelled.

"I'm coming down, anyhow," he said, defiantly. "I can sit back and smoke a cigar with you while your machinery gives an exhibition of what times used to be."

The Wild West.

The Wild West is a tradition in the real West, but appealing enough to the popular imagination to keep the Wild West shows alive. This is called to mind by the report that Buffalo Bill and Pawnee Bill are about to combine their attractions and tour together next season. The joke is that this report comes from the Hoffman House, New York, where Colonel Cody sat by the metropolitan campfire and mused on a bloodthirsty past.

OPP. PALACE HOTEL SAN FRANCISCO

JUSTIN BLAIR, JR., Judge of the Superior Court of Conifer County, on the mountainous periphery of a far western State, would have been the last man to suppose that his private journeying had been the cue for action by any other person, either natural or corporate. Enroute to "the city," the State's metropolis, for a visit over Sunday with his father, mother and sisters, he shared the smoking compartment of a Pullman with one other passenger, who sat opposite him.

The man's face repelled him. Essentially clod-like—large, smooth-shaven, insensate and resistant—its very lack of beneficent expression suggested malevolence. This suggestion, however, was partially overcome when the man spoke by a profusion of good-humored shrewdness. For Blair to have balked at the offer of conversation would have been to offend the western canon. Politics, corporate influence, the local omnipotence of the Transcontinental Railroad, these served in turn, Blair mildly acquiescing, the other cynically asserting.

"Take this Inter-Ocean suit, up in Pineville, Conifer County, for example," continued the latter. "There's nothing to it. The Transcontinental can't afford to let in competition."

Blair gasped at the inference, and his dark, sensitive face flushed, hotly. The case had been tried before him and submitted that very day, upon briefs, to be presented later. His impulse was to declare himself and stop the discussion. But he yielded to the temptation of a first-hand examination of public opinion in the raw, or, at least, of one phase of it. For interest in the case was general, the admission to the State of a competitive common carrier depending upon the result and determining the people in favor of the plaintiff, the Inter-Ocean system. And, in spite of skillful clouding of the issue in court, the judge knew that the law and the equity coincided with the popular desire.

"As I understand it," he said, deprecatingly, "the Transcontinental is controlling the Pineville and Mining Pass Railway by means of a secret agreement, in effect a lease for twenty years, secured by proxies, irrevocable during that period, empowering its agent to vote a majority of the stock. This stock, however, has come into the hands of the Inter-Ocean system, which is planning entrance into the State over the Pineville and Mining Pass line, and which consequently, is seeking to enjoin the voting of the Transcontinental proxies, claiming that the contract of which they are a part is void, as being what the lawyers call 'ultra vires,' that is, beyond the power of the corporations to perform."

The man laughed with sinister significance. "Beyond the power!" His leer added an ugly quality to his sarcasm. "That's a good one! Beyond the power of the Transcontinental!"

"Certainly; legally beyond its power."

"Oh, legally? Well, the matter never ends there with the Transcontinental. There are ways, you know."

"No; I don't know."

The man answered slowly and distinctly, looking with suggestive gaze and lids tensely drawn to mere slits, directly into Blair's eyes.

"Suppose," he said, "the judge in this case were offered a seat on the Supreme Bench—the Transcontinental makes some of the judges, you know." Evidently Blair's pallor escaped him. "Or, suppose he preferred, after a decent interval, a place on the legal staff of the company, with a high salary. But," with a shrug of his massive shoulders, "a cash transaction would be the least difficult."

Sorry he had let the matter go so far, Blair would not, now, divulge his identity. His silence permitted the man to continue.

"I guess that judge is no fool. He knows he'll be credited with graft, however he decides."

BEYOND THE POWER

BY JACOB BROWN

Written for The California Weekly.

So that was the light in which some people saw him. No doubt they envied him his opportunities. The thought roused his anger, which, however, he dared not show.

"See here," he blurted out, finally, "I happen to know this Judge Blair and I want to tell you that he is above any such proposition. He wouldn't even listen to it."

The man smiled again, with an accession of the sinister. But he appeared to consider the matter a moment in a new light.

"Well, you may be right. But let me tell you something," Blair's attention focused sharply. "The father of this young judge is the wholesale grocer—Blair & Co.—who gets all the contracts, and has got 'em for years, for provisioning certain State institutions. He's a grafter if the boy isn't. And if they can't buy the judge, they'll soak it to the old man. The Legislature is now in session and I guess there's no doubt about Transcontinental influence there. A commission to investigate alleged graft in State institutions would be an easy and popular stunt. How would your friend, the Judge, like to see his father under indictment and on the way to eating some of the rotten grub he's got rich out of?"

Appalled at the devilry this man's mind could conceive, Blair remembered that his father did, indeed, supply the State institutions. Anger raged within him, it throbbed in his temples and assaulted the throne of his speech; but he could not afford to give it outlet. He attempted to end the conversation.

"I'm sorry for you," he said; "you have such a poor view of human nature."

"I know what I'm talking about. The final decision in this case rests entirely with Judge Blair; there's a conflict of evidence and the law is as plain as a pike-staff—no chance for a new trial or for reversal. You take it from me that it's up to your young friend to choose his alternative pretty quick." The suavity of his voice had given place to a sharp, metallic emphasis. "The Transcontinental doesn't stop at trifles."

Though surprised at the knowledge of legal technicalities, Blair did not reply. Not daring to trust himself to speech, he ground his jaws together and looked, unseeing, out of the window.

The train slowed down. The man rose to his feet, gazed at the obsequious attention of a porter who came unsummoned, indicated his grip, which was carried from the compartment, and produced a card which Blair accepted, mechanically.

"I get off here. Good day—Judge Blair!"

Blair sprang to his feet, his slender frame quivering with rage. The man had known to whom he was speaking! Blair would have struck him in the face, but he was gone.

A glance at the card read:

B. C. WRINGE.

Those letters burned themselves into the innermost tissues of Blair's brain. B. C. Wringe: the man notorious in half a dozen states as the Transcontinental agent, arch lobbyist, briber, "fixer" of senates and assemblies, of judges and juries, a man who never hesitated at work cut out for him, but who had been known, once, to complain publicly at having three legislatures "on his hands" at the same time.

And Blair knew that, without intention on his part and in the only way possible, he had been made to listen to a proposition from the Transcontinental—a "proposition," an offer of a bribe to be named by himself, and a threat!

Had the latter concerned himself only, it would hardly have had effect, other than to have aroused his pugnacity. The implication of those dearest to him, however, the mere hinting of disgrace for the two whose heads had whitened while he had grown to the time of life at which they had first heard his childish voicing of their parentage, struck other and different chords. He reached home in a mental and physical fog.

In the evening he went to the theater with his sisters. The play—"The Lion and the Mouse"—presented the rending spectacle of the threatened wreck of an honorable career, with the sorrow and heartbreak of those whose love and dependence were not meant for struggle with the cruelty and power which struck at them. He wondered whether the two beside him could face such a situation with the courage of the girl in the play. The older, he knew, would rise on the wings of those alluring ideals with whose serious expression in big, soul-disclosing eyes, and voice vibrant with untold emotion, he had so often agreed, smiling a little, always, at her concern for his approval. The other, with the golden hair and dimpled mouth, whose undoubted joy of living had sometimes seemed to him tinged with a vague premonition of disaster, how would she sustain such a blow? The play, gripping the hearts of the people, held him brutally enthralled. He lay, an hour, awake, after he had gone to bed in the room of his boyhood, before his common sense returned and, with a gibe at himself for a trembling fool, he fell asleep.

The morning found him inclined to scoff at what he termed his idioy. He breakfasted with his parents and felt, again, the force that radiated from his father, physical, perhaps, in its origin, but, none the less, spiritually stimulating. Also, he welcomed the quiet, maternal solicitude which looked to his special wants of food and questioned his bachelor care for himself. To them, and to every soothing comfort and luxury of the home they had created, he yielded himself, and, as a child, felt secure, from every ill. Mammoth Sunday papers followed. He read and smoked with his father on a sheltered porch looking upon a smooth garden, sun-sprinkled through over-hanging leaves.

What nonsense had he been thinking over night, he asked himself. He was old enough to know an empty threat for what it was, a bluff based upon nothing but—but what? Appearances? Yes; there was that much to sustain it. Anything more than that? He stole a look at his father and appraised a deal of energy and shrewdness, of business acumen and success, a man capable of getting much of anything he desired. But as for getting it dishonestly? It could not be. He would tell him the whole story and witness his outburst of honest indignation.

"Father."

A lump rose suddenly in his throat. Was it for him to say that the father's alleged grafting was being held over the son's head as a threat? He was glad that the old man's interest in his paper was not disturbed by his negligent, "Yes?"

Still, he wanted his doubt, his little, gibbering, utterly shameful doubt cast out. How could he put the question?

His father finished what he had been reading and looked up.

"What did you want to say, son?"

"What should he say? He felt that he was slandering the source of all he had or was in life.

"People say, father, that you—that you get the State contracts by grafting."
"Do the folks think I've done politics for twenty years for my health?"

As if irritated at the silliness of the question, Blair, Sr., the man of affairs—Blair & Co.—gave his paper a slap and resumed his reading. Blair, Jr., trembled in his chair.

During the remainder of his stay, the beautiful home, the mother face, lined by a generation of goodness of thought and effort, the idealism and the sadly prescient gaiety of either of his sisters, his father's rugged pride of achievement, all seemed meant only to give point and emphasis to imminent ruin. For the first time in his life he was glad to leave his home.

In Pineville, he found himself limited to a perfunctory activity. Whether on the bench or in pursuit of purely private ends, waking or sleeping, hideous imaginings assailed him with all the vividness of actuality. Dreaming, he stared, terror-stricken, at flaring headlines in the public press—"Justin Blair Indicted!" Wakefully tossing upon his bed, he fore-saw himself, no longer clad in crime, pleading before a jury twelve great stone faces, for his father's liberty. His mother's photograph, presentment of maternal peace, seemed blotched with agony. Fear in its most insidious and crushing form was laying incessant siege to the ramparts of his courage, seeking to disorganize, to undermine, to beat down the fortifications of his manhood.

The Inter-Ocean points and authorities were promptly filed; but the allotted time for the presentation of defendant's brief was exceeded and thrice and thrice by argument of counsel, as the judge surmised. He wondered whether the delay was due to the hope that Wringe, widely known through the papers to be at the State capital, might hear from him. He conceived that Wringe was awaiting his move.

But one day he heard, he could not doubt the source, from Wringe. His evening mail brought him a copy of one of the city dailies containing a dispatch, scored with blue pencil, informing its readers that a certain assemblyman, whose name was new to Blair but whose allegiance he could safely guess, was preparing a resolution calling for an investigation into the conduct of the State institutions and hinting at an enormous waste of public funds to be uncovered. He recognized the sheet as the inspired organ of the Transcontinental.

Hitherto, Blair, tied to the post, had but known the upraised whip. Now he felt the first cut of the lash—and he winced. After all, he thought, were it not the manlier part to yield and leave the hearts at home from breaking? Was not a man's first duty—was this mere instinct persistent from the days of the clan—to his family, the fundamental unit of society? Had social evolution yet accomplished that shift of emphasis which glorifies the individual and the State? Blair's brain, dependent upon a sickening body, reeled under these conundrums.

A day later, the local attorney who attended to such matters for the defense came to him with a prepared order for an extension of time. He promptly declined to sign it; he would not answer for himself were the strain to continue much longer. His refusal necessitated the filing of the paper within three days, and he could confidently expect the reply thereto within a week thereafter. Devoutly he desired strength.

But, steadily, he was drawn to the idea of sacrificing himself, his hopes for a career, his own and his fellows' respect, upon the altar of his filial and fraternal love. Sacrifice, unsullied by any acceptance of favor, made strong appeal to his nature; and, finally, harassed as he was and ailing, in body if not in mind, he came to feel that such a solution of his trouble would insure his peace of mind.

On a Friday afternoon he entered his courtroom a little later than the hour set for the continuance of an important criminal trial. The idle, the merely curious and many others crowded the benches. He hurried into his private chambers to divest himself of his hat and overcoat.

There, without warning, he was confronted again by B. C. Wringe. The man had the faculty and the resources for moving about unheralded and unsuspected. Blair cringed, inwardly, at sight of the calm but terrible countenance. The man answered his look of startled inquiry.

"Your bailiff admitted me here."

"How much did you pay him?"

Wringe laughed, heavily but silently. He did not waste time however.

"What you going to do about this Pineville and Mining Pass business?"

"What are you going to do?"

Blair's tone was cool and not defiant. Wringe took the cue to recount with greater specifications his offers and his threat; "The interests he represented"—a note of caution was perceptible—would be generous or they would be merciless, in the latter event the wires were already laid. Blair let him talk; the objectivity of the encounter was stimulating.

The situation had long ceased to be a mere legal test of corporate capacity. The very fate of the Republic trembled in the balance. Was it, or was it not beyond the power of wealth or influence or big business to override, to defy the law? Could favor or farther-reaching fear corrupt the guardians of the common good? Blair had enough strength remaining to enable him to see the true lineaments of the question, "the great interrogation" of democracy.

And, suddenly, he bethought him what day it was. Was not Friday the day for filing of defendants' brief? He called his clerk and asked whether the paper had been received. It had; the clerk brought it to him. It was not voluminous. Ignoring Wringe, the judge read it through carefully, his mind clearer than it had been for days. Then, he rose to his feet and, opening the door into the courtroom, motioned his visitor to precede him.

Outside, Wringe, vainly seeking obscurity, took a vacant chair among the lawyers. The judge ascended the bench, whence some subtle telepathy apprised the attentive crowd of the importance of the moment. He spoke in a voice that everyone could hear.

"Mr. Clerk, in the case of The Inter-Ocean Railroad Co. vs. The Transcontinental Railroad Co., et al., an injunction granted as prayed for. Kindly enter the order and notify counsel to prepare the requisite papers."

Vigorous approval buzzed suddenly from the crowd, and a tentative clapping was heard, ceasing, however, at the sharp rap of the bailiff's gavel. The judge nodded to the waiting attorneys.

"Proceed, gentlemen."

Wringe strode from the court-room.

Next morning, over many a cup of coffee, in town and country, it was noted, knowingly, that another apostle of the square deal had risen among the people.

But, though Blair had slept better than he had of late, he had no joy of the morning. He meant to go as soon as possible to his father to prepare for what was coming. He could at least fight for him with clean, unhampered hands.

Before noon he received a telegram:

"Take next train home.

"Justin Blair."

Trouble, he thought, was always an early guest. And then it occurred to him that, in all probability his father had, long since, been apprised of his danger, in the very hope, perhaps, that he would influence the decision. "The grand old dad!" It had been square of him to await the announcement of the decree.

Father and son met at the city depot in the evening. The old man's face was aglow, pride mingled with affection in his glance, and fierce approval sounded in his voice. He slapped "his boy"—can a father ever forget the child in his own—on the back.

"Son, you're a brick! They couldn't reach you, though I know they must have tried."

"No, father, they couldn't reach me. But now they will turn on you. They mean to have a legislative commission to get evidence to—to indict you."

The father's face clouded, with puzzlement rather than with fear. Then a light broke on him.

"Oh, they do, do they? So that was the game? You didn't scare at that little bluff, my boy?"

"But, father,"—Blair, Jr., apprehending relief, at last, and weaker than he had realized, from his struggle, was near to collapse—"father, you practically admitted—"

Blair, Sr., remembered his irritation and his light reply. He saw, too, the physical condition of the younger man.

"Son, I contribute heavily to party funds, and I do personal favors for candidates. I stand in with the machine and have put friends in charge of State institutions. 'Other things equal,' as they often are, I get the plums. That's the kind of a grafter I am. But I never made a corrupt bargain with a public servant in my life. Let 'em investigate and be damned to them! Come along home. Your mother is waiting dinner for you."

"Ah waken ter announce befoh de collexshun am taken up," said Parson Snowball, "dat Ah has totally convalesced from de cold dat Ah had las' week. Derfoh hit will not be necessary for de congregation ter put no moh cough lozengus in de contribushun box dis mawmin'."—Chicago News.

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

Rooted in the Past.

It is useless to quarrel with human nature: Its discriminations are not always founded in an abundance of reason, but with all its limitations it is the raw material out of which governments must be made. One thing upon which human nature insists is that institutions, in order to be worthy of respect, and laws, in order to be worthy of obedience, must be rooted in the past and the roots must sink deep. If they extend into the prehistoric, as the roots of most of our institutions do, so much the better. In the whole realm of law there is no higher sanction than this: "It was ever thus," or "The memory of man runneth not to the contrary."

Our civilization and institutions are essentially Anglo-Saxon. We have drawn into our national life elements from all over the world, peoples from every land under the sun, and yet our institutions have continued to be, and still are, essentially Anglo-Saxon in spirit and origin. They have had that quality of prepotency which stamps upon progeny the characteristics of the progenitor.

Then who were the Angles and the Saxons? They were Dutchmen. Not Germans, but Dutch. They lived in the fogs and exposures of the North Sea and they fought for their heritage, not alone against other tribes that would have entered into their land to possess it, but they fought the sea and the rivers, and they won out. The weak ones perished, the strong ones developed a dogged determination that nothing could daunt. Each man had his own land-holding and family to provide for. That was an individual problem and made him to the last degree an individualist. But there were common enemies to repel and common obstacles to overcome. That taught them team work and made them collectively efficient. When they passed over into England they swept all before them and impressed their dominant characteristics upon all who came within their sphere of influence, whether as conquerors or conquered. With their backs against the twenty miles of turbulent waters which cut them off from Oriental-Occidental conflict, described in the last chapter, they were able to work out a civilization, much modified from time to time, but essentially their own. It is in that past that our institutions take their root and, so rooted, human nature has accorded them that homage which it ungrudgingly yields to pedigree.

It is, therefore, to this source that the rudiments of our deliberative assemblies are to be traced. Our Dutch forebears held their congresses and conventions under the oaks around a campfire and fully armed. When they were pleased with what was said they sprang to their feet, brandished their weapons and gave voice to their approval from whence came our applauding with handclapping and stamping of feet and canes. When displeased they growled hoarsely or sat in sullen silence, as we hiss or manifest our disapproval by "sitting tight," as "Fingy" Correns would express it.

It took hundreds of years to evolve out of these rude beginnings anything bearing a semblance to our courts, congresses, our jury system and executive mechanism for making laws and enforcing them, but at least the suggestion of every institution we have can be traced to the customs of a people as primitive in their mode of living as were our Indians at the discovery of America.

In the customs which grew up among our far-clad and rough-visaged Dutch progenitors the Common Law of England had its foundation. Justice was more stern than discrimination, more rigorous than merciful, and through it all there ran a strain of pagan superstition by and by softened into reasonableness by the Christian religion, and cultivated into humaneness by William of Normandy and those who followed in his train.

William and his Normans were not, as many suppose, Franks or Frenchmen. They also were "Northmen," of an origin similar to that of the Norsemen who so often invaded Great Britain and so completely amalgamated with the earlier Saxons and Angles. Minnesota and the Dakotas, replenished from Norway, Sweden, and Denmark, are the first among our Western States to throw off the yoke of corporation domination and reassert the governing function of the middle-class man. The history of the centuries preceding 1066, in England, is being repeated on a grander, broader, more enlightened scale in the great Northwest in this twentieth century, and it had been better for California had that Norse tide swept to the southwest as well as to the northwest. California would have become a freer State than it now is.

This retrospect, as well as that of last week, has been deemed needful as a background for investigating the origin of our constitutions, State and National, and it will have been justified, if for no other reason, then because it is written in human nature itself that institutions and laws, to be worthy of obedience, must root in the past and the more slow the growth the longer their life.

Do You Hear Well?

The Stolz Electrophone—A New, Electrical, Scientific and Practical Invention for those who are Deaf or Partially Deaf.

MAY NOW BE TESTED IN YOUR OWN HOME

Deaf or partially deaf people now may make a trial of the Stolz Electrophone at home. This personal, practical test serves to prove that this device satisfies, with ease, every requirement of a perfect hearing device.

This new invention renders unnecessary such clumsy, unsightly and frequently harmful devices as trumpets, horns, tubes, ear drums, fans, etc. It is a tiny electric telephone that fits on the ear and which, the instant it is applied, magnifies the sound waves in such manner as to cause an astonishing increase in the clearness of all sounds. It overcomes the buzzing and roaring ear noises and, also, so constantly and electrically exercises the vital parts of the ear that, usually, the natural unaided hearing itself is gradually restored.

THE PLEDGE OF CITIZENSHIP

I, a citizen of the United States of America, realizing that a free Republic is an impossibility unless the citizen performs his civic duty, hereby pledge myself upon my sacred honor never to fail to exercise my right of citizenship by voting at every election, primary, or secondary, wherever it is possible and legal for me to render that service to my country, my health permitting me so to do.

In taking this pledge it is distinctly understood that I in no way obligate myself to vote for any particular party, any definite candidate or any certain measure. I am binding myself only to my Country, and pledging myself solely to the faithful performance of the duty I owe to her as a citizen.

WHY TAKE THE FOREGOING PLEDGE?

Those taking the foregoing pledge, signing and sending it to this office, will be enrolled upon The California Weekly's "School for Citizenship," which will be a permanent feature of this paper. It will entitle the person sending in his name to have answered, either through the columns of the paper or by letter, any rational question he may ask concerning public affairs, and, generally, by the person best equipped to afford the desired information. It will also entitle the signer to such special literature bearing upon the obligations and opportunities of good citizenship as may from time to time be issued. While this pledge is open to persons of all ages it is especially desired that it be taken and sent in by young men lately become voters or who will cast their first votes two years hence. It will take but a moment to clip out the pledge, sign, enclose in an envelope, stamp and address to "School for Citizenship," office, The California Weekly, 26 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, and it opens the way for a liberal education in citizenship.

THE RUEF VERDICT.

The true significance of the verdict of guilty in the Ruef case should not escape the attention of any thoughtful person. It was a dearly bought triumph. It was obtained only by marshaling upon the side of justice every element of righteousness in the community life, and it involved the defeat of every element making for the subversion of orderly government which predatory wealth, cowardly cunning and stupid indifference to the public welfare could bring into opposition, whereas justice should have been meted out in a few days and with the certainty of the precession of the equinoxes. The battle is not yet won. We are yet to see whether cloistered devotees of an abstract and unrealizable philosophy of the law are to potter over the crossing of t's and dotting of i's while the foundation platform of social order breaks up under their feet and the planks go swirling away in a flood tide of disorder. This city and State could scarcely withstand a second appellate reversal of the Ruef verdict. Such reversal might not result in overt act, as it probably would not, but it would induce that hopelessness of being able to execute the law against an organized and predatory plutocracy that must disintegrate and cause to degenerate the fibre of our social constitution and tend to make every man his own avenger, each citizen the redresser of his own wrong. Compared with such a degradation of the moral fibre a season of mob violence and summary vindication of popular ideals of justice would be as a whirlwind compared to a pestilence. Let us not too much exult over the conviction of Abe Ruef. Of itself it is not much. It is a successful skirmish in advance of a main battle that may decide the fate of a civilization. The most that is to be hoped for is that the skirmish result in seizing and holding the key to the strategic situation. This is not, in very essence, a case of ascertaining the guilt or innocence of accused persons. With two or three exceptions, where indicted persons claim constructive rather than absolute innocence, there is no pretense that any indicted person did not pay money for the votes of the Ruef board of supervisors. The issue is that of being able to establish under the artificial and intricate rules of a moribund judicial system the legal guilt of men who do not, extra-judicially, deny their guilt, but who unite with every untoward human element to break down the law and escape punishment in spite of guilt. The one element of sound encouragement in the Ruef verdict is this: At every crucial struggle between the forces of righteousness and the hosts of corruption civic righteousness has gained the day. It will win in the end or it will so overthrow the existing rules of the legal game as to leave not a wrack behind.

VOTERS LEAD ADVANCE.

While theoretical discussions progress regarding the ways and means of securing a non-partisan judiciary, the voters of California have been acting, and already they have achieved a creditable degree of success in that direction. They came within measurable distance of electing a Democratic candidate for justice of the supreme court over a popular Republican, and they would have elected him but for the overwhelming character of the Taft landslide.

Our supreme court is now made up of seven Republicans, and it is no disrespect to these eminent gentlemen to say that it would be a good thing to have upon it once more a Democratic Temple, McKinstry or McKee.

In Republican counties the choice of Democrats for superior judges is no new thing, but in the election of last November it was carried further than ever before, and it is notable that even the "organization" has so far overcome its squeamishness as to recognize and accept the situation. For example, in San Bernardino County, where party politics is not child's play, they have long had one Republican and one Democratic judge. Two years ago the Republicans indorsed Judge Bledsoe, Democrat, and he was chosen without opposition. This year the Democrats returned the compliment by indorsing Judge F. F. Oster, Republican. Thus two excellent judges are retained on the bench by general consent.

San Joaquin is another county in which politics can be as bitter as anywhere, but the party conventions this year agreed to re-nominate Judge Frank H. Smith, a Republican, and Judge W. B. Nutter, a Democrat, who were consequently re-elected without dissent of any of the voters. Sacramento County, which is usually strongly Republican, has for years had upon the bench two highly esteemed Democratic lawyers, Judge P. J. Shields and Judge J. W. Hughes.

The only instance noticed in which the non-partisan principle has been markedly departed from is in Santa Clara County, where Judge M. H. Hyland has just been displaced by a Republican, Mr. P. F. Gosbey. Whenever public sentiment universally demands a non-political and non-partisan judiciary that demand will be universally obeyed. The people, not the politicians, must lead the advance.

THE MOST IMPORTANT RESULTS OBTAINED.

The most permanent and important result to flow from the great struggle with the graft cases in San Francisco is likely to be such a reconstruction of criminal procedure in California as will make justice speedily and certainly administered hereafter. The efforts here made to resist the power of the law seem likely to arm the law with the best instruments for upholding the law that the minds of our best men can devise. Henry Ach has done more than any other man to show the public to what lengths willingness to use the law for the overthrow of the law may be carried, and in doing this he has performed a public service, for which service he is, however, entitled to not the smallest credit. He has wrought the worst he knew and has thus wrought, as have thousands of others beside him, because of a perverted conception of the duty an attorney may come to owe a client who is able to pay for the best, and worst, ability there is in an attorney. As a result of this exhibition of the worst that may be done under our criminal procedure, that procedure is likely to be revised and renovated if not made over. The public has been awakened to the bald, hard, cruel fact that, in the name of justice, justice may, except in the face of the most stern, determined, unflinching and long-enduring warfare to establish it, be overthrown and left to lie unsecured in the gutter.

Justice is going to triumph, at least substantially, in these graft cases, but our blind goddess has small reason to take flattering unction to her soul when it has taken 106 days to convict a person of a crime to the commission of which he has made, in advance, what amounted to a public confession of guilt.

The reader's attention is called to the recommendations of the Commonwealth Club, set forth almost in their entirety, elsewhere in this paper. To the ultra conservative these recommendations may seem far reaching, but it may be doubted if they go far enough. It is of little use to apply the knife to a cancer if all its roots are not to be taken out. The Commonwealth Club does not propose to assail any of those constitutional rights, which we are told so often, and with so much gravity, "have borne the test of time," which is exactly what they have not done. This is the opinion of Attorney-General Bonaparte, who is free to say that it is time to curtail some of these rights to the end that justice may be the more certainly established and for the reason that their effect has been to place society, rather than the accused, in need of protection.

It is true enough that our laws and procedure serve well enough, with the added and extra-legal aid of the sweating process as applied by police and detectives, to cause the conviction of fat-witted, blundering criminals who climb porches, break in through unfastened windows and knock belated pedestrians on the head. It is when society has to deal with the millionaire or the mob that the machinery of justice either breaks down or grinds its grist so slowly and expensively as to wear public patience out.

The case of society against the mob can wait a while longer, but sooner or later that issue must be taken up, too, fully heard and effectually dealt with. The pressing need is for equipping society for dealing with millionaires with predatory tendencies. Stripped of all generalities calculated to disguise the ugly fact from public view, that is the problem to which the League of Justice, the Commonwealth Club, the reputable members of the San Francisco Bar Association, all other agencies for the betterment of existing criminal conditions, are addressing themselves. Supported by an awakened State consciousness of need for a thorough-going reform of our criminal procedure, and sustained by an awakened public conscience that will tolerate nothing less than what the common good demands, the next two years in California should witness the establishment of justice on so firm a foundation that the hosts of Dives shall neither throw it down nor seriously hinder its processes.

STATE AND BANKS OF THE STATE.

There has been much pleasant talk about how the conservatism and cool-headedness of the managers of the banks of America tided the people of America in safety over a most critical period in our financial history. That cart was placed before the horse. As a blunt fact the banking system of this nation broke down one year ago and it was the conservatism and cool-headedness of the depositing public that tided the banks over a critical period in their financial history, but for which almost the last one of them would have gone to smash, and it would have required half a century to re-establish the business of banking in the confidence of the public. The bankers were in panic because they knew better than their depositors could know the desperate situation they were in, and the depositors were not in panic because they did not know. We are now far enough from the fact to be able to face it in frankness with safety. Our financial pyramid was caught standing upon its apex instead of upon its base, and that must not happen again.

It is the State's business to see to it that such a thing does not happen again in California, but it is more the business of the banks of the State than it is of the State to see to it that it does not happen, and the banks are more likely to attend to the business than is the State. The banks are in business. The State is in politics. The banks are in earnest. The State trifles with nearly every public concern. The banks know how. Our State will, without a moment's hesitation, displace a man who knows how to make room for a political worker who knows nothing but the game of politics. It is to the banks that the public must look for protection from bad banking and, fortunately, the banks of California are exerting themselves to afford that protection.

The doctrine of responsibility of all the banks for the conduct of each of the banks is taking firm hold both upon bankers and depositors. Oklahoma has been the object of much ridicule because of an effort bravely made to apply the principle of bankers' responsibility for banking in the enactment of laws for guaranteeing bank deposits. It seems unlikely that the law will work out well, but there is a sound principle underlying it, and the bankers of Kansas, perceiving this, are asking the legislators to co-operate with them in the enactment of such laws as will permit all the banks of Kansas to guarantee the safety of each of the banks of Kansas and, that this may be done, to give all the banks power to supervise each of the banks.

Why may not something of like nature be done in California? Our banks, acting co-operatively, have devised and are putting into operation a system of extra legal bank inspection. The banks have done this because the State system has broken down, and the State system of bank inspection has broken down because positions were filled with political odd-jobs men instead of bankers. Until California shall have emancipated itself from corporate control any system of bank inspection the State may devise will break down as often as strain is put upon it.

Is it too much to hope that a united public sentiment may get behind the bankers' system of bank inspection and make it a legalized State system? The political powers-that-be place political control of California above every other consideration, above the safety of banking, the establishment of justice, the preservation of order and all other purposes for which governments are established among men. As long as this is so nothing is to be hoped from a State system of bank inspection. Per contra, everything is to be hoped from a united bankers' inspection of banks, for the reason that the experiences of 1907 taught bankers that the future of banking depended upon a co-operation of banks for the protection of banking. Any system that will safeguard banking will safeguard depositors in banks. Why not give the bankers' system of bank inspection the sanction of lawful authority and thereby make that system the State system? In no other way, until California is emancipated, can a State system of bank inspection be relied upon to do anything except spend money and furnish jobs for political gentlemen who cannot furnish jobs for themselves.

THE MIDDLE CLASS MAN.

In a land that patriotically resents even a hypothetical resolving of society into classes it may be taken as invasions to refer to any "middle class" man, and yet there is such a man. Speaking broadly he is the man who has to earn his living. His father did not earn it for him. He has not, by organizing great industrial or commercial agencies, taken to himself the earnings of others. That implies the possession of a high degree of initiative and of executive ability, attributes which the middle class man possesses only in middle-class degree. Above the middle-class man is the exceptional man, the man with exceptional powers of initiation and execution; the man with inherited wealth and the man who has given his life to a professional study and pursuit of art, science or literature. Below the middle-class man are all those who fail to pull their own weight in the world. Their name is legion.

Nearly all the problems which vex society have their sources above or below the middle-class man. From above come the problems of predatory wealth, of a scholastic predilection for getting out of touch with the world that is, of the ambitions of men intoxicated with love of power. From below come the problems of poverty and of a pig-headed and brutish criminality. Problems of this class are the more easily dealt with and yet so difficult are they that if 10 per cent. of the population were paupers or criminals chaos would reign. Those social problems of a more common quality which keep us all so busy are propounded to us by far less than two persons out of the hundred, almost by the hundredth man.

The middle class-man can, of himself, despite his numbers, do little toward solving social problems. He lacks initiative and executive effectiveness. He can grumble and bear burdens like the camel, but he can no more lighten his load than can the camel although, like the camel, he is capable upon occasion of turning upon his persecutor and reducing him to a pulp. On the other hand, nothing in the way of solving social problems can be accomplished without the middle-class man or until he gets ready to act. He has the ballot and he is the repository of that public sentiment without which nothing can be done. Once get the middle-class man into action and nothing can stand before him, but to get him into action is the problem of all social problems.

In dealing with social problems that come up from below, the middle-class man has the aid of the upper-class or exceptional man and the two together hold the lower stratum in wholesome check if nothing more; but in dealing with problems handed down to him from above, the most that the middle-class man can hope for is the aid of a portion of the upper-class on an issue of right and, so reinforced, overthrow the portion that is wrong. There is open to him no other hope. A united upper, or power-holding, class may pile the burden on until the pulp-making mania lays hold on the burden bearer. After which, chaos. The one need of the middle-class man is leadership, and leadership must, in the main, come down from above. Its sources are in the greater initiative, executive capacity and special knowledge which characterize those above the middle-class line.

Now The California Weekly was especially designed to reach and help the middle-class man. It is furnished at a price that he can afford to pay. It will deal with problems of vital interest to him and, if the aid of specially equipped men can be obtained, as hoped for, it will put him in possession of the best thought of the best leadership our coast affords. The middle-class man is judge and jury. His opinion is public opinion. Before this court The California Weekly hopes to bring many witnesses to testify regarding those things of which they do know to the end that this high court may be moved to take affirmative and remedial action. And to this end The California Weekly will ever strive. It is only by this method that things can be made better than they are.

B. F. Youakim affirms that the Middle West alone needs 100,000 miles of railroad. No doubt of it, and just as soon as the investing public can be assured that the money advanced for building railroads will be used for building railroads instead of baronial castles on the Hudson, the cash will be forthcoming.

There are signs of rebellion in the United States Senate and it is declared that the "Young Turks" have risen against the "Gray Wolves" and are giving them no little concern. There are vested wrongs in the upper house of which it needs to be divested.

Kansas cities' can have government by commission if they want it simply by petitioning for it this winter and voting for it next spring. There is no need for waiting for a State legislature to give its solemn sanction to the revised charter, as in California, where it is done in a jiffy without a single legislator knowing a thing that is in any charter or caring what is in it. The requirement of legislative sanction for city charter changes has no other effect than to interpose two years of delay between the citizens of a city and home rule in that city. Cut it out.

The straightest tip yet indicates that Senator Philander C. Knox will succeed Elihu Root as Secretary of State when the Taft administration comes in. Knox is an attorney who will stick to his client as long as his client remains a client and Uncle Sam will do well to close a four-year contract with him.

Let no citizen solace himself with the thought that the grafters have "thrown up the sponge" and concluded to "take their medicine." The inside of a prison has no greater charms for them than it had from the first, and they will fight for liberty as fiercely as ever patriots fought for it. They will surrender to superior force and to nothing else.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

The park concert was closing as the passer-by stopped to listen to the music and watch the crowd. "America," the hand-struck, up, and the people, by the impulse of custom, rose to their feet. The observer felt an instinctive thrill of realization of the glory of the nation and the history to which this custom is a tribute. He looked up, and there was Sirius, glowing in the southern sky. Instantly the impulse of mere patriotism seemed small. What is patriotism, or the emotion that inspires it, in the far perspective of the Universe? Our very sun is but a spark, and the life of the human race is less than one expiring flicker of the least mote cast from that spark. Patriotism is a microscopic recognition of membership in one microscopic colony of bacteria on that mote, in the brief moment of its transition from lifeless heat to lifeless cold. There is nothing so minute as the infinite littleness of man—except the infinite greatness of the standard by which he measures that littleness.

Who am I, an atom on a mote, that I should presume to gaze on the face of God? But who am I, sitting in spirit on the throne of the universe, that from an infinite view I should look down on my infinitesimal nothingness? The journey of a ray of light may be twenty thousand years, but the mind and the vision of man can sweep the circle of the galaxy in an instant. The very light, by which we now see that misty globe, started on its journey before the dawn of human history, and the spark our sun sends back may not reach the outer circle before the tale of man is blotted out. But in all its journey that light does not encounter one thought, one aspiration, one right or wrong, except it enter the eye that leads to a human soul. In all the universe the only things that can grasp that galaxy as one structure are the force of gravitation, the mind of man and the spirit of God. If each thing is as great as the greatest thing it can contain, then the human soul, which grasps the universe and its meaning, is greater than that universe and as great as its Meaning—God.

Quite literally all things are infinite. The very course of the raindrop is determined by the nexus of all the cosmic forces. Each atom is the resultant of the infinite sum of all atoms, divided by the infinite number of those atoms. It is more than an abstract mathematical formula that "infinity divided by infinity equals one." It is the actual physical law of each thing in the universe, the cause and determinant of its unity. But in the case of all individual things save one, the infinity of the two factors is lost in the unity of the result. By the law of gravitation, each atom attracts all the other atoms, and is attracted by them. But the net result is just one atom. As each point, mathematically, is the focus of an infinite number of lines, so each atom, physically, is the impingement of an infinite nexus of forces; that is, what is the unity and unity constitutes its existence. Infinite forces, infinitely divided, make the physical unit.

But in the unity of the human soul, both factors retain their infinity. When man places himself in spirit like a seraph on the heights of the universe, and looks down on himself as a microbe, crawling on a mote, he is expressly conscious of both factors. The infiniteness of the seraph, multiplied by the nothingness of the microbe, makes the individuality of the man. And the humility of his nothingness is reached by measuring himself by infinity. The mountain is not proud and the worm is not humble, but man is both; and in the pride of lordship and the humility of wormship he is alike conscious of his unique place, made in the image of God, and of his unique duty, to aspire to the likeness of God.

The music stopped; the crowd scattered; a little child tugged at the observer's finger. "Come home to Mamma." From the spectacle sweep of the universe back to the common things of life, the seraph found himself suddenly only a man. But the love of the Child and the Mother were infinite still—the very embodied mystery of Creation.

"Not Guilty" Not a Vindication.

Ordinarily a verdict of "not guilty" entitles the recipient of it to be received into society as though no charge had ever been preferred against him. This is merciful and magnanimous, but circumstances alter cases. Under the rules of the judicial game juries are sometimes forced to return a verdict of "not guilty" when "not proven" would come nearer to stating the truth. The burden of proof is properly put upon the State, but there are cases where the facts are so in the possession of the defendant that the inability of the State to make out its case cannot rightfully entitle the accused to a vindication, though it may entitle him to an acquittal. We may instance the trolley cases. In those cases the accused may settle themselves upon their haunches and say to the prosecution: "Go ahead with your condemned uttermost. We sit tight and say nothing," and so receive an acquittal, but so long as the auditor of the company remains with the cash book outside the jurisdiction of the court, and so long as the accused, who could go upon the stand and clear up the whole mystery of the $250,000 in five minutes, do not do so, they can lay no claim to a vindication no matter how many times they are acquitted. So long as they refuse to make a clean breast of the whole business the public has the right to infer that making a clean breast of it would be tantamount to a plea of guilty.

A Kick That Arrived.

When, last year, the gray wolves of Congress forbade the Treasury Department detailing any of its secret service men to aid the work of any other department of government, Theodore, "he just lay low and say nothing" until the time came to make a kick that would be felt along the legislative spinal column from coccyx to medulla oblongata, and then he let drive. It hurt. He meant that it should, but Congress will not dare to say ouch. His suggestion that if members of Congress are fearful of being shadowed they may except themselves from espionage without excepting all the predatory rascals in the land from a much needed surveillance turned the laugh on the members of Congress. It put them hors de combat to start with. No one supposes that all members of Congress knew the effect and purpose of the amendment to the secret service appropriation item, but the gray wolves know. Joe Cannon knew and so did Foraker and the steering committees of both houses, and no better thing could have been done than to put the responsibility where it belongs and put it hard. Neither house will make the incident cause for a stand-up fight against the President. The country will laugh them out of court, and yet it is no laughing matter, this tying the hands of executive departments that the public domain may be robbed and the laws violated. No such limitation will be put upon the secret service hereafter. Every rascal will have to look out for himself without congressional interference. As for the men responsible for the outrage they have got their'n.

The Mystery Cleared Up.

California has had a State Railroad Commission ever since 1880. This is almost news. The last heard of it affirmatively was when the late Billy Foote adorned it with his presence. He made a noise like an avalanche, but since then the commission has been an oyster, whose oyster we'll not say. But it has been busy. All these years it has been extremely busy, as lately divulged, busy trying to find the true import, significance and potential value of the term, "conform." The commission has desired to safeguard the people of California from extortionate railroad charges, rebates and preferential perquisites, but whichever way they turned they were confronted by the word "conform" with a huge question mark after it. The State constitution affirms that, "Any railroad which shall refuse to 'conform' to such rates as shall be established by the commission," shall be visited with penalties dire, but how can the commission know whether the railroads conform or do not conform unless they know what it is to conform or not to conform? That is the question. From Cone and Beerstetcher to the "corking good" Colonel Loveland the commission has been stumped by its inability to find a satisfactory definition of the term "conform." The supreme court has declared that it does not mean "identical." The commission is sure that it cannot mean "perform," or "reform." Not knowing, the commission has marked time for twenty-nine years, at $16,000 a year. What else could the good men do? The nearest they could come to it was "take program," and they have taken it. What possibilities sometimes hang upon a word?

Will Keep Hands Off.

It has been given out so many times that the Southern Pacific's political bureau will keep hands off the impending contest against the race-track evil that one may be justified in accepting it as that bureau's present intention. Suffer not the moral significance of the statement to escape attention. The declaration is not that this puissant bureau, convinced of the iniquity of a sure-thing gambling that is filling prisons with thieves and graves with suicides, will throw its influence against the evil and lend its aid to making it an outlaw. Oh! no, not that. It will merely turn its legislative bondmen free on that issue, stand to one side and view the fight, "go it Betsy, go it bear." While this lacks much of being an exemplary championship of the right against the wrong it may properly be accepted as the highest manifestation of public morality yet afforded by the political bureau of the Southern Pacific Company. In fact the stand thus taken is exalted to such an unwonted degree as to make it reasonably safe to venture dollars against doughnuts that before the legislative session is half over the influence of the Herrin push will be found marshaled on the race-track side of the race-track issue. But, accepted at its best, with full faith and credit, how is this promise to keep hands off to be viewed as a standard of civic morality?

Men Who Adorn the Bar.

At a time when the whole judicial system is being weighed and found wanting, when the conviction is forced upon the public mind that many attorneys have sought admission to the bar that they might the more safely practice rascality rather than law, it is a relief to the mind and a relaxation to the feelings to turn about and face the fact that the profession of the law has men who practice law that they may establish, not defeat, justice. Such a man was John Garber. When he stood at the bar to advise the court as to what was the law he gave the soundest advice he had to give, and he acknowledged no duty to a client that obliged him to mislead the court, the jury, or the public beyond both court and jury. There are other attorneys in San Francisco and throughout the State, less gifted perchance than John Garber, who throw the measure of the ability they have in the scale for the establishment of justice, equally and speedily. It is the exceptional attorney, perhaps the one Judas out of every twelve, who seeks to use the law to break down the law and, verily, these are known for what they are almost to the school children they pass upon the street. They have their reward, but it is not such as most men covet.

The Case of George D. Collins.

George D. Collins is an obstructor of justice and little else. He has rarely been successful in getting guilty clients out of the clutches of the law but he has the record of keeping them in the county jail, preparatory to their going to state prison, longer than the clients of any other attorney. In fact he has made a purgatory out of the county jail preparatory to the Hades at Folsom, and is himself now getting the full acclimatization benefit of the way-station. But his career serves to show what a mere cunning obstructionist, without wealth or friends, may do to block the wheels of justice. A brief review of the case against him, to be found in another column, will repay careful reading for this reason alone. It is probable that he will ultimately land in prison to serve his allotted term, but the delays he has forced in getting him there have proven exasperating to the community at large. They ought not to be possible but, add to this possibility the possession of great wealth and the backing of influential friends, and the law would be almost certain to be defeated of its vindication. Our procedures have advanced from the simple to the complex with entirely too much complexity.

Railroads entering large cities are investigating the possibilities of electrifying their plants inside city limits out of deference to the growing sentiment against belching smokestacks and bellowing whistles. The anti-smoke movement will reach this coast sooner or later, and the sooner the better. Coal costs money here and to paint the landscape with it as lavishly as we do is an economic extravagance as well as an invasion of private rights.

KEYS TO THE CHARACTER OF ROOSEVELT

By JACOB BROWN.

One signing himself "K," who has had both official and social opportunity for observing Theodore Roosevelt, "relieves his mind" on the subject in the American Magazine, for April, 1908, using the "psychological key" provided by Professor James of Harvard, for unlocking the—to him—hitherto unpickable character of our strenuous President. The "key" is the proposition that most men suffer from a habit of unnecessary inferiority, due to their failure to "energize" to the full extent of their capacities; the door of explanation opening upon a man "just like one of us," a man whose "command of his capacities is even more remarkable than the capacities themselves," one who, "in no one of his varied faculties, except in this faculty of 'energizing,' is . . . a remarkable man." Roosevelt, announces "K," does not give one "a peculiar feeling of greatness," as do many men of "far less fame;" he does not suggest "genius which is above and beyond the reach of mere human capacity."

This is, undoubtedly, comforting—as far as it goes. The Roosevelt result, however, "K" admits, is dependent upon "the supreme development of the human will," and he justly lauds the "perseverance and practice" by which "the most interesting personality before the American people" has "killed all kinds of game" and brought himself to the White House. The thesis explains much of Roosevelt's greatness, and "K" is to be thanked for a most entertaining application of a valuable formula to a conspicuous and eminent example.

In assuming, however, that he has explained the entire phenomenon—the word may be permitted—he has failed to bear in mind the limitations of a single point of view. The telescope and camera reveal the form and lineaments of a planet; the spectroscope is required for the discovery of its component elements. Thus, the "energizing" hypothesis discloses the method by which Theodore Roosevelt has been enabled to express his personality in action to the limit of his powers, and as circumstances have required. In attributing the full effect achieved, however, solely to this cause, "K" has been led into error. Something more, other points of view, are requisite in order to a complete understanding of the matter.

"K" denies "vision" to Roosevelt, refuses to classify him as "a thinker," calls him "a reporter" rather than "a prophet," and attributes his success to "energized commonness," to a strenuous following of popular opinion, and instinctive rather than reasoned articulation of popular desires. But does this thoroughly explain our President and his achievements?

It is a wise generation which knows its own geniuses—instances of military glory to the contrary notwithstanding. It required the suddenness of tragedy to awaken the world and even his official intimates to the real greatness of Lincoln. And, yet, it would seem that the "vision" which sees and follows the narrow path of justice and wisdom between time-serving palliation of corporate abuses and radical violence, thereby justifying and upholding the democratic ideal, is comparable to that "vision" which saw that a house divided against itself could not stand. The modern instance is not more in advance of popular understanding than was that of half a century ago. Neither, perhaps, is the Roosevelt political principle of less fundamental value to a people struggling toward a complete realization of government of, for, and by the people, than was the other. "K," himself, says: "Roosevelt has been an instrument in letting off a Revolution quietly in the form of evolution. Through publicity and new laws the people see that the evils from which the country has suffered, and still suffers, can be cured by orderly processes. And Roosevelt's services in this regard have been notable." Notable!

No genius that ever lived, acting in a political arena, ever accomplished anything without the support of the people; and "the people" has generally regarded "the genius" as nothing more than its chosen mouthpiece, the fortunate puppet whose circumstance and merely moderate personal capacity have brought obediently to heel in the determined chase for reform. It has remained, usually, for the succeeding generation to really sit up and proclaim "the genius." All our heroes come to us in the cold storage of history; it is small wonder that we belittle the statue of warm flesh and blood.

The great test of "sacrifice," declares "K," has not been met by Roosevelt, and the capacity of a mere "moralist," of one who acts impulsively but is no seer, to meet that test, seems doubtful to him. It has already been remarked that the character of Theodore Roosevelt, and the extension of his powers, has been adequate to every demand thus far made upon them. No test can absolutely measure the future, of either a man or a nation; yet no judgment of the future can approximate in accuracy that which is based upon the past. Considered thus, Roosevelt's chances seem good. When not yet twenty-five years of age, a youthful member of the New York State Legislature, battling strenuously for the impeachment of a corrupt judge, who was supported by all the strength of the machine of Roosevelt's own party, he faced without flinching, what his friends told him was political death. And that was before "machine smashing" had become popular or had proven of benefit to ambitious politicians. As Police Commissioner of New York, he deliberately enforced the most unpopular law on the books, a statute which long had been, because of potent "influence," a dead letter. At San Juan Hill—well, the record is long and needs no repetition. But the latest and crowning refutation must not be omitted. Rightly interpreted, what greater "test of sacrifice" has been offered to, or met by, any one in our history than the palpable certainty of a third term in the presidency, had he chosen it, held out to Roosevelt? The sacrifice forever silenced the sarcastic use of the phrase "my policies," dissociating the movement Roosevelt has led from the fortunes or personality of any one man, and, thereby, insuring the tidal force of popular revolution to the reformation in progress.

No; Roosevelt will not fail, having already given ample evidence of what manner of man he is. "K," pertinently, if naively, states that the President is not "a genius in the art" of politics, being "restrained (to his own advantage) by another common quality, a sort of literal honesty!"

A "key" to unlock this character, so mystifying to some complex souls, a "key" which opens a door throwing quite as interesting and a somewhat more illuminating light, will be found in Robert Louis Stevenson's "Ars Triplex":

"As courage and intelligence are the two qualities best worth a good man's cultivation, so it is the first part of intelligence to recognize our precarious estate in life and the first part of courage to be not at all abashed before the fact. A frank and somewhat headlong carriage, not looking too anxiously before, and not dallying in maudlin regret over the past, stamps the man who is well armored for this world. And not only well armored for this world but a good friend and a good citizen to boot. We do not go to cowards for tender dealing, nothing is so cruel as panic; and the man who has least fear for his own carcass has most time to consider others."

Then, after satirizing the life of the man afraid of to-morrow, his own shadow, or death, the Scot continues:

"Now the man who wears his heart upon his sleeve, and has a good, whirling, weathercock of a brain, makes a very different acquaintance with the world, keeps all his pulses going true and fast and gathers impetus as he runs; until, if he be running toward anything better than wild-fire, he may shoot up and become a constellation in the end!"

How Robert Louis Stevenson would have understood, how he would have proclaimed Theodore Roosevelt!

"The names of those constituting the staff of The California Weekly are an assurance of the ability and integrity of purpose with which the paper will be conducted. It will be an important factor in shaping public opinion in this State."—Oakland Enquirer.

"The sincerity of the men behind The California Weekly is not for a moment to be questioned."—Napa Register.

"All the men connected with The California Weekly are strong and if they will all stick to their several departments and so keep out of each others' way they should put out a paper that will be a distinct gain to California journalism."—Redland Facts.

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE

The Pioneer Mother.

(The women of California are endeavoring to secure the erection of a statue to the Pioneer Mothers, on Market Street, San Francisco.)

Men came to the West when the West was young
For gold he had loved since the world began,
But the woman came, he her praises sung
For love of her children and love of the man.
He bailed high as the clouds above,
A tower of state which the world might con,
But the woman guarded with tender love
The home which was rock that he built upon.

Ah, stern was the struggle our fathers knew,
Yet the man was strong to do and dare,
But all that the weaknes of woman knew
Was, just for love's sake, to hope and to bear:
So she scarcely journeyed the long, long trail
O'er the prairies wide to the mountains' rim,
And her soul was strong as her body frail
For she said, " 'Tis for love of the babes and him."

The man dug deep in the canyon's fold
For gold that the ages had hidden away,
But all that the heart of the woman would hold
Was her dream of love that gladdens the day.
Man builded an empire the world to amaze,
For "Dare" was his motto and "Do" his creed,
But the woman built for her children's praise,
And this was the finer and nobler deed.

Be mighty memories lifted to her,
This woman who came in the days of old;
Let bronzes and granite their glory confer,
But after it all, when all is told,
Here is a monument long to live
Than all that the hand of sculptor may make;
'Tis found in the honor her children give
For all that she bore for her sweet love's sake.

Attending a Trumpet Seance.

I attended a trumpet seance the other evening. A trumpet seance is one at which trumpets are provided through which the spirits speak in order that their voices may not be recognized—I mean, of course, in order that their voices—may be recognizable. In other respects it is much like other seances. The medium sits in the middle of the room holding the hands of a woman whom we do not know, and the rest of us sit around him in a circle, holding hands and trying not to look foolish.

Just before the medium turned out the lights he explained that he would prefer to have light, but the spirits insisted that the room should be dark. Very well; he is in the business of handling spirits and should understand their desires, but what I wish to know is why they choose darkness when they cannot see without a light. I fancy that the fact that they cannot see in darkness is a discovery of my own, but I shall take pleasure in convincing you that such is the case.

I sat between a tall, voluble woman and a short, reticent woman, neither of whom had I seen before, and held their hands, not tenderly but as a matter of business, while they clasped mine. One thing that I like about seances is that they are so conducive to friendship and perfect trust. After a while something hit me on the head, and I judged that the spirit of a pugilist had arrived. However, I did not know what to do about it, and so I did nothing. Then it hit me again, and I did the same as before. Immediately it passed to the tall woman and hit her on the head.

"It thinks it's hitting you," said she; "it is you that it wants."

"The pugilist must be weak-minded," said I. "What shall I do about it?"

"Talk to the dear one," said she. "It wants to talk to you."

I have rarely attended spirit conversations, and so I was somewhat doubtful what to say, but finally I said: "Would you just as soon knock a little more lightly the next time?"

It does not matter about the conversation that followed, and I dislike to dwell upon it, for it was my father's father who talked to me, and I could see that the old gentleman, who had a rather bright mind in life, had mentally retrograded to a shocking degree. No; we will not dwell upon the conversation, and I will carry my load of bitter grief as best I may.

But that to which I wish to call attention is the fact that the medi—I mean the spirit—was not sure whether it was hitting me or the woman next to me; it could see no more in the darkness than I could. This is my discovery, and I gladly give it to the world. Now if some gentleman who is both scientific and acquainted with the habits of spirits will explain why they love darkness when they cannot see therein, it will be quite a relief to some of us.

Ah, yes, "there are more things in heaven and earth, Horatio, than are dreamt of in your philosophy"—and then, too, there are commercial mediums.

The Opinions of Rufus.

"Praps we needn't b'lieve in an eternal hell, but han't it ever occurred to you that one that was half-eternal wouldn't give some men you've known any more'n time 'nough to 'cclude to be decent?"

Course it's reddie'ous fer a peacock to 'hist his tail just to show it, but I dunno es fokes that write the editor to publish that they're stoppin' at the Hotel DeSwellé this winter should laff at the fool fowl on that account.

Oft'n an' oft'n when I look at a Merry Widder that an' its wearer I can't help wishin' they was somewhere nigh es much inside the head es they is outside of it.

If Nero was such a fiddler es some I've heered, I dunno es the burnin' of Rome could have added much to the misery of them that listened to him.

Seems to me that the cheapest kind of honor in this world is the kind that's given a man 'cause his pa made money, an' it's mighty common, too.

I b'lieve the happiest man is him that never marries his first love. He keeps a mighty sweet mem'ry, without havin' to pay the price fer it.

It's a good thing to be sympathetic, but you want to apply it right or it's wasted. Frinstance, I knew a girl once that cried 'bout the man in the moon. She said it seemed to her that he must be awful lonely.

Truth crushed to earth 'll rise again," but you're out of your wits to try to crush it on that account. It looks jest es well uncrushed.

Paid in Honor.

"I don't care for myself. I am paid in honor."—Governor Gillett, concerning the proposed increase in salaries of State officials under the constitutional amendment adopted at the recent election.

Here would I sum that honor high,
And note it so the passer-by,
Rejoice, may we see its glory shine
Round that ennobled head of thine.
I have no power to name it all,
Such is your deeds for tribute call,
And so here's honor, somewhat blured,
Not sum'd in one mortal word.

Tragedy in a Nutshell.

The tragedy of life which is revealed in newspapers may drag its way through some common place or it may be condensed in the four or five line item nearly hidden in some obscure corner of the paper; and frequently, I have thought, the pathos which finds scant expression in the brief statement may infinitely exceed that which is portrayed day after day for the delectation, amusement or sympathy of the world. It was an item covering an inch or two of space in a recent issue of a local paper that set me to ruminating along this line, and perhaps you might care to consider the facts it details, too. If so, here they are:

Mrs. Helen McGorey has passed her three score and ten years, and the record of them is written in the frailty and decrepitude which come with old age. She is without money or property, unable to work, and, in order that she may live, has been compelled to sue her two sons for support. These sons are men in growth and age, one of them earns $125, the other $70 a month, and neither has anyone dependent upon him. Thus are set forth, hardly more baldly than in the paper in which they first were told, the facts of this case. But how these facts drip with the bitter waters of human misery!

I do not know this old woman, Mrs. Helen McGorey. She may have been a good, bad or indifferent mother, but one or two things I know of her, as I know them of other mothers, and these are the things that I know:

With cruel pain and suffering she brought these two sons into the world of hurrying humanity.

Through all the days, months and years of their helpless babyhood she watched over and guarded them, making herself their bondswoman by day and night when such servitude was the price of their living.

She may, or may not, have cared for them adequately through their youth, but, at any rate, some greater or less part of the credit that they have attained vigorous and self-supporting manhood must be given to her.

And if that she did not do this, this old woman a claim for support against her sons, will you name facts that would? And if here is not tragedy, although compressed into a nutshell, on what picture-blurred and scare-headed page of the daily paper which gives you such delicious horrors over your morning cup of coffee would you find it?

But what think you of sons whose deeds compel their mother to sue them for support? Think as you will, and sooner or later your thought will betray itself in your living and in your treatment of an aging woman somewhere, but for my part I conceive that men cannot be much baser and more unworthy than they have become when they turn from the mother who bore them and leave her in helplessness and want in her old age. Such are the viler fellows of mankind, and, whatever Mrs. McGorey may be, she is to be commiserated in her sons.

Yes, it is tragedy; not of the "high life" or "Smart Set" variety, but I suppose the tears that drip in a towel are as salt as those that flow in a palace.

Mr. Crane's Incandescent Foot-Warmer.

Nobody, I think, justly could condemn Mr. Delbert R. Crane, leader of the State university band, for desiring to sleep with warm feet. Most of us, indeed, have experienced a similar desire ere now, for it is unpleasant to sleep with cold feet, particularly when they are one's own.

Nevertheless, Mr. Crane should have hesitated long and thoughtfully, as he probably will in future, before he decided to use an electric-light bulb as his bed-warmer. Such a bulb is a pleasant, cheery companion of an evening, but as a foot-warmer it is likely to become too heated and ardent in argument. Say what one may for the incandescent light as a foot-warmer, there is an element of discouragement in arousing from sweet slumber in the dead of night to find the bedclothes, including the nightdress of which one is fond, going up in fire and smoke, all because the incontinent is taking advantage of a logical situation in its argument. To be fondly dreaming that you and the bull together have routed bitter cold, and then to waken to learn that you have routed it too much, is a blistering experience, as Mr. Crane now admits. I suppose. Probably he will warm the bed hereafter with a flatiron or a hot-water bag. Anyway—

Electric bulbs, though beams they shed,
And light on many a spot,
He'll be a shirder, to a trim a bed,
There argument's too hot.

Always Bank the Nickel.

John D. Rockefeller, according to a late newspaper report, recently gave a waiter a five-cent tip, at the same time advising him to put it in a savings bank. "That's what I did with my spare cash when I was your age," said Mr. Rockefeller, "and it earned money for me." Thus, my children, it will be seen that economy is its own best reward, and it is hoped that you will bank your nickels until the accumulation of them makes you worth, like the good Mr. Rockefeller, a half-billion dollars or so.

Ho, weary brother on life's way,
To whom the race seem hock,
I hear with awe and sad dismay
You shout for lack of luck,
Fall recklessly you wear your woe,
Suzed, flustered, cup and drunk it,
Received a nick, just as you do,
But, oh, you didn't bank it!

If you had banked, oh, foolish one,
With cash and with relief,
Five hundred thousand thanks my son,
As much as Rockefeller,
You might be worth that is, of course,
Each day you'd have to thank me,
Alas, alas! You did much worse,
Let, oh, you didn't bank a tin.

"Is this state so bank-
Has extensive success?
Five hundred thousand thanks a day
Are all that should be needed,
Get out your state, no foolish one,
And figure what I state here,
And when with banking nicks you're done,
You, too, might bank the state, dear.

The Latest Indignation Meetings.

"Did you hear about the latest indignation meetings?" the first citizen inquired.

"No, how was that?" said the second citizen.

"Why, the prisoners in the State penitentiaries held meetings of indignant protest."

"On what ground?"

"Why, because of the probability that Abe Ruef might be immured with them. They said that, unfortunate though they were, and criminal though they had been, the State had no right to expose them to further moral corruption and undesired disgrace."

"Poor fellows! Something in it, don't you think?"

"Yes, poor fellows!"

"Vertical in Her Dress."

Here man, who looks upon gentle woman with that respect, esteem and admiration which she cannot help deserving, will note with a reverence approaching awe, and pained awe perhaps, the fact which has gone forth from the national tailors' convention that henceforth she must be "vertical in her dress." There is not a doubt, I fancy, that she will obey the dictum, although in some instances it may puzzle her some. However, it is not for you, brother, nor for me, to interfere; only, do you not sympathize with me in the following?

Oh, she may be quite vertical,
Strictly lamellar,
All tailor-made, chemical,
We would not lose or traile 'er,
But I'd prefer her, now, the less,
And so would you, I dare to guess -
In all her pose and business,
Somewhat as nature made 'er.

Let Me Believe.

(A very good woman said to me that she would not teach her children to believe in Santa Claus, because to do so would be to lie to them.)

She said, "Santa Claus, can't he be so
That scrooges are found to deny
That you come to me off in the long, long ago,
Boaring your gifts for the girl and the boy—
But the scrooge were dead?
Adding your much to their gladness and joy,
Making the baby lives sweet
And thus a lie? Ah, then, if you will,
Let me have faith to believe in it still.

Let me have faith that just for that day
The Christ is the king of the earth,
The God man of kindness and loving his way,
Let me have faith in the Spirit of Good,
Let me have faith in the Spirit of Good,
Inducing the leaders of laws,
Who bearth sweet gifts to the holiday broad -
And thus is our dear Santa Claus?
Ah, term it a fiction, a myth, if you will,
But let me have faith to believe in it still!

My dear little maiden, whom I love so well,
So better a scrooge I ask
Than that you be held by the old legend's spell,
Now look for the truth 'neath the mask
I am old, you are young, believe as I did,
With baby heart willy athill,
In a world of roses and love, 'twas hid,
Your Christmas with blessing to fill,
Ah, little one, little one, see of Time's shift
Would give half our world to believe in it still.

A COMMUNICATION.

More Judges or More Justice, Which?

The Editor of The California Weekly:

The people of Alameda County are much concerned over the probability of the Legislature making them a present of two new superior court judges. In an article printed about three weeks ago the Enquirer analysed the situation and insisted that more vigorous methods in court procedure are the crying need of the hour, and not more judges.

The campaign in this connection was opened February 28th last when Judge Ogden made a comparison of the population of this county with that of San Francisco County where there are twelve superior judges, as against five here, whereupon, according to the Oakland Tribune: "Mr. Churchill then stated that he believed, as a practitioner in this court, that it was absolutely essential that there should be at least two additional departments to the superior court of this county established at the next legislative session, and that the present congested condition of the court dockets was such as to work great harm to litigants and the public generally."

In the Oakland correspondence of the San Francisco Call of January 25th last was an article headed: "Judge Baker's Usual Gait in Handling Criminal Cases Destroy Court-house Leisure." Then follows an interview with this judge (whose habitat is in Modoc County), in which he said:

"The impression seems to have gone abroad that I am unduly rushing court affairs, but I haven't changed my methods of working since I came down here to take Judge Ogden's place temporarily. I hardly think I should be asked to change myself about in every new place I happen to be, so when I came here I worked at my old gait. Most of the astonishment seems to have arisen among attorneys over refusals to grant continuances in cases. I have never refused a continuance where I thought injustice would be done either side by an immediate hearing, but in numerous cases where one side would be injured by delays granted the other side I have insisted on taking up the matters at once. It is easily possible to win a case in court by delaying business in trial until the opening party is worn out, but that doesn't seem right to me."

In one of the middle-west States is a judge who for years held ten in ten counties without assistance. He read recently a pamphlet report of a libel suit tried before him and it was pleasing to note the rapidity, the smoothness, of the proceedings. When objections to the evidence were made he ruled upon them without hesitation and without long arguments by counsel. It was an unusual thing for any case coming before him to take more than three days. It was his custom to begin court at 9 a. m. and he took only an hour intermission at noon. And at 9 a. m. and 9 p. m. meant 9 a. m. and 1 o'clock, respectively, and not any old hour. Executive ability, as well as legal ability, is a desirable quality in a judge, as was illustrated by the success and the popularity of this man.

It was on September 27th that the trial of Isabella Martin on a criminal charge was begun in this county. It is still under way—two months and a half from the date of commencement. One of the witnesses, a boy, was under cross-examination for seven and a half days. Contrast with this a case which has just been tried in Omaha—that of Charles E. Davis, indicted for the murder of Dr. Fred Rustin, the "famous triple suicide pact" which has attracted so much attention. Only nine days were required to dispose of this case though additional interest was given it by the fact that a nephew of the accused is president of the First National Bank of Omaha and a brother is cashier of the same institution, and every effort possible has been made to prevent his conviction. In justice to the local case it should be stated that the presiding judge was called in from Contra Costa County and that a recess was taken for a few days at one time on account of the illness of a jurymen, but no comment has been made in regard to the dragging of the trial; it is taken as a matter of course.

Several years ago a bill was introduced giving this county two additional judges but the active opposition of the Enquirer resulted in reducing the number to one—and many good lawyers said that even one was not needed. This appointment necessitated securing new quarters for the board of supervisors in order to find a place for the new court. The result was that $30,000 was expended in building an annex to the Hall of Records to house the supervisors. There is no room in either the court house or Hall of Records for additional courts and if they are forced upon this county it is probable that a large expenditure will be made to provide quarters for them. As we are endeavoring to secure a division of the county it would appear to be ordinary business prudence to make no more additions to the present county buildings.

Many of the leading lawyers of Oakland are opposed to an increase of judges, they will tell you in confidence, but more free to make known their opposition for fear of offending themselves with the new judges, if additional judges are appointed this winter.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By ALL-OF-US

Knight's Exploded Cabinet Boom.

How far wrong a newspaper can get when it wants to arouse interest in an imaginary political situation is well illustrated by the recent efforts of the Examiner to make George A. Knight a candidate for Secretary of the Navy in Taft's cabinet. The Examiner printed a series of local articles and alleged special dispatches from Washington depicting the activity of Senators Perkins and Flint, Governor Gillett and the entire California delegation in Congress in behalf of Knight, and of the leaders of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League against him. Those articles of alleged news were alternated with interviews with Knight himself, in which he ostentatiously put away the crown, but left the impression that he would accept it, and expected to get it. The general impression given was that there was an active campaign on, in California, in Washington and at Hot Springs, of which George Knight was the center.

Now, the sober truth is that the entire incident existed only in the imagination of George Knight and in the columns of his friend the Examiner. During the time that the war of ink was raging, it was not even true that the Lincoln-Roosevelt leaders were sending any protests to the president or to Judge Taft. They had assumed, quite correctly, that there was nothing to protest against. Subsequently, as a matter of caution, letters were sent to Washington and to Hot Springs, by personal friends of the President and President-elect, so that in case the newspaper noise should reach that far, some definite statement of the situation might be at hand to meet it. But the trouble even of writing the letters was superfluous, except as a matter of excess of caution.

Information from entirely reliable and well-informed sources at Washington is to the effect that neither the senators nor representatives from California, nor in fact anyone else, so far as anyone in Washington ever heard, has so much as spoken to the President in Knight's behalf. There is no reason to suppose that his name has ever been even considered by President-elect Taft. The idea of his being appointed to the cabinet is simply out of the question. It was a pure newspaper invention in the beginning, and never progressed beyond that stage.

Gubernatorial Booms.

The next State election is still a long way off, but not so far as to prevent some anticipatory gazing into the political mirror on the part of those who think (or whose friends think) that they would grace the higher offices of State. Among the mentioned and mentionables for governor, a few names have already bobbed into vision.

Southern California, like Alameda County, is never lacking in statesmen, and while the traditional rule that Senator Flint's successor shall come from the South will undoubtedly be a handicap to any effort to secure the governorship from the South also, that fact would not be conclusive against a distinctly strong candidate. Besides, these geographic distributions may not be quite so uniform and mechanical under the direct primary.

One of those mentioned in Southern California is W. H. Flint, postmaster at Los Angeles and brother of Senator Frank Flint. Postmaster Flint is a genial man, with many of the attractive qualities that have made his brother Senator Flint personally popular, and he has made a good record in the postoffice. Politically, his affiliations probably do not differ much from those of his brother, who was a Southern Pacific attorney, and was elected Senator by orders from Herrin, transmitted by Abe Ruef.

A whisper was put out recently to try out the popularity of Captain J. D. Fredericks, District Attorney of Los Angeles County, but it appears that he is tied to the wrist of George Black, Walter Parker's "sub" in the State Executive Committee.

Former State Senator Robert N. Bulla, of Los Angeles, has not been taking an active part in politics recently, though he has continued as one of the leaders of the Union League Club. He was one of the leaders of the fight against Dan Burns in the contest that ended in the selection of Senator Thomas A. Bard, and was himself prominently in the field as a senatorial possibility at that time. His sympathies are still positively with the anti-machine movement, and he is deservedly popular in Southern California. Southern California could not put up a stronger candidate, nor one who would make a better governor. Tom Hughes, the wealthy lumberman of Los Angeles, would be one of Bulla's strongest supporters.

Lee C. Gates is one of the popular men of Southern California, and one of the best public speakers in California. He was the reform candidate for mayor of Los Angeles, and was barely beaten by the vicissitudes of a three-cornered fight. Gates is an anti-machine Republican, and a leader in the movement for good government in his own community and the State. He did effective work for Taft on the stump in the last campaign.

In Northern and Central California, the name of Charles M. Belshaw of Contra Costa County looms in the foreground of possibilities. Belshaw has a good record in the legislature and on the stump, is a clean man personally, and an able one, and is extraordinarily popular in Southern California, as well as in his own section.

Mayor Clinton L. White of Sacramento is one of the best men in California. He is absolutely square, has one of the soundest legal minds in the State, and has made a splendid record as an executive. His election as mayor was a triumph for good government in Sacramento, and if it should be in the cards that he should be called higher up, it would be a piece of remarkable good fortune for the State.

Another mayor is Mayor Frank Mott of Oakland. The only thing against Mayor Mott is that he is a bachelor, and if he were to be elected governor the prompt services of a matrimonial bureau would be in order, lest the executive mansion be reduced to the cold cheer of bachelors' hall. In all other respects Mayor Mott would make an excellent State executive. He is capable and honest, and well equipped for larger things.

Probably no one would be more surprised than Charles Bentley, late president of the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce, to hear his name mentioned for governor. Yet the State could go much farther and find much difficulty in doing better. By that same token San Francisco should not overlook the possibility of Bentley for mayor. He is a fine representative of that lamentably rare type, the business man of courage and public spirit enough to take an active part in public affairs—and always on the right side.

The name of former Mayor Wm. R. Davis of Oakland is also frequently mentioned in reform circles as an ideal candidate for governor, but never by Mr. Davis himself. He has consistently refused to be considered a candidate for any office. But stranger things have happened, and may happen, than to find Mr. Davis in the unthought-of limelight. He has a splendid record as Mayor of Oakland, and as leader of the Oakland water-front litigation, and is a man of fine ability and spotless integrity.

Mention ought not to be omitted of A. B.

Nye, State Controller. Mr. Nye probably knows more about State affairs than any other man in California, and would make an absolutely ideal governor. But he is in no sense an aspirant to the office, and would probably not care to be made a candidate for it.

Former Governor George C. Pardee is another man who would make an excellent governor, but probably does not care to be considered as in the field for it. Dr. Pardee was a good executive before. His mistakes were in his capacity as a political leader, and were of a sort which, in the light of experience, he would hardly make again. Whether he ever holds office again or not, Dr. Pardee will continue to be one of the most valuable public servants of the State.

Judiciary Booms.

Southern California will insist upon naming one of the two judges of the Supreme Court two years hence.

At present Lucien Shaw is the only member of the court from south of Tehachapi. The south believes that it is entitled to at least two of the seven judges, and produces impressive figures to show the amount of court work coming from the southern end of the State. Then, too, the legal business of that section deals in a large measure with matters that require special knowledge—the rapidly growing oil industry, for instance—and that is urged as a special reason why more members of the Supreme Court should come from the south.

The two judges whose terms end in 1910 are Judge M. C. Sloss and Henry Melvin. Sloss was appointed by Governor Pardee in February of 1906 to succeed Judge Van Dyke, deceased. Judge Melvin was a candidate before the people at the recent election, and ran 50,000 votes behind his ticket. In an ordinary year that would have defeated him. Personally Melvin is exceptionally popular, his ability is conceded, and there has never been a suspicion of his personal integrity. His only element of weakness, then, was nomination by a convention notoriously controlled by the railroad

THE WORK OF

Allen's Press Clipping Bureau

FOR PUBLIC MEN

Allen's Press Clipping Bureau has now had experience in six National and five State campaigns. In this time it has had the honor of serving hundreds of public men, including members of the Cabinet, U. S. Senators, Congressmen, Governors, State Senators and Assemblymen, Mayors, and State and County Central Committees.

It has aided these men by bringing them quickly, easily, and cheaply, what the entire press has to say of them or the measures in which they are interested.

A thorough clipping service discloses the state and trend of public opinion, brings to attention false charges that should be denied, true charges that should be parried; shows what editors need argument, and what editors need encouragement—in short, aids in handling the most powerful and important of political engines, the Press.

Having three offices, a staff of thirty people, and reading 2,000 coast papers per week, we have now unsurpassed facilities for very high-grade and thorough work.

We can cover counties, districts, the State, or the Pacific States.

machine, and his known political affiliations with the "organization." If that fact cost him 50,000 votes in a Taft year, it will not be overlooked by those who figure on the possibilities of politics next time.

Southern California will make the claim that either Judge Sloss or Melvin shall step aside in the interest of a southern candidate.

Of the Southern California judges the names most frequently mentioned in connection with the supreme bench are those of Judge Curtis, D. Wilbur and N. P. Conrey. Both were up for re-election to the superior court of Los Angeles County at the November election, and each received a decidedly flattering vote of confidence. Both are clean, wholesome men, with trained minds, and are equipped in every way for judicial positions.

Judge W. P. James, also of the superior court in Los Angeles, was the Southern California candidate before the convention at the time Melvin was nominated, but withdrew in favor of Melvin when it became evident that the latter had the votes. He has a good personal reputation, but is accused of political affiliation with Walter Parker, the Southern Pacific boss.

Judge Wheaton A. Gray, formerly of Tulare but now of Los Angeles County, is also mentioned. Judge Gray was defeated for the nomination to the appellate bench at the famous Santa Cruz convention, in 1906, because he refused to deliver Tulare County. Judge Taggart, of Santa Barbara, got the nomination. His delegation was "good." Judge Gray's record was that of an able jurist. He had many friends in the convention that nominated Melvin who would have liked to vote for him, but he declined at that time to be a candidate.

Unquestionably one of the most formidable candidates that Southern California could possibly present was William J. Hunsaker, whose name is also frequently mentioned. No member of the bar in the south has had wider experience or more active practice before the courts than has Mr. Hunsaker, and he undoubtedly would add great weight to the supreme bench.

Daguerreotypes Extinct.

The daguerotype, which the picture produced by the first-invented process of photography, has many advantages over the best photographs made to-day. It reproduces the exact texture of fabrics, for instance, as no photograph can do. It also reproduces the contour of the human face, with the fullest possible suggestion of its curves and of the texture of the skin, far better than photography has ever done.

But, curiously, the making of daguerreotypes is a lost art, though it was at its height just forty years ago. There are still living some of the most successful practitioners of the art, but without exception they have forgotten the formulas that made their fame. These formulas were trade secrets. Nearly every one of them was published, but every one of them was published omitted some element essential to successful use.

These curious facts were discovered by investigators who recently became interested in reviving the popularity of the daguerreotype. One man has spent several years in experiments to rediscover the formula, but so far he has not been successful.

Thus the original, and one of the most desirable forms of photography, has been completely lost as a practical art in the lifetime of one generation.

Longfellow's Harmless Vanity.

In his old age the poet Longfellow developed a childlike delight in the admiration of his countrymen. Sitting one day on his porch with a friend he pointed to a group of tourists who were pulling flowers from the hedge at his front gate, and said: "Do you know, those people are taking those flowers away as souvenirs to show that they have seen me? Hundreds of people come here every year this way, many of them from distant places. They have read my poems and want to see me."

The Case of George D. Collins.

It was just about three and one-half years ago, or in May, 1905, that George D. Collins, a notorious attorney of San Francisco, was arrested for bigamy alleged to have been committed in marrying Clarice McCurdy and his trial on this charge began in the latter part of the succeeding June. Bigamy was not an extraditable offense, and Collins, who knew every hook and crook by which the processes of the law may be obstructed, doubtless bore this fact in mind when he fled to British Columbia on the fourth or fifth of July, 1905. Thereupon the grand jury indicted him for perjury alleged to have been committed in swearing, in his answer in a maintenance suit brought by Agnes Newman Collins, that he never had married her, and perjury being an extraditable offense, proceedings for his extradition were at once begun. Collins fought hard to defeat this effort, but it finally was successful, and he was brought back to San Francisco in the latter part of October, 1905.

Just about a month later he was put on trial on the perjury charge, and shortly before Christmas the jury disagreed.

On the following December 29th the grand jury again indicted him, this time for perjury alleged to have been committed in the course of the trial which had just terminated. About a month later, on January 27, 1906, he was brought into court, pleaded not guilty, and his trial began, resulting in a verdict of guilty on February 27th. The verdict was followed, on March 10th, by a sentence to fourteen years in San Quentin prison, and from this sentence Collins appealed.

On April 18, 1906, occurred the big fire, and all of the records in the case were destroyed. Through the efforts of the District Attorney's office, the records were restored by August 29th of that year, after a necessary delay of but four months and eleven days. The County Clerk, however, did not have the records printed until some time in January, 1907.

The next step in the case was taken in May, 1907 (the appeal still being pending), when Collins applied to the Supreme Court for a writ of habeas corpus, contending that the Superior Court had no right to try him on the second perjury charge until he had been tried on the first and either convicted or returned to British Columbia. This writ was argued on May 21st, and on that day his application was denied.

On June 12, 1907, Chief Justice Beatty allowed him a writ of error to the United States Supreme Court, and, under the rules of that court, he had a year in which to take out the writ. He took out the writ, however, on November 8, 1907, in order to escape going to prison, the appellate court having in September confirmed the San Quentin sentence of the Superior Court, and the Supreme Court, to which he applied for a rehearing in October, having denied his application. The judgment of the Superior Court rendered in March, 1906, thus became final in November, 1907, and prison immediately confronted Collins, save for the writ of error.

On December 23, 1907, Collins filed an application in the United States Circuit Court before Judge Van Fleet for another writ of habeas corpus on practically the same grounds as before. This came on for hearing on January 6, 1908, and on that day the writ was denied by the court. As soon as this writ was denied Collins asked for an appeal to the United States Supreme Court, and Judge Van Fleet allowed his application on January 9th. The records connected with the writ of error and with the appeal have been printed, and both are on the United States Supreme Court October calendar. A motion has been made by William Hoff Cook of the District Attorney's office to consolidate the two cases (the point involved being practically the same in each case) and advance them on the calendar, and this motion probably will be argued about next January or February. If the motion is granted the prosecution hopes that Collins will go to prison about next June, more than four years after his first arrest. If the motion is not granted guesses concerning when the end will come probably would be futile.

THE REFORM OF CRIMINAL PROCEDURE

RECOMMENDATIONS MADE BY THE COMMONWEALTH CLUB OF SAN FRANCISCO

[The Commonwealth Club of San Francisco contains a membership of several hundred as intelligent and capable men as may be found in the bay cities. They meet to listen to a carefully prepared paper on some subject of pressing public importance and then refer the subject to a special section of the whole body for a careful review and for the formulation of such recommendations as seem profitable for public policy. At the general meeting a month later this section of the club makes its report and this report is discussed and explained and voted upon by all. Following are the recommendations of the section to which the subject of a reform of our criminal procedure was referred, all of which were formally endorsed by a show of hands of the membership, in most cases unanimously. It is expected that these declarations will now be put in the form of bills and presented to the legislature for action. As they are therefore to be before the people of California for discussion and approval, The California Weekly takes the first opportunity to present these recommendations to its readers and to the press of the State.]

It is not the purpose of this Section of the Commonwealth Club to complain of the decisions of the courts or to propose changes in the law so radical as to deprive an accused person of any substantial right which he now enjoys. Formerly it was the defendant who demanded a speedy trial, and that right is still guaranteed to him by law. If, by some reform in our procedure, the same right of speedy trial be given the State, it cannot be said that such legislation is radical or that defendant will be deprived of any right, for we but give to him what the Constitution guarantees. The ideal system of criminal procedure would be that one which puts the accused person upon his trial without unreasonable delay, to the end that if innocent he be given a prompt deliverance, but, if guilty, he be speedily punished as a deterrent to others.

FINDINGS:

1.—That crime is increasing in California, not only in actual number of offenses but also in proportion to population.

2.—That fewer offenders are punished in proportion to number of crimes in the last four-year period than in the preceding four-year period. Punishment for crime is becoming less certain and longer delayed.

3.—That the time between the commission of the offense and the punishment thereof is unreasonably great.

4.—That trials are unduly prolonged, and jury duty made highly burdensome to citizens.

5.—That we believe the increase of crime to be due in large part to the failure or delay of the State in punishing criminals.

Therefore this Section of the Commonwealth Club offers the following

RECOMMENDATIONS:

1.—That the Legislature pass such laws and propose such changes in the Constitution as will make the administration of justice more speedy and certain; and

2.—We pledge the assistance of the Commonwealth Club to promote legislation to that end.

In suggesting to the Legislature specific remedies to meet this condition it is the opinion of the Section that we should not undertake at this session to cover too wide a field of reform but should confine our recommendations to changes in criminal procedure that seem to be most essential, and these will be directed toward the removal of the causes of delay, the chief weakness of our system.

Remedies Suggested.

The remedies for the evil described above may be analyzed and indicated under the headings as follows: Venue, the trial jury, charge to the jury, and the appeal.

The Accusation.

Indictment by a grand jury is made the occasion of a trial of the grand jurors to discover their motive in bringing the charge. Trivial errors or omissions in the indictment are made the ground of setting aside the whole proceeding, without regard to the substantial merits of the case. Instead of permitting a defective indictment to be corrected the entire proceedings are set aside and the labor lost. One court in San Francisco was occupied for sixty days in the present year in the effort to determine the motives of the grand jurors in finding indictments, wasting the time of the court, and harassing the citizens who had given their labors to the public service on the grand jury. We therefore recommend that:—

Indictment should not be set aside for bias on the part of the grand jurors, and grand jurors should not be harassed by examination to discover the motives on which they find true bills.

If A shoots B, and B swears out a warrant for A's arrest, nobody thinks of dismissing the charge on the ground that B is prejudiced. The point to be decided should be the guilt or innocence of the person charged, and not the motive of the one bringing the charge.

Amendments we recommend cover the following points:

First: The repeal of Sections 894 to 901 of the Penal Code, which relate to the causes of challenge to the grand jury panel and to individual grand jurors, and substitute in their place the provision that before the grand jury is sworn it shall be the duty of the court to make strict examination of the manner of the drawing and summoning of the grand jury and at that time to hear all objections made against the grand jury or any individual grand juror, and to satisfy himself that the jurors are qualified and unbiased. The determination of the superior court as to the qualifications and fairness of the respective grand jurors shall be a final judgment not subject to review in that or any other court. This may require some amendment to the Constitution.

Second: The grand jury at the present time has the right to indict two or more defendants jointly for the commission of the same felony, but each defendant has the right to demand a separate trial. This is unjust to the State as it compels the State to go through as many trials as there are defendants, though the evidence in each trial may be exactly the same. We recommend an amendment to this section which, to conform to the Federal practice, would provide that in all cases the defendants jointly charged may be tried separately or jointly at the discretion of the court.

Third: There should also be some modification of the present law which prohibits the State from compelling persons to testify if the witness claims that his evidence might incriminate him. We believe this should be relaxed in cases of crimes against public justice, such as bribery, perjury, conspiracy to commit a crime, and similar offenses. This can probably be accomplished without constitutional amendments by providing that no prosecution of witnesses shall follow for any crime which his evidence may reveal he has committed. This is now the provision with reference to crimes against the election laws of the State, as found in Statutes of 1905.

Trial Jury.

Prospective jurors are now subject to useless examinations which are prolonged to unreasonable length. This is one prolific cause of delay in trial. In some recent cases single jurors have been questioned by attorneys for more than a day in the effort to establish grounds of challenge for bias. Trial judges feel compelled to allow prolonged examinations for fear that, if they do not, errors may arise.

Jury service is made so burdensome by the length of trials that many citizens who have other occupations feel compelled, in self-defense, to adopt questionable methods of disqualifying themselves in order to escape this public duty. To be kept weeks or months from business and family is an unreasonable hardship on jurors, and in many cases would lead to business ruin. The practice, therefore, deprives the State of the service of the men best qualified to hear and judge of the evidence. In some cases, by the present system, it has taken more than two months to secure a jury.

Grounds for challenges against the panel and against the individual juror are so many and so highly technical that qualified citizens are excused from service. The law should therefore be so amended as to modify the grounds of challenge against individual trial jurors and the panel, and also to make it the duty of the judge to conduct all examinations of jurors as to their qualifications, and that counsel shall have no right to examine jurors unless permitted to do so by the court.

Section 1076 of the Penal Code relating to the disqualification of jurors for actual bias should be so amended as to make it unnecessary for it to appear affirmatively that a juror's opinion, if any, was based exclusively upon public rumor, statements in public journals or common notoriety, provided it be made to appear he can and will act fairly and impartially.

The Section was at first of the opinion that the number of peremptory challenges allowed the defendants by the present Statutes should be reduced. The reason for this was that under the present system it is a matter of great time and expense to fill the jury box with men declared by the court to be qualified and unbiased; but subsequently we concluded to recommend the system above provided for the examination of trial jurors by the court. The system proposed, we believe will reduce the difficulty and shorten the time in securing the jury. As it will take away from the defendant the privilege of minute examination of individual jurors to discover possible grounds of challenge, we considered it advisable to balance this loss to the defendant by a more liberal allowance of peremptory challenges. It is the opinion of the Section that even with the greater number of peremptory challenges, it will result in a large saving of time and expense. We believe, however, that the State is placed at a great disadvantage in having but half the number of challenges allowed to the defendant. There is no reason for this, and we recommend an equal number in all cases. We propose, therefore, an amendment to Section 1070 of the Penal Code, allowing the defendant twenty-four peremptory challenges in capital cases and twelve in all other felonies, and the people the same number. The number twelve is adopted instead of ten because it is the number which constitutes the jury, and if defendant is dissatisfied with one jury he is given the right to select an entirely new jury, and when his life is at stake he is entitled to excuse two complete juries. This seems a sufficient protection to the defendant under any circumstances.

Charge to the Jury.

The provision that the judges may not charge jurors with respect to the matters of fact deprives the jurors of the advice of one best qualified to show the relevancy of testimony to the issue.

The English practice, the Federal practice, and the practice of the majority of the States of this Union permit the court to advise the jury as to the application of the evidence to the matters to be determined. We believe this to be the better practice but the jury must be instructed that they are the final judges of the facts in all cases. We therefore recommend an amendment to the Constitution which will secure this end.

The provision of the code that permits attorneys to demand instructions to the jury has been grossly abused and has been so broadly construed against the people that the charge of the court is now largely prepared by the attorneys for defense.

Instructions to the jury have grown to such length and gone into such refinements of technical law that even the appellate courts have great difficulty in determining their meaning, and they are often beyond the understanding of jurors. They have become a trap to the court instead of an assistance to the jury. This abuse we believe can be remedied by making it duty of the court to prepare all instructions with such aid and assistance from the counsel as the court in its discretion may permit.

The Appeal.

Statutory forms intended to hasten the hearing of appeals from the judgment of a trial court have worked out in practice as a hindrance to a speedy determination of the points at issue.

The bill of exceptions, intended to present briefly to the higher court the assignments of error committed on the trial, has become exceedingly voluminous, and the settlement of the bill of exceptions has become the greatest single cause of delay. The average time taken in this city, as shown by Professor McMurray's figures, to prepare the transcript on appeal, is now nine months and nine days, while in one case it took six years, two months and twenty-eight days to prepare the record.

Frivolous and dilatory appeals should be made difficult by making appeal a privilege depending on the issue of a certificate of probable cause by trial court, or one of the appellate judges. We therefore recommend that the formal procedure now fixed by statute for bringing a case before the appellate court for review on bill of exception should be repealed and a shorter and more flexible and expeditious system adopted either by statute or by rule to get the record before the appellate court as is now permitted in civil cases.

The Section considers it desirable for the statute or the Constitution to define with greater precision the matters of law which shall be reviewable upon appeal.

Some of the members of the Section are of the opinion that the people should have the same right of a new trial and appeal as is given the defendant in a criminal case. The full Section has not had an opportunity to discuss this question but its obvious advantage is that it would tend to shorten the trial by inducing greater caution in the conduct of the defendant's case as well as to preserve an equality between the rights of the parties to the proceeding. At present the court can commit no reviewable error against the State. The English Criminal Appeal Act of August, 1907, gives the people the right of appeal.

Constitutional Amendments.

Besides this main line along which the reform of the criminal procedure should be directed, the following changes in the Constitution are advisable: Revision of the sections providing for trial by jury so that the formation and powers of the jury should be governed solely by the Constitution and the laws of this State. The full meaning of the term, trial by jury, secured to all persons by the Constitution is not determined by the Constitution and the statutes of this State, but by the meaning of the term as known at common law at the time of the separation of the Colonies from Great Britain, and many incidents are attached thereto which embarrass our system of procedure. We believe that the right of trial by jury should be such as is secured to all persons by the Constitution and laws of the State of California, as modified from time to time as the Legislature or people may see fit, and should not be made to depend upon the unwritten law of England.

We also recommend the modification of the constitutional provision relating to the "twice in jeopardy," so that it may not apply to a mistrial or a re-trial of a charge. The defendant is entitled to his liberty if tried and a verdict of acquittal is rendered. He should not be permitted to plead a former jeopardy when he has never been actually in danger of conviction.

We also recommend a revision of Section 13, Article I, of the Constitution so as to provide that any person accused of crime, though he cannot be compelled to give testimony against himself, yet if he does offer himself as a witness, may be examined by the State as any other witness.

It is also recommended that if a defendant does not testify, the State may be permitted to comment upon his failure to take the stand to maintain his innocence.

CORRESPONDENCE.

The Stanford Project.

The proposal of President Jordan, looking toward a surrender by our universities of the work now being done by them during the first two of the four years of student attendance, is of deep sociological import. It has long been recognized by our leading educators that a four-year university course, followed by a three or four-year technical training, say in law or medicine, which, in turn, must be succeeded, in most cases, by a long and arduous struggle for such meager professional success as will result in self-support, to say nothing of marriage, are factors in a system which can only be thought of as cumbersome and inefficient. The movement begun at Stanford will cut two years from the period of pre-technical training and will, undoubtedly, encourage the limitation of mere collegiate, as opposed to university, education to such as can be accomplished within two years added to the period now required by our secondary schools.

Indeed, it is probable that the ground now covered by our freshman and sophomore university classes will come to be included in the curricula of our high schools, and this without bringing the graduate therefrom to a more advanced age than at present. Any apparent impossibility in this suggestion must yield to the results actually obtained in foreign countries, particularly in Germany and England, and in certain of our own Eastern institutions. President Jordan cites the standard of the German universities as a desired objective; and this standard is predicated upon a secondary system (the gymnasias) which fits the student for entrance into the university at practically the same age as that of our high school graduate. To reach the same result, here, may require an overhauling of our grammar and high school courses of study, an improvement in our pedagogic methods or in their application, or a discovery of some defect in our present system as yet unguessed. Whatever may prove to be the means of the necessary progress, the advance is sure to come. If our public schools fail to accomplish it, competitive private institutions will prove its possibility.

The sequel in this direction may turn out to be a rejuvenation of the small college, an institution which, during the first century of our national existence, and before the stupendous recent growth of our universities, performed an inestimable service in the direction of co-ordinated character and brain culture; a service which, perhaps, has not been so well performed by our heavily endowed aggregations of laboratories, machine shops, libraries, lecture rooms, athletic fields, gymnasiums and annual deficits, and of from three to four thousand youthful egoists.

But whatever the effects immediate to our educational system, the deeper import of the projected change, once it is brought about, can hardly be other than good. It will manifest itself in the character and performance of those who will profit by it. No one has yet speculated, in print, concerning the effects, upon both the individual and society, consequent upon the selection, because of mental qualifications, of candidates for the higher moral and intellectual responsibilities of life and the accompanying denial to such candidates, during the period of early and vigorous maturity, of economic independence. And yet, such are often the processes of our present system, entailing disappointment, embitterment, and even, in some cases, a fatal lowering of ideals—the ruin of promised brilliancy and usefulness. A material reduction of the period of preparation for the "learned" and technical professions will tend, strongly, to prevent such results. And in the case of the non-technical worker, particularly of the business man, a mental equipment consisting of a great deal more than is now provided by the high school, though falling short of that offered by a university course, will prove amply sufficient, especially in view of the time saved, of the earlier age at which he will be permitted to tackle the concrete conditions which he must conquer, conditions which, in themselves, are highly educative. The product will be an admirably efficient man of business, possessed of all of the essentials of culture, yet not handicapped and made ridiculous by an overtrained and, for his purpose, visionary habit of mind.

THE MURPHY CASE AND OTHERS.

Since The California Weekly last went to press the evidence for the defense in the case of the State against Frank J. Murphy has been introduced, and, after twenty-four hours of deliberation and twelve ballots, the jury brought in its verdict of not guilty. In order to understand the facts on which the jury based its verdict let us briefly review the testimony for the defendant, first glancing again at the evidence for the prosecution which was summarized in last week's paper.

For the prosecution E. A. S. Blake, who had been convicted of an attempt to bribe John Martin Kelly, a prospective juror in the Ruef case, and who later confessed his guilt, testified that he offered a bribe of $1,000 to Kelly, and that in so doing he acted under the instructions of attorneys Frank J. Murphy and Adolph Newburgh. He testified further that he had signed an affidavit in which he swore that he had gone to Kelly only to ascertain the state of Kelly's mind with reference to Ruef, but that this affidavit was signed at the request of Newburgh, and was not in accord with the facts. Murphy, he testified, had paid him $50 after he was arrested, and had promised him more.

John Martin Kelly testified that Blake had come to him and had offered to pay him $500 if he would vote for the acquittal of Ruef, that he had pretended to hold out for $1,000 and had at once reported the attempt to the prosecuting attorney. William H. Schooler, an attorney, testified, with manifest reluctance, that he had been employed to defend Blake, whom he did not know, by Murphy and Newburgh. This constituted the more important evidence for the prosecution.

Frank J. Murphy testified in his own behalf that it had been the custom of the attorneys for Ruef to inquire closely into the qualifications and prejudices of prospective jurors in his case, and that, acting in accordance with this custom, Blake had been urged to sound Kelly and ascertain just how he stood in the matter, but that this was done without any thought of bribery, nor was any bribe offered. The testimony of Adolph Newburgh was practically to the same effect, and both of them swore that they believed the affidavit signed by Blake to be in exact accord with the facts.

In addition to these two some forty or fifty witnesses took the stand and testified that Blake's reputation for truth and veracity was bad, while that of Murphy was good.

Thus, briefly, is given a synopsis of the evidence for the defense. Manifestly it was a case wherein the jury that believed one side perforce disbelieved the other, and the jury evidently chose to believe the witnesses for the defense, consisting mainly of the defendant and the man who still is to be tried on a charge of bribery involving the same facts.

Newburgh's trial, it is expected, will take place in the near future, and so will that of Alexander S. Lathan, Ruef's former chauffeur, who is charged with perjuring himself in the evidence he gave in the Ruef trial in reference to conveying Ruef and his box of money from the office of the United Railroads to the bank, it being contended that this evidence and that which he gave before the grand jury were contradictory.

The trial of Peter Claudianes, charged with dynamiting the residence occupied by former Supervisor James L. Gallagher, in Oakland, was to have begun before Judge Waste, in that city, last Wednesday. His trial will be followed by that of John Claudianes, his brother.

The trial of Patrick Calhoun for bribery in connection with the over-head-trolley franchise is set for January 5, 1909.

Golden Rule in Cleveland.

After more than eight months' trial of the new golden rule policy of making arrests in Cleveland Chief of Police Kohler has pronounced it unqualifiedly a success, and accordingly in the last month has given the police the still greater power of discretion. The number of arrests in Cleveland in eight months of this year has shown a decrease of more than sixty-five per cent over the same period last year.

The golden rule policy, which Chief Kohler put into effect last January, provided that policemen should use judgment and common sense in dealing with offenses which are merely a violation of city ordinances and punishable by a small fine. They were told to take into consideration the intent to violate a law or an ordinance, and also the question of maliciousness on the part of the offender. They were instructed to warn a drunken man and send him home rather than drag him to jail on his first offense, and that two men fighting, if for the first time, should be separated, reasoned with, and not arrested.

The object of the new plan was to dispose of trivial misdemeanors without arrest and prevent the humiliation and disgrace of persons who through thoughtlessness, passion, or temper or in a spirit of frolic or mischievousness violated the law.

How well the plan has succeeded in reducing the number of arrests is shown in the following table, which covers the period from the time it was put into effect to September 1st:

Arrests in 1907.		Arrests in 1908.
January	2,158	January	911
February	2,257	February	820
March	2,711	March	939
April	2,434	April	907
May	2,731	May	888
June	2,503	June	882
July	2,900	July	1,010
August	2,898	August	1,015

Of the arrests made in the months of June, July, and August this year more than forty per cent were made on warrants obtained by persons not members of the police department on information furnished the police prosecutors. Of those in the month of August 183, or sixty-two per cent. (not considering cases continued), were allowed to go free by the police judges; in July seventy-six per cent. and June forty-three per cent. Chief Kohler has now instructed the police not to request people to get warrants for petty offenses. Instead of advising parties involved in small differences to get out warrants, the police are expected to make diligent inquiry into them and try to adjust them without recourse to the courts.—Chicago Tribune.

Mark Twain's Favorite Humorist.

A story of Mark Twain, hitherto unpublished, runs as follows:

"One Sunday afternoon my wife and I were sitting in the library, reading. I had casually picked up a book, opened it without noticing the title, and was soon absorbed. It was a humor book, and very funny, I thought. It kept me chuckling, and every few minutes I would laugh out loud. This annoyed my wife and she finally called out:

"If you intend to keep up that laughing you'll have to go somewhere else where you won't disturb me. What on earth is that book that strikes you so funny, anyway?"

"I don't know," said I. "Lemme see." Well sir, I looked, and blest if it wasn't one of my own books! I was reading."

Seventy Dollars a Word.

Perhaps the highest price ever paid for a newspaper editorial was at the rate of a little more than seventy dollars a word. Disclosures have been made of the great extent of the private fortune of Richard Croker, then boss of Tammany Hall. The New York World the next morning printed this editorial:

"Mr. Croker, where did you get it?" The editorial (that was the whole of it) had a profound effect on public sentiment. When Mr. Pulitzer, the proprietor of the World, saw it a few days later in Europe, he cabled to the management of the paper to pay $500 with his compliments to the man who wrote it.

Rest.

When God at first made man,
Placing a glass of blessing standing by,
"Let Us," said He, "pour on him all We can;
Let the world's riches which I've dispensed lie Contract into a span."

So strength first made a way,
The beauty flowed; then wisdom, honor, pleasure.
When almost all were out, God made a stay,
Perceiving that alone of all His treasure
Rest in the bottom lay.

"For if I should," said He,
"Bestow this jewel also on My creature
He would adore My gifts instead of Me,
And rest is Nature, not the God of Nature."
So both would losers be.

"Yet let him keep the gifts,
But keep them with repining restlessness;
Let him be rich and weary, that at least,
If goodness lead him not, yet weakness will,
May toss him to My breast."

Maurice V. Samuels of San Francisco, brother of the proprietors of the D. Samuels Lace House, is established in New York, where he is writing plays.

Geo. W. Cable, whose "Grandissimes" made classic the romance of Creole life, is deeply interested in home improvement clubs whose work centers at Northampton, Mass. His latest novel, "Kincaid the Battery," has just been published.

George Frederick Kunz, whose articles on "Gems" recently appeared in The Saturday Evening Post, is the gem expert of Tiffany's, in New York. He is joint author with Charles Hugh Stevenson of "The Book of the Pearl," published by the Scribners. Mr. Kunz is the discoverer of a new California gem, now known as kunzite.

Professor Barrett Wendell, of Harvard, belongs to the fifth generation of a Massachusetts family, but in dress, manner, and accent he is conspicuously English. He is aware, however, of the humor of his pose, and once remarked of a distinguished visitor from London that "he is almost as English as I am."

Leroy Scott, author of "To Him That Hath," is another literary product of Indiana. His wife is a Russian, and both he and she are ardent Socialists.

Miss Nellie Boyd, under whose management Maude Adams, when a young girl, made her first appearance on the stage, retired from the theatrical profession some years ago and is now ranching in California near Fresno.

David Wardfield uses no makeup in "The Music Master" except some powder to whiten his hair. He is a young man in the early thirties, and grew the head of long hair purposely to represent the loveable Herr von Barwig.

Lincoln Steffens, the magazine writer, is a native of Sacramento, California. His father, who still lives in Sacramento, made a comfortable fortune as a banker, and has retired from active business.

Press Comments on the Weekly.

"The California Weekly should receive the financial support of every friend of good government in this State. If the initial number is to be regarded as an index of future issues the paper will deserve unqualified approval and generous encouragement."—Pacific Outlook, Los Angeles.

"It is decidedly refreshing to note that San Francisco is to have a decent weekly publication. So long as the present management of The California Weekly remains in control the paper will prove a powerful factor for good government in the State."—Ventura Free Press.

"The California Weekly should find a place in every home in the State. It is the people's own paper and as such should command the active support of all."—Los Angeles Express.

"The California Weekly will have ideas and ideals and it will be a vehicle for the conveyance of the better thought of California."—Stockton Record.

"The purpose of The California Weekly, if lived up to, and there is every reason to believe that it will be, will give it a leading place in the best journalism of California."—Madera Tribune.

"The Cause extends to The California Weekly a cordial welcome, particularly because of its announced policy of maintaining good faith with the public, the one thing desired in newspapers nowadays."—People's Cause, Marysville.

"Men who will jump into the weekly field in San Francisco with motives as high as those which we are sure actuate the founders of The California Weekly deserve success and we hope they will find it."—Santa Cruz News.

"The first issue of The California Weekly is full of evidence that it is going to be an important and much quoted factor in State affairs hereafter. It has a broad field and we know of no men in the State better able to undertake the work than those in charge of its management."—Inyo Register.

"The first number of The California Weekly reached us this week. We are pleased to note that its staff is composed of such able, fearless and reliable journalists. Its editorials are brilliant."—Del Norte Record.

"There are none too many journals of this class in California and the Argonaut gives the new venture its cordial wishes for success and usefulness."—Argonaut.

"It is a pleasure to note the cordial reception given to The California Weekly by the press of the State. Its sincerity and honesty of purpose deserve substantial recognition by all Californians who are tired of political rottenness. Since it is not such a paper as will attract the support of the Associated Villainies it should have the hearty support of the clean men of the State."—San Francisco Star.

Announcement.

The committee in charge of the effort to erect a statue to "The Pioneer Mother," on Market Street, to stand for elemental law and order for the sake of the moral effect upon the children, has an announcement to make. The members have decided to offer prizes for the best three photos of the tableau of this subject, as follows: thirty, twenty-five, and twenty dollars.

The conditions are to be found at the Camera Club in this city or in the Grizzly Bear Magazine of the January issue. The statue is to be presented to the city as a gift by the counties of the entire State. The Native Sons and Daughters of the Golden West are furthering the efforts of the committee and it will be a labor of love for all concerned.

The spirit of the movement is expressed by the following incident: A poor widow in Haywards, named Annie Donnelly, saw mention in one of the papers regarding the idea and she asked, "And is it true now that you're going to put up a statue to the Pioneer Mother?" "Yes," was the reply, "and we have found that in many instances she crossed the Atlantic from the old country before she crossed the plains, or came around the Horn or by the way of Panama."

"Ve don't say now! And can a body do anythin' to help?"

"Oh, yes, they can give a quarter if they want to," was the answer. Mrs. Donnelly fumbled at her gown, produced a handkerchief tied in a knot, undid it and took from the small sum there a coin. "There," she exclaimed triumphantly, "there's me quarter—an' may I live to put me hand on it."

That serves as the slogan of the committee. Anyone who wishes to do likewise can leave his or her donation with Miss O'Hara at 1366 Sutter Street, at the studio of O'Hara & Livermore.

A NEW DISCOVERY

What appears to be a very important discovery has been made by a chemist in San Francisco. The proximate principles of a vegetable drug have been found which seem to act as if by magic in curing catarrh in all its forms. This new compound is sold under the name of Membro-tone. A number of cases have been absolutely cured by one or two applications. More malignant or chronic cases are usually cured in from one to three weeks. This new discovery for catarrh is especially recommended for chronic inflammation and thick mucus discharge from the nasal organs. By stopping this discharge it seems to cure coryza, catarrh of the head and stomach, frontal headache, and in many instances has restored the hearing and sense of smell.

R. J. MACHEN, 654-656 MARKET STREET
OPP. PALACE HOTEL SAN FRANCISCO

THERE was once a King in Ireland, and he had three daughters, and very nice princesses they were. And one day that their father and themselves were walking on the lawn, the king began to joke on them, and to ask them who they would like to be married to. "I'll have the King of Ulster for a husband," says one; and "I'll have the King of Munster," says another; and, "I'll have the youngest, I'll have no husband but the Brown Bear of Norway." For a nurse of hers used to be telling her of an enchanted prince that she called by that name, and she fell in love with him, and his name was the first name on her lips, for the very night before she was dreaming of him. Well, one laughed, and another laughed, and they joked on the princess all the rest of the evening. But that very night she woke up out of her sleep in a great hall that was lighted up with a thousand lamps; the richest carpets were on the floor, and the walls were covered with cloth of gold and silver, and the place was full of grand company, and the very beautiful prince that she saw in her dreams was there, and it wasn't a moment till he was on one knee before her, and telling her that he loved her, and asking her wouldn't she be his queen? Well, she hadn't the heart to refuse him, and married they were the same evening.

"Now, my darling," says he, when they were left by themselves, "you must know that I am under enchantment. A sorcerer, that had a beautiful daughter, wished me for her son-in-law; and because I didn't keep the young girl at the distance I ought, the mother got power over me, and when I refused to marry her daughter, she made me take the form of a bear by day, and I was to continue so till a lady would marry me of her own free will, and endure five years of great trials after."

Well, when the princess awoke in the morning, she missed her husband from her side, and spent the day very sorrowful. But as soon as the lamps were lighted in the grand hall, where she was sitting on a sofa covered with silk, the folding doors flew open, and he was sitting by her side the next minute. So they spent another evening so happy, and he took an opportunity of warning her that whenever she began to tire of him, or not to have any confidence in him, they would be parted forever, and he'd be obliged to marry the witch's daughter.

So she got used to finding him absent by day, and they spent a happy twelvemonth together, and at last a beautiful little boy was born; and as happy as she was before, she was twice as happy now, for she had her child to keep her company in the day when she couldn't see her husband.

At last, one evening, when herself and himself and her child were sitting with the windows open, because it was a sultry night, in flew an eagle, took the infant's sash in his beak, and flew up in the air with him. She screamed and was going to throw herself out through the window after him, but the prince caught her, and looked at her very seriously. She bethought of what he said soon after their marriage, and she stopped her cries and complaints that were on her lips. She spent her days very lonely for another twelvemonth, when a beautiful little girl was sent to her. Then she thought to herself she'd have a sharp eye about her this time; so she never would allow a window to be more than a few inches open.

But all her care was in vain. Another evening, when they were all so happy, and the prince dandling the baby, a beautiful greyhound stood before them, took the child out of the father's hand, and was out of the door before you could wink. This time she shouted, and ran out of the room, but there were some of the servants in the next room, and all declared that neither child nor dog passed out. She felt, she could not tell how, to her hus-

When the third child was born, she would hardly allow a window or a door to be left open for a moment, but she wasn't the nearer to keep the child to herself. They were sitting one evening by the fire, when a lady appeared standing by them. She opened her eyes in a great fright, and stared at her, and while she was doing so, the appearance wrapped a shawl round the baby that was sitting in its father's lap, and either sunk through the ground with it, or went up through the wide chimney. This time the mother kept her bed for a month.

"My dear," said she to her husband, when she was beginning to recover, "I think I'd feel better if I was after seeing my father, and mother, and sisters once more. If you give me leave to go home for a few days, I'd be glad." "Very well," said he, "I will do that; and whenever you feel inclined to return, only mention your wish, when you lie down at night." The next morning when she awoke, she found herself in her own old chamber in her father's palace. She rang the bell, and in a short time she had her mother, and her father, and married sisters about her, and they laughed till they cried for joy at finding her safe back again.

So in time she told them all that happened to her, and they didn't know what to advise her to do. She was as fond of her husband as ever, and said she was sure that he couldn't help letting the children go; but still she was afraid beyond the world to have another child to be torn from her. Well, the mother and sisters consulted a wise woman that used to bring eggs to the castle, for they had great confidence in her wisdom. She said the only plan was to secure the bear's skin that the prince was obliged to put on every morning, and get it burned, and then he couldn't help being a man night and day, and then the enchantment would be at an end.

So they all persuaded her to do that, and she promised she would; and after eight days she felt so great a longing to see her husband again that she made the wish the same night, and when she woke three hours after, she was in her husband's palace and himself was watching over her. There was great joy on both sides, and they were happy for many days.

Now she began to reflect how she never felt her husband leaving her of a morning, and how she never found him neglecting to give her a sweet drink out of a gold cup just as she was going to bed. So one night she contrived not to drink any of it, though she pretended to do so; and she was wakeful enough in the morning and saw her husband passing out through a panel in the wainscot, though she kept her eyelids nearly closed. The next night she got a few drops of the sleepy posset that she saved the evening before, put it into her husband's night drink, and that made him sleep sound enough. She got up after midnight, passed through the panel, and found a beautiful brown bear's hide hanging in an alcove. She stole back, and went down to the parlor fire, and put the hide into the middle of it, and never took eyes off it till it was all fine ashes. She then lay down by her husband, gave him a kiss on the cheek, and fell asleep.

If she was to live a hundred years, she'd never forget how she wakened next morning and found her husband looking down on her with misery and anger in his face. "Unhappy woman," said he, "you have separated us forever! Why hadn't you patience for five years? I am now obliged, whether I like or no, to go a three days' journey to the witch's castle, and live with her daughter. The skin that was my guard you have burned it, and the egg wife that gave you the counsel was the witch herself. I won't reproach you; your punishment will be severe enough without it. Farewell forever!"

He kissed her for the last time, and was off the next minute walking as fast as he could. She shouted after him, and seeing there was no use, she dressed herself and pursued him. He never stopped, nor stayed, nor looked back, and still she kept him in sight; and when he was on the hill she was in the hollow, and when he was in the hollow she was on the hill. Her life was almost leaving her, when just as the sun was setting, he turned up a byehyem (lane), and went into a little house. She crawled up after him, and when she got inside there was a beautiful little boy on his knees, and he kissing and hugging him. "Here, my poor darling," says he, "is your eldest child, and there," said he, pointing to a nice middle aged woman that was looking on with a smile on her face, "is the eagle that carried him away." She forgot all her sorrows in a moment, hugging her child, and laughing and crying over him. The Vantithe washed their feet, and rubbed them with an ointment that took all the soreness out of their bones and made them as fresh as a daisy. Next morning, just before sunrise, he was up, and prepared to be off. "Here," said he to her, "is a thing which may be of use to you, it's a scissors, and whatever stuff you cut with it will be turned into rich silk. The moment the sun rises, I'll lose all memory of yourself and the children, but I'll get it at sunset again; farewell!" But he wasn't far gone till he was in sight of him again, leaving her boy behind. It was the same to-day as yesterday; their shadows went before them in the morning, and followed them in the evening. He never stopped, and she never stopped, and as the sun was setting, he turned up another lane, and there they found their little daughter. It was all joy and comfort again till morning, and then the third day's journey commenced.

But before he started, he gave her a comb and told her that whenever she used it, pearls and diamonds would fall from her hair. So from sunrise to sunset he traveled on under the charm, and never threw his eye behind. This night they came to where the youngest baby was, and the next morning, just before sunrise, the prince spoke to her for the last time. "Here, my poor wife," said he, is a little hair-reel, with gold thread that has no end, and the half of our marriage ring. If you can ever get to my bed, and put your half ring to mine I will recollect you. There is a wood yonder, and the moment I enter it I will forget everything that ever happened between us, just as if I was born yesterday. Farewell, dear wife and child, forever."

Just then the sun rose, and away he walked towards the wood. She saw it open before him, and close after him, and when she came up, she could no more get in than she could break through a stone wall. She wrung her hands, and shed tears, but then she recollected herself, and cried out, "Wood, I charge you by my three magic gifts—the scissors, the comb, and the reel—to let me through; and it opened, and she went along a walk till she came in sight of a palace, and a lawn and a woodman's cottage in the edge of the wood where it came nearest the palace.

She went into this lodge and asked the woodman and his wife to take her into their service. They were not willing at first, but she told them she would ask no wages, and would give them diamonds and pearls, and silk stuffs, and gold thread whenever they wished for them. So they agreed to let her stay.

It was not long till she learned how a young prince, that had just arrived, was living in the palace as the husband of the young mistress. Herself and her mother said that they were married fifteen years before, and that he was charmed away from them ever since. He seldom stirred abroad, and every one that saw him remarked how silent and sorrowful he went about, like a person that was searching for some lost thing.

The servants and conceited folk at the palace began to take notice of the beautiful young woman at the lodge, and to annoy her with their impudent addresses. The head footman was the most troublesome, and at last she invited him to come take tea with her. Oh, how rejoiced he was, and how he bragged of it in the servants' hall! Well, the evening came, and the footman walked into the lodge and was shown to her sitting room; for the lodge-keeper and his wife stood in great awe of her, and gave her two nice rooms to herself. Well, he sat down as stiff as a ramrod and was talking in a grand style about the great doings at the castle, while she was getting the tea and toast ready. "Oh," says she to him, "would you put your hand out at the window, and cut off a sprig or two of honey-suckle?" He got up in great glee, and put out his hand and head, and said she, "by the virtue of my magic gifts, let a pair of horns spring out of your head, and surround the lodge." Just as she wished so it was. They sprang from the front of each ear, and tore round the walls till they met at the back. Oh, the poor wretch! and how he howled and roared! and the servants that he used to be boasting to were soon flocking from the castle, and grinning, and huzzing, and beating tunes on tongs and shovels and pans; and he cursing and swearing and the eyes ready to start out of his head, and he so black in the face, and kicking his legs like mad.

At last she pitied his case, and removed the charm, and the horns dropped down on the ground, and he would have killed her on the spot, only he was as weak as water, and his fellow-servants came in and carried him up to the big house.

Well, some way or other, the story came to the ears of the prince, and he strolled down that way. She had only the dress of a country-woman on her as she sat sewing at the window, but that did not hide her beauty, and he was greatly puzzled and disturbed, after he had a good look at her features, just as a body is perplexed to know whether something happened to him when he was young, or if he only dreamed it. Well, the witch's daughter heard about it, too, and she came to see the strange girl; and what did she find her doing but cutting out a pattern of a gown from brown paper; and as she cut away the paper became the richest silk she ever saw. The lady looked on with very covetous eyes, and says she, "What would you be satisfied to take for that scissors?" "I'll take nothing," says she, "but leave to spend one night in the prince's chamber, and I'll swear we'll be as innocent of any crime next morning as we were in the evening." Well, the proud lady fired up, and was going to say something dreadful; but the scissors kept on cutting, and the silk growing richer and richer every inch. So she agreed, and made her take a great oath to keep her promise.

When night came on she was let into her husband's chamber, and the door was locked, but, when she came in a tremble, and sat by the bed-side, the prince was in such a deep sleep that all she could not awake him. She sung this verse to him, sighing and sobbing, and kept singing it the night long, and it was all in vain:—

"Four long years I was married to thee;
Three sweet babes I bore to thee;
Brown bear of Norway, must you turn to me?"

At the first dawn, the proud lady was in the chamber and led her away, and the footman of the horns put out his tongue at her as she was quitting the palace.

So there was no luck so far; but the next day the prince passed by again, and looked at her, and saluted her kindly, as a prince might a farmer's daughter, and passed on; and soon the witch's daughter came by and found her combing her hair, and pearls and diamonds dropping from it.

Well, another bargain was made, and the prince spent another night of sorrow, and she left the castle at daybreak, and the footman was at his post and enjoyed his revenge.

The third day the prince went by, and stopped to talk with the strange woman. He asked her could he do anything to serve her, and she said he might. She asked him did he ever wake at night. He said he was rather wakeful than otherwise, but that during the last two nights he was listening to a sweet song in his dreams, and could not wake, and that the voice was one that he must have known and loved in some other world long ago. Says she,

"Did you drink any sleepy posset either of these evenings before you went to bed?"

"I did," said he. "The two evenings my wife gave me something to drink, but I don't know whether it was a sleepy posset or not."

"Well, prince," said she, "as you say you would wish to oblige me, you can do it by not tasting any drink this afternoon."

"I will not," says he, and then he went on his walk.

Well, the great lady was soon after the prince, and found the stranger using her hand-reel and winding threads of gold off it. The third bargain was made.

That evening the prince was lying on his bed at twilight, and his mind much disturbed; and the door opened, and in his princess walked, and down she sat by his bedside, and sung:—

"Four long years I was married to thee;
Three sweet babes I bore to thee;
Brown bear of Norway, must you turn to me?"

"Brown bear of Norway!" said he; "I don't understand you."

"Don't you remember, prince, that I was your wedded wife for four years?"

"I do not," said he, "but I am sure I wish it was so."

"Don't you remember our three babes, that are still alive?"

"Show me them. My mind is all a heap of confusion."

"Look for the half of our marriage ring that hangs at your neck, and fit it to this."

He did so, and the same moment the charm was broken. His full memory came back to him, and he flung his arms round his wife's neck, and both burst into tears.

Well, there was a great cry outside, and the castle walls were hear spitting and cracking. Every one in the castle was alarmed, and made their way out.

The prince and princess went with the rest, and by the time all were safe on the lawn, down came the building, and made the ground tremble for miles round. No one ever saw the witch and her daughter afterwards. It was not long till the prince and princess had their children with them, and then they set out for their own palace. The Kings of Ireland, and of Munster and Ulster, and their wives, soon came to visit them; and may every one that deserves it be as happy as the Brown bear of Norway and his family.

MUSIC.

By ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

(In response to the toast, "Music, rosette of arts," at the Independent Stanton Social League, New York, April 2, 1891.)

Knowing nothing of the science of music, I am not always looking for defects, or listening for discords. As the young robin cheerfully swallows whatever comes, I hear with gladness all that is played.

Music may be divided into three kinds: First, the music of simple time, without any particular emphasis—and this may be called the music of the heels; second, music in which time is varied, in which there is the eager haste and the delicious delay, that is, the fast and slow, in accordance with our feelings, with our emotions—and this may be called the music of the heart; third, the music that includes time and emphasis, the hastening and the delay, and something in addition, that produces not only states of feeling, but states of thought. This may be called the music of the head—the music of the brain.

Music expresses feeling and thought, without language. It is below and before speech, and it is above and beyond all words. Beneath the waves is the sea—above the clouds is the sky.

Before man found a name for any thought, or thing, he had hopes and fears and passions, and these were rudely expressed in tones.

Of one thing, however, I am certain, and that is, that music was born of love. Had there never been any human affection there never could have been uttered a strain of music. Possibly some mother, looking in the eyes of her babe, gave the first melody to the enraptured air.

Language is not subtle enough, tender enough, to express all that we feel; and when language fails, the highest and deepest longings are translated into music. Music is the sunshine—the climate—of the soul, and it floods the heart with a perfect June.

I am also satisfied that the greatest music is the most marvelous mingling of love and death. Love is the greatest of all passions, and death is its shadow. Death gets all its terror from love, and love gets its intensity, its radiance, its glory, and its rapture, from the darkness of death. Love is a flower that grows on the edge of the grave.

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

Beginnings of Our National Constitution.

It has been carelessly said, and often repeated, that the framers of the Constitution of the United States made the document out of new cloth, that they assembled and, after four months, and out of the plenitude of their aggregated wisdom, gave the world a form of government new to human history.

They did nothing of the kind. They merely adapted to new conditions, and an enlarged sphere of action, principles of government with which they had been familiar all their lives and which they had inherited from their ancestors both on this side of the Atlantic and across that sea.

The whole of the Teutonic races, from which the framers of the constitution sprung, had, from remotest history, been characterized by the legislative habit. This habit survived in the formation of the British constitution and it was from that source, mainly, that the framers of our constitution got their inspiration. If the debt was not properly acknowledged at the time it was because relations with the Britons had been somewhat strained and a too palpable copying after the institutions of the mother country might have jeopardized the acceptance of the constitution.

Just at that time Americans were looking to France—to Rousseau and Montesquieu and other French doctrinaires, but especially to Montesquieu, for sound doctrine in relation to governments and the rights of man. Continental Europe was at that time almost oriental in its acceptance of absolutism and Montesquieu had made the study of the British constitution and laws the basis of his philosophy.

A third chain of incidents leads to the same source for our national constitution. The Atlantic coast colonies were all settled from the mother country and generally under chartered companies which guaranteed to the colonists the rights of Englishmen. These charters were committed to writing which accustomed the colonists to formal statement and to the drafting of public instruments, as Englishmen had not been, yet the free cities of England existed under written charters so that the idea of a written constitution has never been wholly unknown to the Teutonic peoples since they learned how to write. What was Magna Charta but a written constitution?

When Independence was declared there was no marked change in the lives and laws of the people in the colonies. All but two of the colonies drafted and adopted state constitutions and these two continued under their old British charters as serving the same purpose well enough. The Articles of Confederation were an experiment and that experiment did not work. In a full knowledge of that fact the constitutional convention cast the experimental articles aside and returned to principles and usages with which they had been familiar and under which they had been, and were then, living. What these familiar principles and usages did not cover they borrowed either from the British constitution directly or indirectly through Montesquieu.

Let us, as good Americans, proud of our mother country, from whom we have long since ceased to be estranged, frankly admit that, whether we trace the origin of the Constitution of the United States back through the constitutions of the colonies and the royal charters, by virtue of which those colonies were founded, or whether we trace the essential features of our constitution to the same source through Rousseau and Montesquieu or whether we admit that the framers of the immortal document went directly to the British Constitution for their example and inspiration, we built on the same foundation that English men built on, and have only modified our common Teutonic heritage to meet our special needs, as Englishmen have modified the same heritage to meet their special needs. We are grounded in the same past that Englishmen are and as well and safely grounded as are they.

From the British king, lords and commons we got our president, senate and house of representatives. The Common Law of England is the common law of America. Theoretically we have separated our functions of government into three co-ordinate, yet independent departments, the legislative, executive and judicial. Practically they are not very independent and not very thoroughly co-ordinated. We have never been able, and probably never shall be able, fully to realize that Montesquieuian ideal. He found it in the British constitution, notwithstanding the fact that it wasn't there, and we got the idea from him.

This harking back to original sources is not unprofitable. It shows that ours is no wild-eyed experiment in government. Our republic grew and is still growing on lines essentially parallel to the growth of the British Empire.

Do You Hear Well?

The Stolz Electrophone—A New, Electrical, Scientific and Practical Invention for those who are Deaf or Partially Deaf.

MAY NOW BE TESTED IN YOUR OWN HOME.

Deaf or partially deaf people now may make a trial of the Stolz Electrophone at home. This personal, practical test serves to prove that the device satisfies, with ease, every requirement of a perfect hearing device.

This new invention renders unnecessary such clumsy, unsightly and frequently harmful devices as trumpets, horns, tubes, ear drums, fans, etc. It is a tiny electric telephone that fits on the ear and which, the instant it is applied, magnifies the sound waves in such manner as to cause an astonishing increase in the clearness of all sounds. It overcomes the buzzing and roaring ear noises and, also, so constantly and electrically exercises the vital parts of the ear, that usually, the natural unaided hearing itself is gradually restored.

THE PLEDGE OF CITIZENSHIP

I, a citizen of the United States of America, realizing that a free Republic is an impossibility unless the citizen performs his civic duty, hereby pledge myself upon my sacred honor never to fail to exercise my right of citizenship by voting at every election, primary or secondary, wherever it is possible and legal for me to render that service to my country, my health permitting me so to do.

In taking this pledge it is distinctly understood that I in no way obligate myself to vote for any particular party, any definite candidate or any certain measure. I am binding myself only to my Country, and pledging myself solely to the faithful performance of the duty I owe to her as a citizen.

WHY TAKE THE FOREGOING PLEDGE?

Those taking the foregoing pledge, signing and sending it to this office, will be enrolled upon The California Weekly's "School for Citizenship," which will be a permanent feature of this paper. It will entitle the person sending in his name to have answered, either through the columns of the paper or by letter, any rational question he may ask concerning public affairs, and, generally, by the person best equipped to afford the desired information. It will also entitle the signer to such special literature bearing upon the obligations and opportunities of good citizenship as may from time to time be issued. While this pledge is open to persons of all ages it is especially desired that it be taken and sent in by young men lately become voters or who will cast their first votes two years hence. It will take but a moment to clip out the pledge, sign, enclose in an envelope, stamp and address to "School for Citizenship," office The California Weekly, 16 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, and it opens the way for a liberal education in citizenship.

THE SPIRIT OF CHRISTMAS.

The spirit of Christmas changes with the times. Once it was a pure seasonal festival, the rejoicing of a Northern people, imprisoned in dark and cold, at the turning of the sun and the promise of coming spring. Then the heathen feast and the Christian anniversary of the Nativity were combined, and both elements have persisted until now in the traditional observances of the day, Santa Claus, with all his Christianized name is a heathen troll, and the Christmas tree, the yule log and the ceremonial feasting all breathe the atmosphere of the ancient North, before the long-forecasted catastrophe of Ragnarok, when the old gods died and the new religion of light came in. But all the explicit teachings of the day, the religious services, and the veneration of the Christ-child hark back to the Manger of Bethlehem. It is perhaps natural that the consciously Christian part of the customs should be more predominant in Catholic Southern Europe, where Christianity is older, and the Roman paganism was more completely abolished than in Protestant Northern Europe, where the minor gods of the old religions linger to this day in the elves and gnomes and trolls of popular myth. The partial paganization of American Christmas customs is a tribute to the German influence. Our Puritan forefathers, in New England, scorned Christmas, while their more conformist compatriots in the South celebrated it in English fashion. But now we all celebrate both Christmas and Easter after the more picturesque customs of the fatherland. The spirit of the German forests, from which our free civilization emerged, has come to its own.

In the modern spirit Christmas has become the children's day. The Christ-child embodies the divinity of childhood. Santa Claus is the children's friend, and this is the children's season. On this day the children are granted their due place, as the chief citizens of their generation. All other days, in truth, are lived for them, but this one day is devoted to the express recognition of that fact. It is the happiest time in the year, because it is the truest time. On this day the Child rules, and unselfish love is universal. On this day we practice the divine doctrine of that Child of Nazareth, which the rest of the year we empty profess. Because, for one day, the hates and greeds and jealousies of mankind are suspended, the spark of divinity in human nature is annually rekindled, and never quite goes out. In very truth, "a little child shall lead them," for it is the love of children and the unspoiled spirit of childhood that keeps alive everything else worth while in the world. It is only as men desire better things for their children than they have attained for themselves that human progress is possible. If the spirit of Christmas could extend over the year, this gloomy old world would be glorified.

IT LOOKS GOOD TO US.

The synopsis of a draft for a direct primary law, submitted by the Direct Primary League for public information and criticism, preparatory to being submitted to the legislature, looks good on the surface, but nothing short of a careful scrutiny of the bill itself will warrant unstinted advocacy. The lameness of this bill is that it will permit nominations by a small minority of the whole vote cast and herein lies the advantage of the "push." By drawing into the general scramble as many good candidates as possible to divide the conscientious vote, and then plumping the solidified "push" vote of the principal cities, indifferent men may be placed in nomination. We shall probably, in time, resort to pre-primary caucuses and conventions for placing candidates before primaries to have the defects of such caucuses and conventions cured. Or we shall turn to the principles embodied in the Stetson bill of two years ago which provided that where forty per cent. of the party votes were cast for a candidate he should become the party nominee. Failing in this the nominations must go to a convention of delegates individually instructed at the primaries and relieved from instructions only as nominations are successively made by dropping the lowest candidates at each ballot for the same office.

THE OLD YEAR OUT.

With the going out of the old year San Francisco is getting back to its own. Its downtown streets are thronged as they used to be in the good old, care-free days when the greater portion of the population lived that life might be enjoyed rather than that results might be accomplished. Prior to April 18, 1906, San Francisco was a pleasure-loving city. No other American city so sustained the opera in proportion to population. No other city of its size was so good a "show town" and in no other American city could the gastronome find life so well worth the living at the price.

The great catastrophe sobered San Francisco without daunting it. It gave it something imperative to do and it has been doing it. It has so far accomplished its task as to invite its neighbors to a house-warming, and a right jolly time those will have who accept the New Year invitation. There will be no lack of color or of light, of music or of merriment, of viands for the inner man or of spectacular effects for the outer. In short, with the going out of the old year San Francisco is to put off the habiliments of a long-continued Lent to become herself again, the light-hearted city of America.

And yet it is inconceivable that the lessons of the last two and three-fourths years have been lost on San Francisco. Rebuilding the city has not been a harder struggle than rebuilding civic rectitude. No problems in engineering take precedence over problems of civil government and no architectural ideals, no matter how well worked out, can add more to the attractiveness of San Francisco than the establishment of even-handed justice and the vindication of fundamental laws. The earthquake and fire taught San Francisco much. The struggle with predatory wealth entrenched in graft, or graft entrenched in predatory wealth, whichever way the case is stated, should teach San Francisco more, and the memory of the one should be as lasting as the memory of the other.

San Francisco is only partly Saxon. It is the happier, gayer city for that. The Saxon was wont to take his hardships grumblingly and live sourly with his poverty and discontent. Not so the Latin. Poverty and oppression could not so weigh upon his soul as to deprive it of the right to happiness, and San Francisco has a dash of Latin in its constitution. Therefore San Francisco has borne its burden with Saxon sturdiness and Latin buoyancy. It has met grave dangers gallily and has achieved splendid results as though they had been everyday occurrences.

The new San Francisco will neither shake down nor burn up. May we not hope that the new civic superstructure may prove as enduring? If so we may bid the old year adieu with satisfaction, otherwise our firm building will prove vain. Neither structural steel nor concrete re-enforced can make a city. It takes men.

TELL THE STORY.

When the trial of Patrick Calhoun comes on, let us hope for at least a square defense, not a sneak and a wriggle. The law does not compel a defendant to take the stand, but all principles of gentlemanly honor do, and Patrick Calhoun prates much of honor. There are ways of wriggling out of jail, through the back-door keyhole, but they are not the ways of dignity and honor. Whoever uses them thereby announces that his sufficient aspiration is to keep out of jail. If that is Calhoun's ambition, there is no law to prevent him from seeking it. But if he aspires again to hold up his head among gentlemen, and to look honest men in the face, he must make his defense before the court of honor, by its rules, as well as before the court of law by its quibbles.

What the defense will be, if it is squarely made, nobody is authorized to say. But it has been whispered these two years that the money was paid to Ruef ostensibly as a "fee," but actually under the duress of moral extortion. That the money was not paid, no one has even suggested. That Calhoun had any doubt that he was buying Ruef is scarcely thinkable; but there was no law against bribing Ruef. That he was expressly informed that the money was to be divided with the supervisors is improbable. Such deals are not made that way. But that he understood what would be done admits of no intelligent doubt. The question is whether that understanding can be shown to constitute a legal crime. And the question of public honor will be whether Calhoun can show that he was submitting to what amounted in morals to extortion.

If Calhoun can get an acquittal by telling his story, that is his privilege. If he thinks he can gain any restoration of public honor by telling it, that is his risk. We will not forestall the probabilities of it. But the people have a right to expect of Calhoun, even if the law does not, that whatever his story is, he tell it like a man, and stand cross-examination on it.

"FACTIONS."

Evidently the new Globe is to be no more inspiring a specimen than was the old. Listen to this, anent the Ruef and Murphy trials: "The civic atmosphere in San Francisco has cleared perceptibly since the Ruef and Murphy trials are ended. Each faction can now claim a victory, and both should be willing to bury the hatchet, at least until the holiday season is over."

"Each faction!" Bah! Whoever calls honesty and dishonesty two "factions" thereby allies himself with the dishonest faction. If Murphy was not guilty, there is no faction indecent enough to want him punished. If Ruef was not guilty, there is nobody fenshish enough to regard his conviction as a "victory." But if there is any honest doubt of Ruef's guilt, no organ of graft, for hire or for love, has had the courage or the impudence to say so. Then, if Ruef is guilty, and there is any "faction" that did not want him found guilty, that faction is a criminal faction, and has no right which honest men should respect. It is not a fine aloofness, that regards this struggle of law against crime as a game, in which the victory belongs to whoever plays it best. It is contemptible dishonesty. Here was a case in which the issue was to determine, not who was guilty, but whether the forces of law or lawlessness are the stronger. It was a "victory," indeed, but not for a "faction"—unless the suppression of public stealing is a factional cause; and whoever says that is both a thief and an anarchist at heart.

It is the common cry, whenever Right and Wrong are at issue, "Get together"; "harmony"—but Wrong shall be the harmonizer. Grafters and law-breakers will not object to honest men remaining honest; provided the honest men do not interfere with their equal right to graft and break the laws. Party "harmony" means that those who oppose the corrupt machine shall cease from opposing, while those who favor it shall continue in control. The only object is to "win" anyway, and whoever risks losing, in the effort to win right, is a disharmonizer.

There is no discussing such arguments with patience or respect. They may be some sympathy for thieves. They had their temptations and their motives. But there can be none for the preachers of thievery. Whether they bespeak an evil mind or a hired hypocrisy, the alternatives are equally contemptible.

PAYABLE ON DEMAND.

The dollar has been said to be an order drawn by society upon society, payable on demand without any if's or and's about it. That is why people like the dollar so well and why they struggle so hard to get it. All of the demand orders which society draws are good for their face if drawn with a determination that they shall be honored upon the instant, but, in most cases, society has fallen into the way of drawing drafts payable any old time and such drafts are paid any old time if at all.

It is so with the establishment of justice, with efficiency in municipal and State government, in compulsory education, public sanitation in keeping the streets and highways clean and in repair. The obligations exacted by society from those who serve it are all extensions of credit and, as long as they are so, payment will be long deferred or repudiated.

Had public sentiment in San Francisco, with unanimity, demanded convictions in the graft cases, where guilt has virtually been confessed time and again, convictions and punishment would have followed. Had public sentiment demanded the elimination from the bar of all those who obtained admission to it that they might the safer practice rascality instead of law those attorneys who have devoted their cunning powers to the lawful nullifying of the law would long since have been eliminated. Had the men of California demanded that the political bureau of the Southern Pacific Company go out of business it would have gone out and California would not have been for almost a full generation a political dependency of that company. Had our social order demanded that the millionaire, haled before the bar of justice, should stand there the equal and only the equal of the middle-class man, divested of special privileges and immunities, it would have been so from the start. Every demand order which society draws will be honored at sight if backed with a firmness that lets every delinquent know that society means it.

Here is the whole trouble with California and with San Francisco and her sister cities. The people have not really cared. They have not really and affirmatively cared to have justice administered promptly and impartially, to have taxes expended wisely and economically, to have transportation conducted as impartially as tariff taxation and made as reasonable in charges as the cost of service should require. There may have been in the public mind a moral assent to efficiency and justice, but nothing akin to a demand to make good, as society has demanded that the dollar be made good.

If we are to have good government, a speedy and efficient establishment of justice and a dollar's worth of service for a dollar's worth of pay, public sentiment must shake itself together and get ready to act. It must make all of its drafts payable on demand, without days, weeks, months, and years of grace. There is no other way. If British justice is more certain than American, it is because John Bull will have it so while Brother Jonathan is easy going and not very particular. Such laxness implies a decay in moral fibre, and a decay in moral fibre implies a need for a moral regeneration. It is time for each individual citizen to go into executive session with himself as to the quality of his citizenship. Only such social orders as are emphasized, are worth the paper they are written on.

THE LEGISLATURE.

Now come the holidays, and then the legislature. The legislature, this time, will start out with many advantages—and one fatal handicap. Its members will be adequately paid, and will have time to do their work. The constitution itself has restricted their patronage loot, so they will not begin their career by the public spectacle of petty larceny. The personnel of the new legislature is better than the average, and there are very few downright hoodlums in its membership, even from San Francisco. The legislature will be more intelligently watched than any California legislature ever was before, and there will be a disposition, on the part even of the daily press, to make criticism effectively discriminating. If things go wrong, the State will know it, but it will know just what is wrong, who did it, and why. There is important constructive legislating to do, with intelligent information on which to base it. The legislature can make a good record if it will.

The one obstacle is the known fact that a majority of the members of the legislature were nominated by conventions under the control of the railroad "organization"; that the State executive committee of the party is notoriously and unanimously under that control; that the presiding officers of both houses will be men who went to the railroad bosses for their places, and made terms, and that it will be a known fact that every man who stands against the "organization" will have his local bills discriminated against. To stand against such a condition requires courage—more courage than the average legislature possesses. Possibly it can be made more unsafe, though, to stand against the people than to stand against the machine.

There are prospects of at least two pieces of reform legislation—the anti-race-gambling bill and the direct primary. But it will take watching to prevent even these reforms from being juggled. Fortunately the watching will be done.

WHO WILL MAKE THE WHEELS GO ROUND?

No one doubts that we are living in an age of exasperating materialism. The dollar looms large and in the pursuit of it men with the money hunger upon them, slave early and late, take little time for recreation and none at all for self culture. All the saps within them are forced into fruiting dollars out on the ends of the twigs, leaving little or nothing for leasure, but they feel that at whatever cost they must get on. This is truer of smallish men with great ambitions than of bigger men with whom great enterprises come easy, but it is measurably true of every man in business, of every man with an ambition to get on.

There are those who grumble because of the disinclination of organized labor to work long hours, but where else shall we look for so sane and wholesome a standard for working as the eight-hour day with Saturday half holidays? Given steady employment at wages so good that one may support himself and family in wholesome, common sense comfort with forty-four hours of labor in the week—just enough to keep the blood tingling and the body healthy—what more can anything but slothfulness ask of Providence or of any industrial system?

Let us give organized labor credit for knowing what it wants, for taking the contrast to ask for it, away from it. Suppose that it has worked out a philosophy of life it proceeds to put it into concrete form. It is not satisfied with contemplating it in the abstract and with yearning for it as for the unattainable. Besides, old age pensions and employers' liability for accidents are upon the threshold of realization. What a splendid example has organized labor set for employers, our big and little captains of industry, to follow! What an example set for men who slave all day seven days in the week and then take their business cares to bed with them at night to worry over them in their troubled dreams! Suppose that they were to follow that example, then what? Suppose that, having filled their barns with much store, they were to withdraw from their self-appointed tasks and proceed to feed their starved souls, eat, drink and be merry, who would make the wheels of industry go round?

Our ideal labor system, including a living wage, eight hours of work a day, except on Saturday when there is a half holiday, old-age pensions and employers' liability, all rest upon the presumption that there shall be work for all to do. What guaranty is there that there will be? How can there be if, as prophesied, our age of materialism is succeeded by an age of idealism as intense, an idealism that shall replace money hunger with hunger for culture and comfort, an idealism that will make fashionable families content to furnish their homes with oak instead of mahogany? We have seen a slowing up of industrial enterprise during the last year and what hardship has it caused! Suppose that the mad rush for dollars should give place to a moderate wish to be merely well off, thus making the slowing-up permanent?

There runs a vague notion through the industrial mind that Society owes it to every man willing to work that there shall be work whenever he wants work, but Society has so far found no way of making the wheels of general industry go round. Individuals with the money hunger upon them have devised ways and means for making wheels fairly spin, but that has heretofore been an individual, not a social, problem.

These things are not said to disparage the eight-hour day or any of the good things that organized labor has achieved for itself. They are not said by way of justifying our present day mad rush for wealth. Great evils flow from it. They are said merely that thoughtful persons may give heed to the query: If there comes a slowing up in our national haste to get on who is to make the wheels of industry go round?

It is only from the newer-settled States of the Union that complaint of soil deterioration is heard. The older States have learned that no one can check against a bank account with never a deposit made to the credit side and not have the credit exhausted, but the younger States are just awakening to the idea. California is, in this respect, a younger State.

PUTTING UP A GOOD FIGHT.

One of the most cheering incidents of the holiday season is the bold front being made to prevent the trans-continental railroads raising their traffic rates merely because they want to. In times gone by our merchants would hardly have dared so to beard that lion in his den. They would have expected from some source punishment for their contumacy. There has been great gain when business men have come to dare to question the right of railroads to do as they will with the business of our country and coast.

Railroad rate fixing is a phase of taxation and the power to tax is one of the highest functions of government. If rates were made up of terminal charges, and per ton per mile uniform rates for hauling commodities of whatever kind, the element of taxation might be wanting, but as soon as commodities are classified for rate making with regard to value, to what the traffic will bear, and other similar considerations that enter into making freight rates, the power that adjusts these rates is, no matter who exercises it, as much a power of taxation as the making of a schedule of custom house duties. It is a function of government and should be at least supervised by government.

Our commercial bodies have done well, too, to make representations regarding the capitalization upon which the business of country and coast is to be asked to pay dividends. There is no more obligation upon the patrons of a road to maintain its securities at high-pressure valuations than there is upon patrons of farms to maintain their valuations at top-notch prices through good seasons and bad seasons, high prices and low. These valuations must go up and down as conditions vary, and commercial conditions do vary about as the water in a steam gauge varies from instant to instant.

There is no disguising the fact that railroad rate making is a complicated affair and, under a plenary governmental supervision, the railroads should have liberal powers of initiative in making up their tariffs. Under such supervision they may be justified in taxing one industry what it can stand in order that the common good may be subserved by saving another industry from destruction. The power of taxation may thus, but only thus, be invoked.

We are moving steadily toward a plenary control of transportation by government and State. Every overt act makes for progress along that line. The refusal of Mr. Harriman to answer questions propounded by the Interstate Commerce Commission, as to what use he had made of millions belonging to the Union Pacific Company, and the sustaining of his contention by a bare majority of the Supreme Court of the United States, will make for a further extension of the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The resistance our commercial bodies are making to a self-determined advance of rates by the railroads and for the railroads, will help along that forward movement. In short the autocratic policy of railroad managers will put an end to the autocratic powers of those managers. The common good of all, expressed through the common voice of all, must fix these schedules of freight and fares which involve the prosperity of all and, in the performance of this function, government must be as just to the railroads as to shippers and travelers.

It is a hopeful sign that the direct primary idea has reached the stage where alleged molders of public opinion quarrel over which of them was first to suggest it. By the way, has the date of Mr. Herrin's advocacy of the direct primary been definitely fixed?

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

No matter what any intelligent person's attitude toward Jesus of Nazareth may be he will not question that there has been no other personality comparable to His in its effect upon the race. Claiming nothing for Him not to be found in some measure in other great characters, rating Him merely as a man for comparison with other men, nevertheless His pre-eminence among all men of all times and races will not be questioned.

And yet there have come down to us only about forty thousand words that He is said to have said, and these things were said in the morning of a younger manhood cut off from that maturity and fuller development vouchsafed most of the world's sages, with whom some might venture to compare Him. Take this character and this day and the ramifications of this influence at this time and strip it of all claims to the supernatural or preternatural, yet what a marvel it becomes in our eyes!

Then think of the volumes that have been written about this man and His work, this life and the teachings of His life, and the millions of sermons preached in all lands and all tongues during the fifty-seven generations that have passed since He was born, without exhausting the subject, still leaving dips and angles in character and teachings for new generations of writers and speakers to explore! Is it not the surpassing wonder of all wonders?

The California Weekly is not sectarian. It abhors denominational controversy, but there is nothing in the policy that has been marked out for it that binds it to the importance of the greatest fact in human history. It even essays to contribute, from a borrowed source, a somewhat unusual though significant comment upon one facet of that marvelous personality. Reference is made to the unfinishing moral courage of Jesus.

Not that others have not discovered this also, though we seldom hear it commented upon, but, asked what in the character of Jesus most strongly appealed to him, Kang Yu Wei, the banished Chinese reformer and scholar, declared that it was His unfinishing moral courage. His calm, resolute, unflinching and unimpassioned willingness to endure all things and suffer all things for the sake of the work for which He felt He had come into the world. Jesus was no secker after notoriety, no inflated devotee courting martyrdom. With a prescience given to few He foresaw that, quite apart from any doctrinal idea of a vicarious atonement for the sins of a world, He would, if he were left, inevitably make a martyr of men to Him. Who, reflecting upon the course of human history from His day to ours, can doubt that the concept of Christ upon the cross has touched more dead hearts into life than any other influence flowing from that unrivaled source? With a purely human desire He would have preferred that the cup pass from Him, but it was not possible if His mission were to be filled full. Who He quaffed the cup to his dregs. With what a quiet steadfastness of purpose did He set His face toward Jerusalem when He knew that it meant death to go up at that time, but it meant the culmination of His work, the emancipation of the race and the price was not too great to pay.

This lesson of steadfast moral courage is especially physical at this time. Physical bravery is a cheap thing by comparison. Men may be hired to display it at $13 per month, yet San Francisco has opulent citizens who have not the courage of their convictions. It has been said that "politics makes cowards of us all," but business makes a hundred cowards where politics makes one. Let it be remembered to the credit of organized labor that it has the courage of its convictions and dare suffer hardship for what it feels to be its duty. Is this why its followers are mainly among workday people? Must prosperous men always love their possessions more than justice, more than human rights, more than duty or country?

General Webb to the Rescue.

It was announced some little time ago that Attorney General U. S. Webb had set himself to the task of drafting a railroad regulation law that will not be a dead letter on the statute books, that will give our State railroad commission something to do and the railroads of the State a law that they may be made answerable to. Good! General Webb is a man of ability. If he sets himself to such a task he can make good. It is in him to draft a law that will commend itself to the intelligence and sound judgment of the best men of California, but is he likely to do it? He is an "organization" man. Whatever of political preference has come to him has come through the benign influence of the head of the political bureau of the Southern Pacific Company. This does not close the door of opportunity to U. S. Webb. He has only to declare his freedom to be made free. There are signs that he may have done this. The pressure to thrust him into the graft cases as representing the paramount power of the State must have suggested the squeezing of a cotton compress, but he withstood it. Men of California are warranted in watching General Webb with open minds. Barring the item of expense the State Railroad Commission has been as though it had not been. To the people who elected it it has been a corky turnip, a ripe cucumber. To the railroad company that has owned it it has been three stacks of rust worth owning only that it might be kept out of opposition hands. If General Webb will draft a bill that, enacted into law, will make the State Railroad Commission serviceable, and the transportation companies amenable to it, he will become the greatest man in California and we shall all low-kow before him. But the bill must be enacted into law and that, too, will be mainly up to General Webb. He can have the manhood of California at his back in this task if he will let it be known just what he proposes to do and how he proposes to do it. To this end The California Weekly heartily tenders its good offices.

The Sheriffs and Their Petty Graft.

The sheriffs of California are reported to have resolved to resist the efforts to be made by the State Lunacy Commission, and the State Board of Examiners, to relieve their offices from the task of taking patients from the counties where adjudged insane to the asylums where committed. Report also has it that if the reform is persisted in the State Lunacy Commission itself may be abolished. Herebefore the sheriffs of the State, or those who speak in their name, have put up a stiff bluff in defense of their petty graft and a stiff bluff has served the purpose. The reformers have been too timid to put an end to a system that is a disgrace to California. The present system is indefensible except on the ground that there is a petty graft in it. This graft does not so much go to the sheriffs as to the political odd-jobs men who hang around sheriff's offices waiting for a chance to turn a little easy money now and again and if, in doing so, they can contrive to get pay for a carriage they do not hire, or work in a charge of a dollar for a meal that cost them two-bits, they are doubly elated. To them it is of no consequence that they know nothing of how to handle insane persons, that they treat them like wild animals when they are merely sick people, sick with the most pathetic of all forms of illness, and needing to be handled with tenderest care by persons especially trained to that work. There is scarcely a self-respecting State in the Union that has not put an end to this iniquity and if the Lunacy Commission does not fight the sheriffs like killing snakes it is because its moral courage is overmastered by its political cowardice. That has been the trouble heretofore.

A Splendid Purpose In Life.

Mr. Rudolph Spreckels was recently called to Honolulu. While there he is reported by cable to have declared that his one purpose in life shall be to compel common honesty in public affairs. Than this no higher purpose can inspire the mind of any man. There is no other need comparable with this. The tide of our everyday patriotism has ebbed low. We have, as citizens, loved our country as expressed in hills and valleys, in rivers and bays and broad sweeps of plain, but we have been willing enough to rob its government. We have loved our several States and have been jealously boastful of their material resources, but we have dodged taxation at every step and have loaded down official service with dead timber. We have so loved our cities and towns that no man of us has been known to understate the population of the community in which we live, but we have given grudgingly of our time to public service and have not hesitated to press the claims of unfit friends for political jobs they were incompetent to fill. Commonly honest in private affairs, we have been uncommonly dishonest in dealing with our country, State and city. If Mr. Spreckels shall devote the remainder of his years to rectifying this unwholesome condition he will, though a patriot of peace, deserve as well of posterity as any patriot that wartime may have produced. The evil is deep-seated and has been capitalized for hundreds of millions. Mr. Spreckels is unlikely to prove a second Alexander signing for more worlds to conquer. The task he has cut out for himself will last him to the end.

Reform and a Reformatory.

Persons interested in public affairs will feel indebted to Mr. Oscar K. Cushing for his thoughtful article to be found elsewhere in this paper, in advocacy of a State reformatory. Mr. Cushing has given much attention to the subject and the special knowledge he has gained gives him a right to be heard upon the subject. But a State Reformatory will amount to little without a reforming of political standards in the State. Elmira Reformatory had to fight as for its life to keep out of the hands of so-called practical politicians and, for a season, it made a losing fight and its influence for good became almost nil, but the conscience of the citizenry of New York revolted, the politicians were routed and the institution released to a valued service. Public sentiment in California has been lax in this regard. Our prisons and reform schools have been made merchandise of, with the result that not one institution of the kind is what it should be. If a State reformatory could be made a probationary repository for practical politicians until they learn that State institutions have a higher purpose than furnishing places for political odd-jobs men it would pay for itself in a year. California needs a reformatory for first offenders and with it is needed an aroused public sentiment that will not tolerate the subjugation of the spirit of reform to the exigencies of political place-hunting. A State reformatory with an aroused and sustained public conscience back of it can work wonders for delinquent citizens of California.

When Ruef Passed the Word.

In the light of recent events what must be the emotions that thrill gentlemen of San Francisco who, during past years, have sat in conventions not knowing how they were to vote until Ruef passed the word? There are hundreds of them, men of character and station, who went to convention after convention and never once dared to venture an opinion as to how they would vote until Ruef had passed the word along the line. About how small ought a full-grown man to feel after having served obediently under such a boss? The recollection of it should make a man feel that he belonged to the vermin family. Is it not about time to have done with that kind of politics? It is one thing for adult men to go into convention and, having thoroughly threshed out issues pending, agree upon a line of policy and follow it, even though individuals have to subordinate their preference to the common will, but it is quite another to wait unknowingly and then vote obediently as some boss may give the order. This subordination of manhood to boss dictation is a good thing to put a stop to and the spectacle which Ruef makes in the eyes of the world should help to stop it. No man is likely to brag to posterity of having marched behind his banner.

An Apologist For Divorce.

Rabbi Joseph Krauskopf of Chicago has taken up the cudgel in support of our American custom of granting divorces to those who want them merely because they want them, claiming that the final result is going to prove most beneficial. As he sees it the result will be that women will demand, and receive, the same consideration from husbands that husbands demand, and receive, from wives, and that there will not continue to be one standard of virtue for women and another for men, but that both will come to woman's standard. He is of the opinion that Europe would be much the better, less licentious and more domestic, if as liberal divorce laws prevailed there as here. That is one point of view. There is another, that of the children. If the contracting parties were the only ones involved divorce might be liberally allowed, but if Rabbi Krauskopf will make a study of the problems of delinquent and dependent childhood in America he will find the all sufficient explanation in broken homes, broken by death it may be, but more often by separation, desertion and divorce. The need in this country is to hold families together, for the sake of childhood, to impress upon those about to contract marriage the permanency of the obligations assumed, to force delinquent husbands and wives to carry out their marriage contracts. There are cases where divorces are proper enough, but not to the extent of one out of every twelve marriages. Two divorces out of the hundred marriages would come nearer the mark.

Few instances of predatory perversity exceed in rawness the refusal of street railroads to protect pedestrians with rationally devised fenders for their cars. Other cities have solved the problem; and why not our own? Los Angeles has done so in a substantial if inartistic way. Basket arrangements projecting beyond the front of the car are artistically unattractive but, neatly housed under the car, their only office is to prevent the desecration of the remains after the steel-shod battering ram of a car front has knocked the framework of the victim into an inextricable tangle. It is such cold-blooded disregard for human life as this that incites the public mind to hatred of public service corporations.

Not much is to be expected from a legislator who frankly admits, in private conversation, that he does not expect to represent the constituents who voted for him except as he may do so without being disobedient to the man who furnished the means for making his campaign. It will not be otherwise until the State devises a method of meeting the necessary expenses of every candidate for office out of a common fund and rigorously prohibits all expenditures not strictly necessary. The man who pays the freight will get the goods every time.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By ALL-OF-US.

Among politicians the belief stands ground that Governor Gillett regards himself as a promising candidate for re-election, and the question is being asked how many other persons take the same view of his availability? There has not been, and there could not be expected at this time, any declaration of opinion or intention on the part of the "organization," for although without its powerful aid the Governor could have no hope of succeeding himself, and probably would not try; it is contrary to organization traditions in politics to commit itself by making untimely pledges. It will be for the Governor first to show that he has some elements of personal strength with the voters before the power which nominated and elected him will undertake the task a second time. Re-election of governors in California is something which so far, has proved too much even for an almost invincible combination of railroad and professional politicians. Up to this time the opinion that the Governor could be re-elected is the personal possession of himself and a few of his immediate friends. Of course the events of the coming winter, when the Legislature will be in session for two months or more, will determine the fate of the second Gillett boom. Within certain limitations the Governor's destiny is in his own hands, and the way in which he will dispose of a number of marked measures which are coming up will now or make him. And a legislative session is much more likely to mar than to make a governor. The mass of voters obtained a pretty clear idea of the Governor's attitude toward Southern Pacific politics during the session of 1907, and they are not so greatly deceived next time, although it is well understood that this time the railroad policy will be to "protect" the governor and all other friends, so far as possible, by not putting them in a position in which they would be compelled to do anything for a corporation which would look especially bad.

The Governor is said to be relying largely on his good roads bond proposition to reinstall him in popular favor. He has a scheme for the issue of $18,000,000 of State bonds to build highways all over California, and he believes that a majority of voters will be so glad to get good roads that they will not particularly count the cost and that in all the counties the people will hail with delight the proposal to issue bonds, so long as the State agrees to bear on its back the heavier part of the burden of interest and redemption. It may be so, and yet the fate of the seawall and India Basin bonds voted on at the recent election shows that the people of California are not indiscriminate bonders.

In the offices of all the State boards and commissions in San Francisco the commissioners are discussing their chances of securing salary increases, and the report comes from Sacramento that the Capitol building is humming like a beehive with discussions of the same interesting topic. For it is assumed that the amendment raising the salaries of the eight principal officers of the State becomes effective at once, and also that the Legislature will proceed to increase the pay of all clerks from $133 per month to $150, as permitted by the amendment. This would alone call for a considerable amount of the taxpayers' money, but it would be only a beginning, because the higher-paid deputies and the heads of a long list of departments and commissions would claim the right to share in the increase. In short, something like a horizontal raise of salaries will be attempted, if the Legislators, whose own compensation has been more than doubled, do not object strenuously. The raising of the pay of the elected officers from $3,000 to $5,000 per year met with more than a lukewarm reception. It did not seem at the time when the people voted on it. Heretofore the sight of the high dignitaries of the State getting only $3,000 per year (and the Governor, the highest dignitary of all, $6,000) has repressed a deal of energy which would otherwise have been expended in working for higher salaries up and down the line.

The pillow of the President-elect has some thorns in it, and it may be suspected that the sharpest thorn of all is the untimely ambition of his brother, Charles P. Taft, to be United States Senator from Ohio. It is an unfortunate incident, and although the public's information on the subject is and will continue to be inference rather than knowledge, it is a case where inferences are bound to be drawn and will doubtless strike somewhere near the truth. Everything in his record tends to show that Mr. Taft has a keen sense of political proprieties, and we do not suppose that anyone thinks he will relish the present situation. Charles P. Taft has but two things to distinguish him, one being his wealth and the other his relationship to a President-elect, and neither constitutes a good platform on which to run for Senator. Quite probably William H. Taft has intimated as much to his brother, but he is not a man to be dissuaded by an intimation, and to do more than to intimate would, under the circumstances, be embarrassing. For Charles P. Taft contributed $600,000 to the Republican campaign fund, and before the nomination he spent other sums of money which are generally believed to have been large. The embarrassment of the situation may be easily perceived. The Burton incident was unusual, and although conjectural interpretation of it may go astray, it is perfectly natural to assume that it has something to do with Charles P. Taft's candidacy. Congressman Burton had an ambition to be Senator, and this was quite generally understood. But the President-elect offered him the appointment of Secretary of the Treasury. This seems to have been done before the candidacy of Charles P. Taft for the Senate was regarded as a fixed fact. Mr. Burton was the right man for Secretary of the Treasury and the best selection the new President could have made from his own State for member of his cabinet. Mr. Burton went down to talk it over with Mr. Taft, and for a time it was believed the appointment was a certainty. But a hitch occurred somewhere, and presently it was announced that the cabinet offer had been withdrawn. So Mr. Burton is again a candidate for the Senate and against the brother of the President.

Suppose the offer of a cabinet position had not been withdrawn and that Mr. Burton had accepted it. Would it not have been said that the President-elect had purposely taken out of the way of Charles P. Taft his strongest rival for the Senatorship, and that he (the President-elect) was covertly working for his brother's election? And would not a great many foolish people have believed it? Again, if Burton had been retired from the list of Senatorial candidates, the chances of Foraker, an undesirable, would have been notably improved, because as between Charles P. Taft and Foraker public sentiment might have turned once more toward the latter.

Mr. Taft has worked for the political redemption of Ohio, and when Foraker was practically eliminated through exposures of his relations to the Standard Oil Company, the redemption appeared near at hand. No one looked for another Mark Hanna to arise and complicate matters. It is regrettable that Charles P. Taft should have adopted the notion that greatness runs in the family, but all will come out right if Congressman Burton wins the election.

As one result of the late election the menace or the promise of socialism, whichever way one may choose to regard it, seems considerably further off than it did before. For although there was an increase in the vote of the Socialist party, as compared with four years ago, it was so small an increase, when taken in connection with the growth of population and the improved organization and incessant agitation kept up by the Socialists, as to appear more like a loss than a gain. In some States, as in California, for instance, there was an actual falling off in the party vote. Manifestly, the rise of a great Socialist party in the United States is not coming so soon as the late Mark Hanna supposed that it would.

Yet the subject can be looked at in more than one light. In 1904 Debs no doubt received many votes which were not those of convinced Socialists; dissatisfied Democrats of radical tendencies voted for him in preference to Parker; but this year that vote went to Bryan. Nevertheless, after making due allowance on this score, the Socialist party has not prospered as its leaders and many of its opponents expected that it would, and the question why is of some interest. It is probable that the Socialists injured their cause by the extreme violence with which they took up the cause of Haywood and Moyer, and the action of the smaller of the two factions in nominating for President a man who was in prison on a murder charge was another indiscretion which reacted. But above and beyond these temporary incidents is the fact that Socialism and the American spirit do not go well together. The old traditions of individualism and personal initiative among all classes of people have not yet lost their hold, and, fortunately, it will be many a day before they do so.

Amelia Barr says that no woman has a right to begin the search for a career until she has raised a family. Mrs. Barr was nearly fifty years old, and the mother of fifteen children, when she wrote her first book.

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE.

At Christmas Time.

On Christmas Eve wee bairnies know
That the long night will never go,
For oh, it is so long, so long,
Its hours a never-ending throng.
Good Santa waiteth for the day,
As wait his gifts in bright array,
So dragging hours the bairnies grieve
On Christmas Eve.

On Christmas morn, with shrilling shout,
King Slumber's popped host they rout,
And, oh, the laughter and the noise,
The gifts for girls, the gifts for boys,
That Santa Claus has left behind
As swift he traveled down the wind.
Ho, tiny toddler, blow your horn—
'Tis Christmas morn.

On Christmas night the day of cheer
Has vanished for another year.
Then by their cots the bairnies kneel,
Each lisping words that upward steal,
And mothers—ah, the mother-grace!—
Leave kisses on each baby face.
And whisper, "Lead them by Thy might!"—
On Christmas night.

Grass Valley's Christmas.

Up in Grass Valley, this blessed Christmas day,
There will be not one child—neither wee toddler nor maturer youth—who will not receive a gift of some sort. There will be not one home so cluttered in the grip of penury that the babes therein shall not be gladdened by the precious freight which Santa Claus brings from his far-away home, wherever that home may be. The fact thus recorded regards to the fine credit of Grass Valley, does it not? But listen to the rest of the tale:

Not only will no child be unforgotten and ungladdened in this mountain town on the world's day of good cheer, but not a single one of the bairns there has been unremembered and unblessed on any Christmas Day for twenty-five beautiful years. Tiny babes have grown to manhood or womanhood, and now hold little ones of their own in their keeping, and not one in the long procession has been overlooked by the good saint of the frosty beard. And I think that the story of how this condition came to pass is of the sweetest tales that are told of our fair California.
Here it is:

A certain Mrs. Hanson—be her name remembered in gratitude—was an invalid, and, sitting by the window of the cottage where her illness confined her, she saw the children passing on their way to school. There was mother-love in this lonely woman's heart, and, because of the longed-for sight of each and every one of the bairns might be happy in the glad Christmas season. Then the good thought came to her: Why should not those who had provided for those who had not? She told her thought to others, and it developed into blessed action, and now, on the last cool day before Christmas, you might see every child who has something to spare taking it to school, thence to be distributed to those who need by a committee.
One carries a vegetable, another a chicken, another a toy perhaps; and the merchants and business men and others, join in with a will, and so comes to Grass Valley the most blessed Christmas Day known on this round earth, a day truly worthy of Him whose birth it commemorates, the One who said,
"Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not." For there is no home in Grass Valley forgotten by Santa Claus, no home which the blessed Christmas sunning does not brighten and gladden.

Long years ago this humble woman, Mrs. Hanson, folded her tired hands and went unto her reward, but her deed of love still lives, and who shall doubt that her reward is greater—ah, infinitely greater—than will be received by some who dwell in palaces and receive the plaudits of their world?

Sons of the Heroes.

We are the sons of the heroes, of those whom the grim years tried,
Of men who were strong 'gainst militant wrong and ever its might defied;
Tucton, Celt or Roman, Angle or Saxon or Hun,

We are the sons of the mighty ones by whom was our liberty won.

The stern old Pilgrim Fathers
Loving their somber God;
The Huguenots, flame-enveloped,
Divinity in the clod;
Socrates in his prison,

Huss at the stake of flame,
All of the martyred army
Suffering in His name,

These are our mighty fathers, these are the ones we own.

Greater than victor chieftain, king on his golden throne
Blood of their blood is in us, thrilling us as it runs,

And so we proclaim in Liberty's name that we will be worthy sons.

We are the sons of the heroes. The standard of right they bore
Through struggle and strife of the battle of life till days of their struggle were o'er,
But the battle is yet unended, Wrong beareth his scepter high.

And Duty has need of the ones who heed her voice, though it seem a sigh,
And so we have sworn—we swore it by the God whom our father knew—
That we will give heed to her summons and e'er to her best be true.

And, oh, if in us there runneth
A strain of a craven blood
From far-off shirker of duty,
Congealing the good, red flood,
We have sworn that we will do better
Than ever this craven knew,
Holding our country's danger
Prove our duty, too.

For we are the sons of the heroes, of those who have died in His name,
And all they have dared and suffered is yet on their sons a claim,
Calling us still to the battle 'gainst Wrong and his armored crew,
And we, as the sons of the peerless ones, must aye to that call be true.

We are the sons of the heroes who battled in Liberty's name
When the timorous clod, at the tyrant's nod, cringed in his sullen shame,
And the battle still is upon us, still would the briber and knave,

For lust of red gold see honor be sold, and that people yet enslave.
Then stand to your purpose steady,
You who would yet be true,
For children unborn await your deed,
Grateful or loathing you.

Let the prisons yawn for bribers
And all of their bountied brood,
Knowing your duty shall not be done
Till Freedom whispers, "Tis good!"
For how can sons of the heroes rest till the sun shines bright?

On the horns of the Wrong down-ridden and hosts of the conquering Right?
Still is the battle upon us, for knave and his victim have met—
But we are the sons of the heroes, and this we will not forget.

Considering the Ruef Appeal.

The judges of the higher court were unofficially assembled with the purpose of considering, informally, the appeal in the Ruef case. It was a grave and reverend body of men, looking on its individual members, one could not fail to appreciate how entirely they deserved the high esteem and regard in which they are held by the great non-judicial and groping public.

"I suppose we are agreed, my brothers," said the first judge, speaking slowly and impressively, "that there can be no question concerning the guilt of this defendant, Ruef.
The evidence in the case, as I have hastily glanced through it, is conclusive as to his criminality. All that remains—but I need not tell you what remains, I am sure."

"Certainly not," remarked another judge, speaking still more slowly and impressively than the one who had preceded him. "The defendant is guilty as a very field; there is no doubt of that. While our city lay in ruins, and the voice of sorrow was heard on every hand, he proceeded to rob and loot it in the hour of its extremity. The high duty that remains to us, then, is carefully, and with judicial propriety, to investigate the indictment and the lower judge's rulings, and discover whether or not there is a technical flaw which would justify us in turning the black scoundrel loose, again to prey upon the city which, in very travail of shame, gave him to the world. Of course, we should deeply deprecate having to do this again, but our high duty, gentlemen, our high duty to the sacred technicalities of the law! Our learned brother in the corner has examined the indictment, the rulings, and the proceedings more closely than any other of us, and I should be pleased to hear from him."

The learned brother in the corner slowly arose, and the informal assemblage awaited his utterance with hushed attention.

"Deeply realizing, as I do," said he, in words whose weight and wisdom, echoing throughout the room, made it seem a judicial holy of holies—"Deeply realizing, as I do, the damning guilt of this man, it is with profound regret that I am compelled to announce that I have found in the indictment flaws which I believe to be fatal to its validity."

Even on those stern judicial countenances one might see passing consternation, hastily draped in official repose, and the learned brother in the corner continued:

"In the eighth line from the top, in the word which should be 'bribe,' the second 'b' is so carelessly written that it might readily be taken for 'd.' At once you realize how serious is this defect?"

"Alas! we do," the others sadly, but profoundly, groaned.

"Nor is this all," the learned brother in the corner continued. "In the next to the last line, you will regretfully notice upon inspection, in the words 'Grand jury,' the 'G' is capitalized, while the 'J' is not. What remains for us save to perform our high duty by overturning the proceedings in the lower court?"

"What, indeed?" cried most of the others, influenza-stimulated, staring upon their stern and thoughtful countenances.

"I knew you would feel thus," the learned one admitted, proud gratification in the judicial brotherhood gleaming in his eye, "but how will you feel when I assure you that the record shows that one of the grand jurors expressed a prejudice against bosses who are in the business for revenue only. Is not our duty clear?"

"All too clear," cried the others almost as one man.

"And, again, it is shown that one of the jurors in the case raised his left hand in taking his oath. Alas and alas! How these left-handed men do get in the way of the triumphant march of the Majestic Law!"

"Alas, they do," moaned the others.

"Shall these disastrous snags at sacred tech-nicity be disregarded by us in this case?
No! Nay! Never!"

"Nay! Never!" most of the others repeated.
"But I understood you to say, and I agree with you, that Ruef is guilty," remarked a quiet judge who thus far had said nothing.

"Let us remember our high duty," said the judge who first spoke, reproachfully.

"And maintain inviolate the temple and altar of technicality," said another.
"Yes, let us—"

I awoke with a moan and a terrible cry, and was unutterably glad to know that I had but dreamed. Yes, it was but a terrible dream, seeming, indeed, like frightful reality. And now I was awake, and rejoicing to know that the higher court still is to act in Ruef's case.

And yet—and yet—will you believe me when I inform you that this dream of horror doubtless was based upon a conversation I had heard the evening before, in which the participants—and fairly intelligent men they were, too—prophesied that matters would go about as they went in my dream, basing their prophecy on previous actions of the higher courts? The forecast had disturbed me, and the disturbance had woven itself into my dreams.

But, of course, such a prophecy is absurdly unbelievable—is it not?

The Blessed Christmas Spirit.

'Twas the blessed Christmas Spirit, and it hovered o'er a world Where banners of grim Penury forever were unfurled.

It looked on want and sorrow and the whirlpool depths of sin,
Saw those who turned to ways of woe who might to heaven win.

But still it winged its cheering way, and would not pause to sigh,
But left a deed of kindness here, and there a purpose high.

And many a heart was touched by love, and hopes were given birth,
'Twas the blessed Christmas Spirit, and it the earth.

And still it winged its cheering way. "I may not stay," it said,
"Tis mine to bless the weary world, whence hope too oft has fled.

Of 'Peace on earth, good will to men,' I bear the message yet,
The message from far Bethlehem that man may ne'er forget."

And so the world grew strangely glad, and turned it from its strife,
From selfish greed, and cruel hate, and darker ways of life.

And on one day, one day of days, Self's banners all were furled,
Because the blessed Christmas Sprite went flying o'er the world.

The Opinions of Rufus.

Relegation an' med'cine is some alike in one way, I've noticed; lots of folks take 'em only when they're sick.

They see a thing as takin' yourself too seriously. Look at an owl, Frinstance.

Feel that your clay is better quality than that of most folks if you like to, but if you want to keep up the pleasin' theory, I reckon you'd better not have the clay submitted to scientific analysis.

Sometimes I mos' feel as if I orto hope they won't be too much laffin' an' jokin' in Heaven, fer if there is I know some reel good people that's goin' to be both shocked an' pained.

Gently speakin' critters is fokes that can't do things, but can tell you how you orto do 'em.

They was a man that invented spectacles through which you could see other people's faults, but couldn't notice your own, but they wasn't much demand fer 'em, fer he found out too late that lots of us didn't need any glasses to see in that way.

I've knowed fellers to put stuff in their mouths to steal away their brains when the closes' inspection never convinced me that they had any to spare.

I've heard men brag of bein' self-made when I couldn't help feelin' that it relieved the Almighty of a dreadful responsibility.

The Jelly-fish and the Man.

There was once a jelly-fish in the era pliocene Which was really quite ambitious and of most superior mien,

For it said, "I've been evolving since my race on earth began,
And I'll keep on evolving till at last I'll be a man."

So he died, and he died,
And he passed, and he passed,
Through the mollusk and the ape,
Till at last, quite at last,

He reached the destined goal
In the rolling ages' span,
And he cried: "Upon my soul
I'm a man, I'm a man!"

And if you my story doubt, as I somewhat fear you do,
Here's the proof beyond a doubt, which I now present to you:

For the spinnless jelly-fish shaped as man,
Upon your way
Look about you as you go—you will find him any day.

The Old Year and the New.

There is a moment, and but one, in which the Old Year and the New Year meet, and in that brief moment they exchange confidences and hopes, and promises and the record of their non-fulfillment, the high-leaping ambition of youth and the dreary wisdom of age.

The Old Year, worn and weary, staggered up the path of the days to the brink of the eternal precipice, and there the New Year, fresh and fair from the womb of the unknown future, met him.

"I am weary," sighed the Old Year, "weary of hopes which have died ere they were fulfilled, of bright visions which have whispered their lying promises unto me, of evil which I have done and good which I have left undone. I promised so much, and I have performed so little!"

"I don't wonder," trilled the Baby Year, "that you are disgusted with yourself. I should be if I were compelled to look back on such a record as the one you mention. As for myself, my record will be quite different, and vastly better, I can assure you. Why, I really wonder at myself when I think of all the supine promises I have made."

"I made such promises, too," sighed the Old Year.

"Yes, but they were different," the New Year chattered in light-hearted response; "they were different, for you didn't keep your promises."

"Little one, little one," the tottering Old Year responded gravely, yet kindly, "I would, as I leave you, believe, as one final, sweetest dream, that none of your vows will be broken, none of your promises unkept, but you will learn, and sadly learn, as you wander along the misty pathway of the days, that promises are but brittle stuff, that hopes die and ambitions perish; you will learn that good too often is unattained, and that the forces of evil are mighty; you will regretfully realize that Selfishness often is triumphant while the message of the wonderful Nazarene is forgotten. And yet—and yet—"

The Old Year hesitated.

"Well, what is it?" the New Year inquired. "Our time is limited, you know."

"Yet I would not discourage you. Sore disappointment you will know; your record will not be what you anticipate, but when you stand on the brink of another precipice like to this o'er which I now totter, one ray of sweet assurance will gleam through the clouds of regret or remorse, gladdening your time-worn heart ere you take your place among the things that were. There will be good deeds to be remembered, kindly actions which shall brighten your dimming eyes as you recall them from memory's maze of folly and error, and, best of all, you shall know that, on the whole, the world is a little better because you have trodden its weary way, for it is written in the Divine Will that, day by day and year by year, as the long record is made, little man surely creeps upward unto that which his Creator intended him to be. And this assurance comforts and—"

The moment was gone, the Old Year toppled over the precipice, and the Baby Year went his joyous way, but he did not understand that which he had heard.

Yet when, wise with the experience of the days, he stands on the verge of the precipice that awaits him, he will know and understand.

PROPOSED LAW ON RACE-TRACK GAMBLING

By EARL H. WEBB.

The conditions in New York and in this State on the subject of race-track gambling differ in several particulars, although the effect of the evil upon their respective communities is the same. In New York where successful legislation correcting the evil has lately been passed, the initiative for this legislation came from the governor of the State, who, through his power and influence and in the exercise of his right to suggest legislation, was able at once to bring the matter to public attention and make of it a vital and absorbing issue.

California the initiative must first come from the people and unless they are fully aroused to the necessity of the proposed law, are well organized and make their demand for this legislation in plain and unmistakable language, nothing can be accomplished.

In a reform movement of this kind, that strikes at the root of a well established social evil upon which large financial interests fatten, it is impossible to pass a law through the legislature in furtherance of the reform when the initiative comes from a member of the legislature unsupported by an aroused public opinion, no matter how honest, earnest and courageous he may be; as witness the splendid but futile efforts of Assemblymen R. H. E. Espey in 1904 and 1905 and of John Eshelman in 1906 and 1907.

Such large financial interests as the race-track associations, operating at Emeryville and Arcadia, make it their business to have special representatives constantly on hand in one or both branches of the State legislature so that they can be ready at all times to block any legislation inimical to their interests. They also have in their pay or under their influence certain newspapers through which they are able to publish racing charts, tips upon races and other like allurements and, at the same time, stifle public knowledge of the attendant evils, as accounts of suicides, thefts, embezzlements and other crimes which could be directly traced to the race-track. For these services said newspapers receive large financial benefit in the form of payment for space in the newspaper columns. In addition to that those proprietors who govern the policy of their papers purely for practical considerations hesitate, for political reasons, to take hold of a moral issue which attacks alleged vested interests. They know that if they should come out frankly and unreservedly for certain reform legislation they would array against themselves the political organization which is under the control of the affected special interest, as in the present fight in which we are now engaged, the Republican morning dailies of San Francisco refuse to openly endorse our fight because their managers fear it may interfere with the political combinations they have formed or are now forming on matters to come before the Legislature and in which matters they are relying upon the facile legislative tools of the special interests. Most of these corrupt tools of legislation are to be found on the side of the controlling political party; as they are spoolmen pure and simple and politics is a business and not a principle with them. The great majority of the voting population do not realize the ramifications of political organizations throughout business and social life nor how often the public good is sacrificed to private interests through the manipulation of our representatives in such a way as to protect crime instead of prohibiting it.

To illustrate:

Section 337 of the Penal Code is evidently so worded as not only to legalize race-track gambling but to protect and license it; for in that section it is provided that any officer or officers who shall vote for the passage of an ordinance or by-law granting or pretending to grant a privilege to open, carry on or conduct or cause to be opened, carried on or conducted any game or games prohibited by Section 330 of the Penal Code is guilty of a felony, so the race-track advocates assume that any game or games not prohibited by said section can be licensed and protected by our law. As pool selling and book making on races is not mentioned in the list of gambling games there is prohibited it is lawful to license them. Our crafty legislative politicians, instead of passing a general law prohibiting gambling have pretended to be exact and explicit by reciting a long list of comparatively harmless games and then (for a consideration) omitting from the list this particular one upon which their special interest waxes and grows fat at the rate of from $7,000 to $10,000 per day in actual profits known to the investigating public. At this writing thirty-one bookmakers alone are paying to the Jockey Club $20 a race or $120 per day each for the privilege of fleeing the public.

In furtherance of the plan thus suggested by the peculiar wording of the two sections above referred to the New California Jockey Club Association, operating at Arcadia, have organized their respective municipal corporations as cities of the sixth class under our general laws; elected their pliant tools as trustees of said municipal corporations and have had those trustees issue to the racing associations licenses for carrying on the business of gambling by pool selling and book making within the boundaries of said municipalities. On the same theory the pool rooms of Sausalito are being operated, against the protests of an outraged public, and at this writing the professional gamblers are endeavoring to create another crime factory at the little town of Ocean View which has just been organized and which lies at the north boundary of Berkeley, it being the avowed purpose of these emisaries from Emeryville to establish pool rooms at that place. What a splendid setting for the university of a great State! A sink hole of crime on either side; the sea before and the hills behind. How can the youth of the land pass to and from her gates without contamination?

Thus have the laws of the State been debauched and its citizens betrayed through the treachery of the people's representatives. Is it not time that we awake to a realization of this damning evil and in united voices, through press and pulpit, by word of mouth and by action demand from our legislators that they rescind the immediate and permanent sanction of this iniquitous institution which is destroying the morals of our youth, the business integrity of our men and the virtue of our women?

The California Anti Race Track League was organized for the purpose of arousing public interest on this issue by bringing to the attention of the voters throughout the State, first the evils directly resulting from the main-tenance of the Emeryville and Arcadia race tracks, the pool rooms in Sausalito, San Francisco and other places, and second, the inadequacy of our present laws to meet these evils and the imperative need for proper legislation. We believe that if the majority of the State were once possessed of this knowledge they would demand from their legislative representatives the passage of such a law.

Publicity.

We were not long in discovering that the only practical way by which we could bring this knowledge to the attention of the voter was through the public press and that unless we could enlist in our cause the proprietors and editors of the independent publications and could have access to their columns our efforts would be useless. And at this point I wish to express our sincere thanks for the disinterested, intelligent and valuable work which the independent papers throughout the State have performed in our behalf. At this writing 210 of our newspapers, including the San Francisco evening dailies, have openly declared for us. It is to be hoped that the morning dailies of San Francisco will realize the importance of this issue and the moral responsibility resting upon their editorial managements and do what they can to make certain the success of a reform movement which is almost won.

Proposed Law.

The contest in the State of New York and the success of Governor Hughes has brought us strength and valuable suggestion. After due deliberation our committee on legislation has decided to follow substantially what is known as the Hughes bill, only changing it in certain particulars where we think it necessary more fully to comply with the form and requirements of our new legislative enactments. Our proposed law is less sweeping than the New York statute and is directed solely to book making and pool selling on races. We have decided upon thus limiting it for two reasons; first, we consider that the main evil comes from pool selling, and second, it is for the purpose of silencing the argument heretofore made by the advocates of the race track that if a law of this kind were passed it would destroy the occupation of breeding fine horses and the access of county fairs in the State. Under the law here proposed, purses can be offered at the tracks and individuals may make their bets among themselves if they so desire, for that is a matter that no law can regulate.

The proposed law is herein set out. I earnestly ask each reader of this article to consider it carefully both from the practical and legal standpoint. First, Is it practical and sufficient? Second, Will it stand the test of an attack in the courts?

"An act to add a new section to the Penal Code to be known as section three hundred and thirty-seven 'a' thereof and relating to gambling by pool selling, book making, bets or wagers upon the result of any trial or contest of skill, speed or power of endurance of horse or other animal, or between horses or other animals and providing the punishment for the violation thereof."

"The People of the State of California, represented in senate and assembly, do enact as follows:

"Section 1. A new section is hereby added to the Penal Code to be known as section three hundred and thirty-seven 'a' thereof and to read as follows: 337a. Every person, who engages in pool-selling or book-making at any time or place; or who keeps or occupies any room, shed, tenement, tent, booth, or building, float or vessel, or any part thereof, or who occupies any place or stand of any kind, upon any public or private grounds within this State, with books, papers, apparatus or paraphernalia, for the purpose of recording or registering bets or wagers, or of selling pools, or who records or registers bets or wagers, or sells pools, upon the result of any trial or contest of skill, speed or power of endurance of horse or other animal or between horses or other animals, or who receives, registers, records or forwards, or purports or pretends to receive, register, record or forward, in any manner whatsoever, any money, or consideration of value, bet or wagered, or offered for the purpose of being bet or wagered, by or for any other person, or sells pools, upon any such result; or who, being the owner, lessee, or occupant of any room, shed, tenement, tent, booth or building, float or vessel, or part thereof, or of any grounds within this State, knowingly permits the same to be used or occupied for any of these purposes, or therein keeps, exhibits or employs any device or apparatus for the purpose of recording or registering such bets or wagers, or the selling of such pools, or becomes the custodian of depositary for gain, hire or reward of any money, property or thing of value, staked, wagered or pledged, or to be wagered or pledged upon any such result; or who aids, abets or assists in any manner in any of the said acts, which are hereby forbidden, is punishable by imprisonment in a county jail or State prison not exceeding one year."

I will not attempt in the limits of this article to detail any specific example of crime or misery, directly traceable to the race track. There is probably not one reader of this article who cannot call to mind an example that will point this moral.

The fact that no man or publication dares openly advocate race track gambling is proof and conclusive that it is an unmixt evil and a menace to society. Both the Republican and Democratic parties have gone on record as supporting this issue.

If this law does not pass let the people of the State put the seal of their disapproval upon the political party as well as upon its representatives in the legislature who fail to keep this pledge.

Do You Use U's?

Have you ever noticed that your newspaper and your magazine spell words like "harbor" with just an "o," while your books spell it with a "u" added, "harbour." And that the newspapers say "civilization" when the books say "civilisation"?

The reason is this: The American newspapers and magazines are printed for Americans only, and Americans prefer the simpler and more obvious spellings. But the books are printed for their publication in America, and the English have a profound prejudice in favor—no, favour—of the u's and the s's. The English editions of American books are printed in London to be bound there. To save extra cost of composition, they are printed to satisfy the English prejudice, which is deep-rooted, and simply ignore the American preference, which is tolerant. Hence the two spellings in American reading matter.

How Tiffany's Began.

The founder of the great house of Tiffany's, jewelers, began life as a clerk. In those days he roomed with a chum who clerked in the same store, and each of the pair saved all his spare cash to start a business of his own. At last they felt able to launch their own canoes, and his friend said:

"See here, Tiffany, I'm going into the grocery business. Everybody has to have groceries, and I'll always have customers. You'd better join me."

"Not I," replied young Tiffany, "I'm going into a business that supplies luxuries. I won't have so many customers, but they will be people who don't have to count the pennies and they will be surer pay."

His friend died clerking in a grocery store, having failed in his own ventures. Tiffany left behind him a monumental business. He had one inflexible rule in business, never to misrepresent the quality or value of anything he sold.

An Uncrushable Toad.

An experiment was recently made in the clay testing department of a machinery company at Bucyrus, Ohio, in which a toad was placed in a twenty-ton brick press and was four times subjected to a pressure of 1,000 pounds without injury.

The question at issue was whether such a pressure would kill the toad or whether its ability to compress itself was sufficient to allow it to come out of the ordeal alive. The toad was first placed in a lump of granular clay and the whole pressed into a brick. After the huge press had done its work the solid brick was lifted from the machine and the toad winked its eyes contentedly, stretched its legs and hopped away.—Popular Magazine.

Glimpse of the Future.

Ages had passed, and the national debt had been paid at last, the uttermost farthing.

At once a novel condition arose.

The country was threatened with a surplus.

"What shall we do with it?" anxiously asked the financiers.

For a time nobody seemed able to suggest anything feasible.

Then a wild, reckless radical boldly asked:

"Why not put the government clerks living salaries?"

A fierce controversy instantly ensued.

But nothing came of it. The proposition was too revolutionary.—Chicago Tribune.

The New World of Air.

The Hon. C. S. Rolls, probably the most distinguished of English aviators and well known in America, has returned to England from Le Mans, where he watched the flights of Wilbur Wright and was made supremely happy by himself being a passenger on one of the flights. He thus describes his sensations:

"When all was at last ready I took my seat on the flyer, taking care to fasten my cap well and to get the motor working well and we expected to attain some high speeds. The roar of the engine commenced, the starting weights were released, and off we went with a bound, butchback. Before reaching the end of the rail we had left it and were in the air. We were flying.

"Once clear the ground the feeling of security was perfect, and I was able to watch with great interest the movements of the operating levers. We tore along at forty miles an hour, and soon came to the first corner. Here a point of interest to motorists was demonstrated—viz., the matter at what speed a curve is taken the machine adjusts itself, so to speak, and at the will of the operator it tilts up gracefully when taking a turn, and is therefore equivalent to a motor car tilting up to the road in front of it so that it is always 'banked' to just the correct angle to suit the speed at which a curve is taken, all liability to skid upwards being thus avoided. Those accustomed to motor racing on road or track will appreciate the effect of this, which is that taking a curve on a flying machine will, instead of being more dangerous, be actually safer than on an automobile.

"The prevalence of 'undulations' of the atmosphere renders close attention necessary to the two levers controlling the equilibrium and altitude. I noticed that both of these were kept constantly on the 'joggle' with slight movement.

"One has been accustomed to consider the atmosphere as a mass of air decreasing in density with its altitude, but otherwise uniform; experience on a power given flyer, however, shows that far from this being the case, the atmosphere near the earth's surface is made even in what we call calm weather, is made up of spiral movements of air of varying diameter, sometimes vertical and sometimes horizontal, undulations of all sorts—little hills and valleys, and 'streams' of air—in fact, one might call it a new 'world' conquered by man. A world with 'scenery' of great variation, which, though invisible to the eye, is none the less felt by the operator of a flying machine.

"To maintain equilibrium and steering control, while battling with these complex movements of the air, has been the great problem for centuries has baffled human ingenuity, and which is now solved by the Wright brothers after years of systematic study and experiment.

"Sometimes we flew above the trees, sometimes we flew three feet off the ground, entirely at the will of the operator, who thus exercised the most perfect control over his machine that any one could imagine. The side gusts and varying currents which were encountered at times caused gentle dipping motions, not unlike a witchback, but always under complete control.

"Our speed in the early morning caused tears to roll down our cheeks, but with goggles on one would have no opportunity in reading a map, making notes, or taking photographs, etc.

"After a flight of several miles a descent was begun for landing. At the right moment the engine was stopped, and we came to ground so gently that the runners first touched the surface. On landing, we skimmed along the surface rather like a toboggan, coming to a standstill a few yards from our starting point. The sensation of flight was great and delightful, and the fact of accomplishing what several eminent scientists have 'proved' impossible gave also an added satisfaction."

"The California Weekly is certain to shine as one of the brightest publications in the newspaper field."—Grass Valley Union.

The day dawned clear and beautiful. "Christmas" chimed from a thousand church bells through the land; "Christmas" sang from a myriad host of children's voices; "Christmas," the sea and sky called back beneath the benignant sun.

In two homes two women sat, grown old and near to their end as the year to its close. One leaned in an ebony chair among rich works of art, and opened her morning mail to read the flood of formal notes it brought, the other, elegantly wishing her a joyous Yuletide. Her fingers were jewelled, on her breast a glittering pageantry of gems. She read the notes, tossed them wearily aside, rang for her maid, and rolled in furs, rolled luxuriously to the choral praise and, to the mumbled prayer, and rolled home again to a long afternoon and evening unbroken by a call.

The other woman, in a humble home, rose with the dawn, busied herself with the last trimmings of the Christmas tree, and stepped aside to dodge the screaming avalanche of children that descended with the rising of the sun to find that Santa Claus had brought them. Shouts of joy, ecstasies of wonderment, tempests of delight. And at the noise she smiled benignly, joining in every phrase and sharing in all the happiness. She was in her native clime, and with loving tenderness upon the frolics of these youngsters, her eyes grew misty with the recollection of dead days, of the years she had spent in the nursery, of the cruel pains she had endured and then forgotten, for just that a man was born into the world. "The little hands that had crept trustfully to her face as the little eyes committed themselves to sleep, of the yearning hours that she had spent in caring for the little souls committed to her charge, of the emptiness that had struck her heart when one of the little went out, of the fulness that had filled it out of the inexhaustible riches of her children's love—and, as these recollections surged through her mind and passed, she joined, with a new eagerness and new intensity, in the joys of these, her children's childhood, and experienced a new thrill of happiness in realizing that through her these glad hearts were in the world and making merry."

As the day wore on her other children came, bringing their little gifts, not with constraint and distrust, but with respectfulness, but with the love that always glows upon the altar of a mother's presence. Hour by hour she added to the riches of her dear possession, until her heart seemed able to contain no more. And at night, when all the fun was over and the last romp was done, the children gathered at her knee to offer up their lisping praise to Him who said, "Suffer the little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of Heaven."

As they prayed, His other words came to her, "Whosoever ye be born again, and become as a little child, ye shall in no wise enter into the kingdom of Heaven." And upon her heart there settled the deep abiding peace of God, upon her who had done her life's work as He willed, and beat back in meekness the burden of great reward. A glory seemed to shine about her, as she joined in their chant, "Thy will be done."

Which, think you, of these women understood the meaning of the Christmas Day? Mortal woman, who was the mother of our God, which woman of these two had more joy of her religious worship—she who in self-chosen childlessness beguiled the day by sports, or who worshipped through the joyous spirit beget of her own body in sufferings that are symbols both of the Crucifixion and of the Resurrection?

In ten thousand homes to-day, Christmas has come in name at least, but to how many has it come in fact? "Unto." In every home where children's voices lead the Christmas carols, there is the spirit of the Sacred Birth. Symbols are they of the Christ Child, and every heart touched by them thereby worships God.

SHALL CALIFORNIA HAVE A REFORMATORY?

By O. K. CUSHING.

California has, and for a long time to come will have, more than her share of criminals. A rapidly increasing population brings its proportion and with it the ocean on one side and the desert on the other, it is easier for them to stay here than to get away. The climatic attractions render the State a paradise for tramps, among whose ranks are found many of the worst of law breakers, and ships from all the seas bring in their quota of these undesirable adventurers.

This State has more inmates in its prisons in proportion to its population than any of its sister States, with but four exceptions. This does not necessarily mean that California is, with the exceptions noted, the worst State in the Union; but it should warn us to look carefully into our methods of dealing with crime.

The juvenile court law is designed to repress and remedy delinquency and dependency and is supplemented by the laws regarding truancy and child labor, all having among their objects the prevention of crime. When a crime is committed it often happens that the reaction following its commission is itself enough of a shock to readjust the point of view of the offender so that he will not transgress again. For such as these and others who, having broken the law, show a genuine disposition to reform, the probation law opens the way to right living without the stigma of imprisonment. It is to be hoped that these laws will ultimately result in materially reducing our criminal population. In the meantime, however, there are many in the prisons and many more on the way there whom such laws cannot reach; but who should be restored to society if possible. These can be reformed only by a course of discipline that cannot be administered under the probation laws and they must go to prison; but they cannot be reformed in any prison now existing in California.

Our prison population may be divided into two great classes—the habitual or confirmed and the accidental criminal. The first class embraces in its number all those who have been convicted more than once and those who, while apparently not having offended before, are of such a malignant and abandoned nature as to make reformation doubtful if not impossible. Accidental criminals include those who without any criminal intent become law breakers, such, for instance, as persons who commit crime in the heat of passion or who are led into crime without premeditation or evil intent. The younger men are mainly of this class and most of them can be reformed. A majority of those committed to our State prisons are under thirty years of age when convicted and a large minority are less than twenty-one. Ten per cent. are illiterate and most of them are deficient in education.

We have two State prisons and in these institutions are now confined 2,700 prisoners. At San Quentin there are about 500 separate cells or rooms for prisoners, and at Folsom less than 400. So, the inmates of the State must be confined two or more in one cell or room. There are one or two rooms at San Quentin occupied by as many as forty prisoners. All students of penology agree that the first essential for any prison is a separate cell for every inmate. The prison industries are manufacturing grain bags, at San Quentin, and quarrying and crushing rock at Folsom. No educational work worthy of the name is done at either prison. It is not possible to keep all the men busy all the time and they have many idle hours. The enclosed grounds at San Quentin are very small and there is no wall around the Folsom prison, so at both places the men must be herded together without regard to their criminal tendencies. Usually a prisoner is kept in custody only a few days of his term, being released on parole, and when discharged he is given a suit of clothes, five dollars in money and his fare to the place from which he came. Thus equipped he is expected to lead the life of a law-abiding citizen, though crime is the only subject with which he has had abundant opportunity to acquaint himself while in prison.

The prison directors said, in a recent report, "Both of our prisons are practically only large county jails for the keeping of prisoners." Experience has shown that they fail as a deterrent of crime. This view is confirmed by the fact that over 25 per cent. of our State prison population is serving a second or subsequent term and nearly 10 per cent. has been sentenced more than twice. These figures are most conservative for there are many second-term prisoners in the prisons who are not shown by the records to be such.

Appropriations have been made to increase the cell room at both prisons; but the contemplated improvements will not bring the system up to the proper standard. Something more must be done. The proper protection of society demands that criminals be subjected to such treatment as will prevent them from again breaking the law. In the past it was the accepted view that retributive punishment was the means best adapted to afford the desired protection. It is because of this that our penal code to-day measures off different periods of imprisonment for what are considered lighter or heavier degrees of crime. It is obvious, however, that, as far as the individual culprit is concerned, the protection of society can best be worked out by so treating him that he will not offend again. Experience has shown that reformatory influences can be effectively applied to prisoners so that they may come out of prison better men than when they entered and it may be said incidentally, for the benefit of those who would still insist upon punishment as such, that retribution is not wholly adequate for such treatment. If anyone thinks otherwise let him set about changing some fixed habit of his own that he may discover what a disagreeable process it is. And reformatory treatment is directed solely to the end of changing a man's habit of being bad to a habit of being good. It is frequently argued that retributive punishment is necessary to deter others by the example upon the culprit. This offers no objection to reformatory treatment which is much more irksome and distasteful to the prisoner than the ordinary degree of prison discipline under the merely punitive system.

In 1876 there was opened at Elmira, New York, an institution known as the New York State Reformatory which was destined to exercise a marked influence upon the treatment of criminals throughout the civilized world. The sole aim of this institution is the reformation of the prisoner. The limits of this article will not permit a detailed account of its methods; but, if we bear in mind the situation at our State prisons, enough may be said to show that a need exists in California. The inmates of the reformatory are divided into three classes, marked by different dress, those entering being placed in the second grade. From this they rise to the first or fall to the third as their deportment and success in their studies and trade-school work merit. The first class prisoners have more privileges than the others, can correspond with their friends oftener, have some special conveniences in their cells, more liberal library privileges and somewhat better quality of food, with other advantages. To the third class all of these privileges are denied and prisoners in that grade are clad in stripes while in the other grades a gray or blue uniform is worn. The prisoner finds immediately that it depends entirely on himself what grade he shall occupy and naturally he will bend every effort to reach the higher grades.

But there is another incentive to good conduct much more powerful than any advantage in mere prison privileges. The men committed to the reformatory are not sentenced to a fixed term but for an indeterminate period, the duration of which depends upon the prisoner himself. Every prisoner must reach the first grade and maintain himself there for a given period, say six months, before he can hope for discharge. In our prisons the lapse of time brings about the prisoner's discharge irrespective of his fitness to be free. In the reformatory he must show his fitness. He must gain his freedom. The indeterminate sentence is the essential factor in the operation of the reformatory but it is not all. Instruction in trades is given, with regular grammar and academic school work, gymnastic exercise, military drill and, in short, training of all kinds designed to make the prisoner fit and able to take care of himself in some honest occupation upon his discharge.

The discharge is itself converted into perhaps the most effective of all the reformatory agencies. As already noted most of the prisoners are discharged from our State prisons at the end of a fixed term, illly equipped to care for themselves and little, if any, better fitted to earn a living than when they were convicted. Besides, they are subject to blackmail by other discharged convicts who, unless given hush money, will expose their history, so that it is most difficult to hold a position if one is obtained. The reformatory prisoner, on the other hand, is at first released on parole after he has shown himself worthy of confidence. A position must be found for him before he leaves the institution and he must make satisfactory reports periodically while he remains on parole.

The treatment of those committed to a reformatory may aptly be compared to hospital treatment for the sick. One is not committed to either institution for a definite period; but until he recovers—in other words, until the physicians in the one case and the prison officers in the other, think the patient fit to leave the institution. When a sick man leaves the hospital it is recognized that he is only convalescent and no one thinks of him as entirely recovered. So, when a prisoner leaves the reformatory he is, in a sense, to be regarded in the same way and is treated as a convalescent while on parole. When a given time in this situation, he has shown his ability to withstand the temptations of ordinary life, he gets his final discharge. The reformatory prisoner is not likely to be blackmailed on discharge. Usually a position is given him on account of the fact that he is a paroled prisoner and any suggestion of blackmail can be met with the reply, "My employer knows all about it, that is why I am here."

In the reformatory, mental and moral training are regarded as of the utmost importance though the physical condition of the inmates is by no means neglected. The object is to so train the prisoner as to enable him to obey the laws of the land—in other words, to reform him. It should not be forgotten, however, that while this system is not retributive, neither is it sentimental. Its aim is the protection of society and one of its underlying principles is that criminals shall not be released until it is reasonably certain that such release will not harm society. Can we doubt which of these systems would be preferred by the law-breaker; that where he can associate with kindred spirits, assured of his discharge in a given time regardless of his conduct, or that which compels him to earn his way to liberty by showing his fitness to be free?

The reformatory is not an experiment. Institutions similar to that at Elmira have been established and are successfully conducted in Massachusetts, Ohio, Indiana and several other States. Over 70 per cent. of those treated by such institutions reform, while a majority of those discharged from the Nevada State Prison return to crime. The indeterminate sentence, indispensable in a reformatory, is not unknown in this State. One form of it is now effective in the Whittier and Preston State schools.

But it may be asked, why cannot the system be introduced into our State prisons now? There are several reasons. The prisoners are too crowded to admit of proper classification and the hardened offenders who could never be committed to a reformatory would make reformatory work impossible. The State Prison at Folsom, and especially in California, should have a large farm for outdoor work and training and neither State prison has the proper kind of land. The jute mill at San Quentin will not lend itself to reformatory work and the quarries at Folsom are not desirable in that respect. If one of the present prisons were converted into a reformatory, the other would be totally inadequate to accommodate that part of the prison population that is not suitable for reformatory treatment. Probably from six to eight hundred of the present inmates of Folsom and San Quentin could with advantage to themselves and the State, be transferred to a reformatory. This would leave about two thousand prisoners in the two prisons which will be about the number they can properly accommodate when the contemplated additions are completed. As more prison accommodations must be provided, it will certainly be better to build a new prison, where the younger men can be treated on modern lines, than to add to the present prisons where young and old are herded together to their mutual disadvantage. Much of the work of building the new prison can be done by the prisoners, for work of that character affords excellent training of the kind most needed by such men, and this will also reduce the cost of construction.

The establishment of a reformatory will not only enable us to treat properly the first offenders and younger men; but as the State prison population will thereby be reduced to about the proper capacity of the prisons when the additions now in process of construction are completed many of the same reformatory measures can then be introduced into the State prisons. When these changes are accomplished California will have a complete and harmonious system for treating the criminal classes along the most approved lines and at every stage there will be the opportunity to reform. First there will be the juvenile court law with its provisions for probation for erring youths; then the White and Folsom Industrial schools for those the juvenile court law does not reach; then the adult probation law and the reformatory for older law-breakers, still holding out the opportunity for reformation to those who have failed elsewhere.

It must not be forgotten, however, that the most important factor in any penal institution is the men who control it. Politics must be kept out of the management. The warden and his subordinates must be chosen solely on account of fitness and ability. If our reformatory be permitted to become part of a partisan political machine it will be a failure, but established and maintained solely with the object of effecting the purposes for which it is designed, it will save men and money for the State and redound to our honor and credit.

Literary Economy.

In the "golden age" of New England literature a lion-hunting society of matrons invited a number of the famous authors of the day to a function at her home, anticipating an unrivaled display of wit and eloquence from their presence. The lions all came, but to her great chagrin they proved to be the most close-mouthed of her guests, and her tea fell flat. She afterwards asked one of the number, a distinguished author still famous in American literature, why none of the celebrities had talked on that occasion.

"My dear madam," he exclaimed, "you don't suppose I would speak my thoughts out in such company, do you? Why, some of the other guests would surely have made use of them as literary material before a week was over."

They had all been husbanding their literary resources. In the future, the madame invited only one author at a time.

PRESIDENT TAFT'S SECRETARY.

By E. French Strother.

One morning in the spring of 1899, a letter of introduction was brought into the private office of Mr. Charles S. Wheeler, the attorney, of San Francisco. The letter was signed by a cousin of Mr. Wheeler's, a young rancher in Lake County, California, and introduced Fred W. Carpenter as a young friend from a neighboring ranch who wished to enter some law office in the city. Mr. Carpenter would be found to be an expert stenographer and a graduate of the law school of the University of Minnesota.

Mr. Wheeler had no opening in his office at the time, and told his clerk to tell Mr. Carpenter so, with his regrets. But as the clerk was leaving the room, it occurred to him that he had better see the young man and ask after his cousin at least. Recalling the clerk, he had Mr. Carpenter brought in.

A few minutes' conversation was enough to reveal to Mr. Wheeler that the young man was out of the ordinary—a "find," in fact. A mind of exceptional capacity and a character of unusual winsomeness were quickly disclosed, and Mr. Wheeler unhesitatingly made a place for him in his office. At first Mr. Carpenter acted as confidential stenographer to Mr. Wheeler, and later as his private secretary. And in Mr. Wheeler's own enthusiastic words, "No man ever had a better: discreet, discerning, and always a gentleman of the finest quality."

Mr. Carpenter roomed at this time with one of Mr. Wheeler's law clerks, Mr. Daniel R. Williams, now a practicing attorney in San Francisco. Walking downtown together one morning, Mr. Carpenter suggested to Mr. Williams that the latter's familiarity with Spanish, acquired by several years' residence in Mexico, should make him available as a secretary to some member of the Philippine commission and pointed out that such a position might lead to considerable advancement.

Mr. Williams was so taken with the idea that he discussed it with Mr. Wheeler, through whose co-operation he soon received the appointment as private secretary to Professor Bernard Moses, then a member of the commission.

Before Mr. Williams sailed for Manila, Mr. Wheeler suggested that he try to get some similar position for Mr. Carpenter, pointing out that Mr. Carpenter was too able a man to deserve no better fate than to grow old as a law clerk in San Francisco. As a result of this conversation, about six months later Mr. Williams persuaded Governor General Taft to cable for Mr. Carpenter, and he sailed for the Philippines in 1900 to become Mr. Taft's confidential stenographer. From this position he rose quickly to be assistant private secretary, and later to be private secretary.

Since that time Mr. Carpenter has been continuously in Mr. Taft's employ. He made two trips around the world with him, including the trip during which Mr. Taft conducted the negotiations with the Vatican at Rome for the purchase of the friars' lands in the Philippines. He was Mr. Taft's secretary during his cabinet days as Secretary of War, and to his Cuban experience, gaining invaluable training for the delicate duties of private secretary to the President of the United States. It may be stated here with authority that Mr. Carpenter will be Mr. Taft's successor in what is one of the most important positions in American public life.

The train of incidents leading to Mr. Carpenter's present position of trust and high responsibility is a curious example of the directing power of trifles upon the course of a man's life. But for a flash of compunction across Mr. Wheeler's mind, Mr. Carpenter would probably never have met Mr. Williams. A casual remark by Mr. Carpenter sent Mr. Williams to the Philippines, and a suggestion by Mr. Wheeler, acted upon by Mr. Williams, sent Mr. Carpenter after him and put him in the way of attaining his present distinction.

Mr. Carpenter was born in Minnesota, but his parents removed to Lake County, California, when he was very young, so that he grew up by residence being trained a Californian. His collegiate education was completed at the University of Minnesota, and was supplemented by a few months' work in a lawyer's office in Minneapolis. Immediately after returning to California in 1899 he came to San Francisco as described above.

Mr. Carpenter's face, as one sees it when meeting him, remarkably resembles the familiar portrait of Dante, the great Italian poet, and curiously enough, Mr. Carpenter is one of the foremost American scholars in Dante's works.

For a man still little beyond his thirtieth year, Mr. Carpenter has achieved an enviable position. In his intimate relation with the next President of the United States he will be peculiarly well placed for further advancement, and Californians may well keep their eyes on the career of this one of their fellow citizens.

The Case of Peter Claudianes.

Compared with the tremendously slow process of securing a jury in the recent Ruef trial, that of obtaining a jury in the case of the State against Peter Claudianes was rapid. This work began, in the latter case, on the 16th inst., and it was concluded on the 21st, a Sunday and one day in which the attention of the court was devoted to other matters intervening, so that the Claudianes jury was selected in little more than three days, while the selection of Ruef's jury required something like as many months.

The facts leading to the prosecution of Peter Claudianes, who was indicted jointly with his brother John and Felix Pauduvers, the latter now a fugitive from justice, follow. At any rate, they are such facts as District Attorney W. H. Donahue of Alameda County contended, in the opening speech for the prosecution, that he could substantiate.

On April 22, 1908, the residence of W. H. Schenck at 1370 Nineteenth Avenue, Oakland, was occupied by the Schenck family and former Supervisor James L. Gallagher, the chief witness against Aue Ruef in the recent trial, lived with the family. About half past seven o'clock in the evening of that day the house was blown up by dynamite. The mystery first enveloping the case has gradually been cleared until the prosecution, in its opening statement, contended that it could prove:

That Felix Pauduvers, the active promoter of the crime, so far as that promoter has yet been found, wrote to Peter Claudianes, then in Chico, in the fore part of last March, telling him that a "job" was awaiting him here in which there would be $2,000, which they would divide equally between them.

That Pauduvers then sent Peter Claudianes $7 to pay his fare from Chico to San Francisco.

That after Claudianes arrived here Pauduvers took him out to see the Schenck home in which Gallagher lived;

That Pauduvers tried to persuade Claudianes to poison Gallagher, but Peter preferred dynamite as the means unto death;

That the dynamite presumably employed in the perpetration of the crime was purchased by Peter in Reno, Nevada.

In confessions made at the time of their arrest, but since retracted, the Claudianes brothers admitted that they were employed by Pauduvers to murder Gallagher to prevent him from testifying in the San Francisco graft cases.

So stand the facts in the case, as the prosecution hopes and expects to be able to demonstrate them to exist.

Dr. Guy Brown, a dentist, was the first witness called for the prosecution. He testified that he was in the Schenck home at the time it was dynamited, and described how it was broken and shattered by the force of the explosion, also giving the details of the narrow escape of the inmates from destruction. He carefully examined the gas connections after the explosion, and found the meter and mains intact, so the upheaval could not have been attributed to this cause.

Detective William J. Burns testified that Peter Claudianes confessed to him that he dynamited the Schenck house under promise of pay from Pauduvers, the object being to kill Gallagher, the chief witness against Ruef. In his confession, Burns swore, Claudianes entered fully into particulars concerning how he laid the dynamite and the precautions he took to escape being injured by the explosion.

At this writing it is expected that the case will go to the jury before Christmas.

There have been few and slight changes in the status of other graft cases during the past week. It is expected that the case against Alexander S. Lathan, Ruef's ex-chauffeur, will be tried before the trial of Patrick Calhoun, but both are set for the near future. The board of police commissioners, last Monday, adjudged Captain of Police Thomas S. Duke to have been guilty of neglect of duty in the manner in which he searched Morris Haas, the shooter of Francis J. Heney, at the time when Haas, as the board believed, had on his person the Derringer with which he killed himself. The penalty under this finding will be fixed next Wednesday.

The Coast's New Cabinet Hope.

Richard Achilles Ballinger of the State of Washington, who is mentioned as Pacific Coast member of President Taft's cabinet, is by birth an Iowan and just fifty years of age. He was born in Boonesboro; went to Kansas in early life, studied in the University of Kansas, but received his degree from Williams College, in Massachusetts. After he had been admitted to the bar he went to Washington, where he was made court commissioner and later judge of the superior court. He edited the codes and statutes, Ballinger's Annotated Codes and Statutes of Washington being a well-known law book in the northwest. He is also the author of a textbook on community property. When practicing law he was the head of the firm of Ballinger, Ronald & Battle. Judge Ballinger finally got into politics, and in 1904 was elected mayor of Seattle. In March, 1907, he was appointed Commissioner of the General Land Office in Washington. Although in California he is little known, in his own State he stands high, and his selection as a cabinet officer would be very generally applauded.

Death's Meaning.

(From "Trail Dust," by Daniel S. Richardson. Published at San Francisco by M. Robertson. Copyright A. M. Robertson, 1908.)

If she were dead, and I should stand
Some night alone within the fields
Where we were wont to stray—
And from the hills should come a breath
Of far-weed with the dew—if she
Were dead, and I should see the moon
Come o'er the mountain top and hear
The call of crickets in the grass—if
Ah! me! if she were dead, methinks
That I could throw myself alone
The sod and call to her, and she Would come, though dead, to comfort me.
But if some night, all desolate,
I stood beneath the stars we loved,
And from the south a wind should blow
Against my cheek, and to my ear
Should whisper Love is dead—
Then should I know the chilling breath,
The darkness and the sting of death.

Mr. Richardson's little Christmas book of Western verse, from which this exquisite bit of sentiment is reprinted, came to The California Weekly office like a fresh breeze from the pines. The wholesomeness of outdoor California is reflected from every page of its well-turned verses. The technical workmanship is sound and the poetical spirit is sincere. A better gift book would be hard to name.

A Large Salary.

Mr. X—, a prominent lawyer of Philadelphia, was much addicted to the habit of lecturing his office staff, and the office boy came in for an unusual share of admonition whenever occasion demanded and sometimes when it did not. That his words were appreciated was made quite evident to Mr. X— one day last spring when a conversation, overheard on the elevator, between Tommy and another office boy on the same floor was repeated to him. "Watcher wages?" asked the other boy. "I get ten thousand a year," said Tommy. "Aw g'wan!" ejaculated the other boy, derisively. "Quitcher kiddin'!"

"Honest I do," said Tommy; "four dollars a week in cash and the rest in legal advice."—Harpers Weekly.

Personalia.

Many people think of Mark Twain as being of a tall, angular build. He is lean, but he is below average height.

Colonel Henry Watterston, the veteran editor of the Louisiana Journal, shares with Victor Hugo the characteristic of having an almost limitless capacity for food and drink.

Miss Miriam Michelson, the novelist, has advanced a step further in her active support of civic reform by becoming associate editor of The Liberator, the new weekly issued by the Citizens' League of Justice of San Francisco. The first number of The Liberator appeared December 12th.

Henry James, the novelist and essayist, is of an exceedingly retiring disposition. He is especially sensitive of the criticism of his American critics who declare that his style is intentionally obscure and involved. His purpose is to be mildly precise in drawing distinction of meaning, and he feels keenly what he regards as an injustice to a conscientious effort to write correctly.

Rowland Thomas, the writer of Philippine stories, is now a member of the editorial staff of The Youth's Companion. Mr. Thomas is a dog-fancier in his leisure hours.

Madame Nordica is a native of Maine, and her stage name is adapted from her family name which is Norton.

One of the unfortunates who suffered in the burning of Upton Sinclair's Utopia settlement at Englewood, N. J., was Grace McGowan Cooke, the authoress, whose leg was broken by a leap from a second-story window. In the haste of preparing an extra edition, the New York Telegram's compositor headed the list of injured with "Grace McGowan, cook."

Thomas Nelson Page married the widow of a millionaire several years ago, and since that date has produced nothing worthy of the author of "Meh Lady" and "Mahse Chan." His latest book is "Robert E. Lee, the Southerner," published recently by Charles Scribner's Sons.

Ellis Parker Butler has just added "That Pup" to the laughable zoo he founded with "Pigs Is Pigs." In private life Mr. Butler is the sober-minded editor of a trade journal in New York.

Julian Hawthorne, only son of Nathaniel Hawthorne, is the father of seventeen children—all girls. One of them, Hildegard, has inherited much of the father's talent for writing. Accompanied by a friend, Julian Hawthorne went into a bookstore in New Orleans and asked for one of his father's books. In the conversation that ensued, the dealer, who had got the relation of the father and the son turned around, remarked that "the young fellow (Nathaniel) is a fine writer, but the old man couldn't write for a whoop."

Maynard Dixon has supplied the eight pictures that are reproduced in color to illustrate a new book, "Lentala of the South Seas," by W. C. Morrow.

Miss Agnes C. Laut, author of the newly published "Conquest of the Great Northwest," has been resisting a conquest of another sort, having lately appealed to the police to protect her from the too ardent wooing of a wealthy Mexican. The caballero escaped arrest by flight to England, but declares he will yet win his suit.

Mrs. Hugh Fraser, whose "The Heart of a Geisha" has just been published by Putnam's, is an American, the daughter of the late British ambassador at Tokyo, where she was a favorite in the social life of the ruling classes of Japan.

Richard Jose, the concert singer, worked as a young man in the mines at Gold Hill, Nevada, where his voice had a local fame years before it attracted the notice of managers.

Father Junipero Serra.

There have been, for the past two years, so many engrossing problems for San Francisco it has been impossible to fix public attention upon anything less primitively necessary than street-cleaning and sewer pipes, fire protection and prosecutions. More fortunate cities may dream of purely ideal embellishments.

In the exhibition, at present being held at The Studio Building, 147 Presidio Avenue, the colossal bronze statue of Father Junipero Serra, done by Arthur Putnam for Mr. E. W. Scripps of San Diego, is the most important contribution. In spite of the fact that it is intended to stand on a high base, under the free sky, and so may possibly lose something of its ultimate effect, it nevertheless looms up impressively as an achievement of surprising force and originality. The tall, forceful figure is represented walking forward, the head bent in contemplation, the hands held loosely behind the back. It is an attitude of unaffected simplicity, but its case is hardly less great than its dignity. The head is both massive and fine, gentle and austere, the head of a scholar, with lofty brow and deep brooding eyes—eyes that have seen, with infinite pity and yearning—the sins and the suffering of the world. In strong contrast with this sensitive face are the large, toil-worn hands—here we have no mere theorist but the real priest, the man of the people, working for them and with them body and soul.

San Diego is to be congratulated on the possession of one of the finest pieces of sculpture ever done by a California sculptor, and perhaps is even more to be envied the possession of a citizen with a public-spirit not purely utilitarian.

The painter exhibitors are dwarfed by this great figure, but we find everywhere interesting work of convincing sincerity. It is pleasant to note that the magic word "Sold" ornaments several of the pictures. The exhibition will be open till the end of December.

Mrs. Fiske has made the most artistic impersonation of her career, as well as a great popular success, in her new play, "Salvation Nell," recently produced in New York. The author of the play is only twenty-three years old.

The author of the column published weekly in the Outlook under the heading, "The Speculator," is Charles Gilmer Speed, formerly of Kentucky. Mr. Speed is also an authority on thoroughbred horses, and was recommended by the United States government to select the stock used by the government to improve the strain of horses in the Philippines.

Robert Davis, who edits the bewildering cycle of minor magazines published by the Frank A. Munsey company, was one of the earliest reporters on the San Francisco Examiner.

Thomas Ybarra, whose humorous verse appears in many of the magazines, is a graduate of Harvard. His father was a former Venezuelan cabinet officer, and his mother was a Bostonian.

Vance's Financial Knowledge.

During the debate in the Senate on the Aldrich bill, Senator Lodge, deploring the apparently limited knowledge of the present membership of the Senate regarding financial problems, told of a story the late Senator Vance used to tell of his speech in North Carolina during a financial crisis, when he faced his audience and modestly admitted that, in fact, he knew very little about finance. "About the only financial principle with which I am entirely familiar," Senator Vance added, "is that it takes two names to float my note."—Exchange.

A NEW DISCOVERY

What appears to be a very important discovery has been made by a chemist in San Francisco. The proximate principles of a vegetable drug have been found which seem to act as if by magic in curing catarrh in all its forms. This new compound is sold under the name of Mem-bro-tone. A number of cases have been absolutely cured by one or two applications. More malignant or chronic cases are usually cured in from one to three weeks. This new discovery for catarrh is especially recommended for chronic inflammation and thick mucus discharge from the nasal organs. By stopping this discharge it seems to cure coryza, catarrh of the head and stomach, frontal headache, and in many instances has restored the hearing and sense of smell.

OPP. PALACE HOTEL SAN FRANCISCO

LOUIE TOY stood in the doorway of his curio-shop on Dupont Street and languidly surveyed, with half-closed eyes, the iron-workers across the way who were erecting the frame of Sang Chong's new building. Since the great fire Chinatown had been rebuilt on modern lines, though many of the structures, topped by cupolas, towers and miniature pagodas, serve to maintain the Oriental flavor for which San Francisco's Celestial quarter has become world-famous.

Louie Toy, sunning himself on his April day, was at peace with the whole world. With the insurance money he had received, and with the backing of numerous "cousins" in China, he had been enabled to resume business on a larger scale than ever before, and the great influx of Eastern tourists and sight-seers had proved liberal with their patronage. Besides, he had been one of a committee of Chinese dignitaries to receive Minister Wu when he arrived in port, en route to Washington, the week before. And the wily ambassador, who had acted as Louie's sponsor in bygone days when he was a student at Harvard, halted for a moment and uttered a low-voiced sentence of commendation and assurance that caused him to kow-tow reverently and his eyes to glisten with pride as Wu passed between the elegantly brocaded line of Orientals that stretched across the pier.

Though Louie was college-bred and spoke our language, when he was minded to, with purer diction than many of the grand ladies from the hostelry of Nob Hill who purchased his wares and who often caused his lip to curl in scorn at their "pigeon-English," yet he was a true son of Cathay, for he hated all things American except the coin, and, as Officer Carroll, of the Chinatown squad, swaggered insolently past his door, he paid no attention to his cheery salutation of "Hello, pong yow," but the delicate fingers thrust deep in the folds of his capacious sleeves twitched in anger, though he continued to gaze vacantly across the street.

He knew Carroll's failing and loathed him accordingly. He was accumulating wealth honestly, but this policeman, who considered himself the Chinaman's superior, was rapidly getting rich by levying tribute on the numerous lotteries, the games of pig-wow and fan tan, the dope-joints and various other shady enterprises that flourished in the underworld.

The officer strutted on. Busy Celestials flitted up and down the sidewalks in single file. A guttural monosyllable now and then brought a curt response as some friend of his hurried by. Little Sen Chee, Louie's only daughter, sat on an ebony stool behind a counter and carefully sorted a pile of filmy silk kimonos, while Bo Sing and Hop Wo, her father's clerks, lazily replaced an assortment of cloisonné vases and Satsuma ware that had been taken down from their shelves for inspection the night before.

Sen Chee was her father's pride. Her mother had been dead for many years, and he loved his little "Lily Flower" so dearly that she had been woefully spoiled. He had never taken another wife, but he denied a son, all his hopes and ambitions had centered in this child whom his fashionable customers petted and called "so cute" and who, through her artful ways, brought many of their shekels into his coffers.

But Sen Chee had reached the mature age of sixteen summers when Louie Toy, receiving a call from Toy King, the wealthy Jackson Street merchant and president of the Canton Society—also a widower—suddenly realized that it was time for her to have a husband, and, overjoyed by King's offer, gave an unqualified consent to his proposal for her hand.

Filial duty is one of the traditional attributes of the Oriental nature, so when Louie informed his "Lily Flower" of her forthcoming marriage, she made no comment; but her eyelids drooped suddenly, and the customers soon noticed an unwelcome change in her demeanor. She pattered languidly about the aisles in her soft slippers; she picked daintily at her food; she drank feverishly many tiny cups of scented tea, and sighed so languorously from time to time that her father, becoming alarmed and calling in a famous Chinese doctor who pressed his thumbs firmly upon her wrists, nodded sagely, and prescribed some mysterious and evil-tasting powders that Sen Chee tossed over the balcony rail into the alley at the rear of the store when Louie's back was turned.

As Louie sunned himself in the figure of a young Chinese with hat pulled low down on his forehead slouched rapidly along the street and darted a furtive glance into his store. Sen Chee, impelled by some unknown attraction, raised her eyes suddenly from the silken kimonos and smiled slightly as she saw the bold orbs that for an instant searched her own, and her heart pit-a-patted joyously, while one of the garments slid unnoticed to the floor, for she recognized Ming Tai, a companion of her school days at the Mission House where they had together learned the English tongue and where her whole being had thrilled with admiration for the handsome Chinese.

Though he was far below her in their rating of the Oriental social scale, each felt the subtle tie of affection that bound them, and, realizing that his case was hopeless, Ming dared only to look the love that he knew his tongue might never utter.

Louie Toy, too, noticed the passing of Ming. Not a muscle of his imperturbable face twitched, but the pupils of his penetrating eyes narrowed to pin-points and a great fear took root in his wily brain, for he knew what the little Sen Chee had never in her wildest flights of fancy imagined, that Ming Tai was a hatchet-man, a hired murderer of the malodorous Hip Sing Tong that levied blackmail so ruthlessly upon the wealthy inhabitants of Chinatown.

Only the day after Minister Wu's arrival Louie Toy had received a communication from the Hip Sings requesting the payment of one thousand dollars to their agent, under penalty of bodily harm for his refusal. But he had acquired a certain American obscurity and had dismissed the messenger with scorn.

He had almost forgotten the incident when the sudden appearance of Ming Tai foretold his doom.

He realized that the hatchet-man who passed his store so insolently did so as a warning, and that, if the price of his security was not forthcoming, he would, within a week, be shot down at some unguarded moment as he stood in front of his door or as he walked to or from the Chinese club to which he belonged. He might have laid the matter before the Consul, but he knew, from the experience of previous victims, that such action would only assure, though it might postpone, his fate; and as to confiding his fears to Officer Carroll, that proceeding was far beneath his dignity.

This obstinate Celestial, however, had a mind of his own, and as he shut the door and a daring plan suddenly took shadowy outline in his brain.

Why not precipitate a Tong war?

The Hip Sing Tong and the Bow Chung Tong had been bitter enemies in the past, though the hatchet had been buried for over a year.

Fir Ely, a weakened member of the Bow Chungs, had received sundry favors from Louie in bygone days and owed him a debt of gratitude.

Tin Ely would sell his soul for five hundred dollars.

He would send for Tin Ely.

If hostilities might be renewed he would be forgotten in the fracas that ensued, and some of his enemies would, no doubt, be wiped off the slate.

He straightened himself, yawned sleepily, and shuffled lazily into his store.

An hour later his clerk, Hop Wo, with a small bit of parchment concealed in the sleeve of his capacious blouse, might have been seen threading his way amongst the crowds of chattering Celestials in Spofford Alley or peering craftily into the filthy stores that filled Fish Alley with their noisome odors in a feverish search for Tin Ely, the highbinder of the Bow Chungs.

Late the same evening the restless Sen Chee stepped softly out on a little balcony that opened from the window of her sleeping-apartment above the rear of the store. In their quaint majolica pots the dainty narcissi nodded sleepily, and, as she bent over to inhale the heavy perfume of the lilies' golden hearts, a low murmur of voices fell upon her ear and she knew that her father had a visitor. She sighed plaintively as she thought of Ming, and shuddered as the realization of her future with the ancient Ton King struck her with a fear-some chill. She clasped her hands in her bosom and leaned dejectedly against the gaudy balcony rail, when suddenly something in the conversation that drifted through the open window below gripped her attention, and with a suppressed cry she dropped to her knees and clutched the posts as she strained her ears that she might catch every syllable that fell from the Oriental plotters' tongues.

"You have seen Ming Tai, my enemy?" questioned her father, his voice rising tremulously.

"Son of a dog! He would have slain me had not the great Consul, Ho Yow, compelled us to declare a truce. I was marked to die," was the answer in guttural tones, and Louie Toy drew in a quick breath of relief as he spoke again.

"Tin Ely, I have done you many kindnesses in the past. Have you forgotten?"

"Tin Ely's memory is long," in scornful tone. "Why have you sent for me?"

"Would you earn a thousand yen, Tin Ely?"

"Five hundred dollars of the American gold"—greedily—"How?"

"The Hip Sings would have my life, and Ming Tai has been drawn to do their work."

A gasp from the balcony above, and Sen Chee shrank closer to the rail.

"Impossible! The feud is ended."

"But 'tis not of the feud I speak. They have levied tribute, and I will not pay."

"Better to pay the yen, for your daughter's sake, Louie Toy," remonstrated the hatchet-man.

"No! Tin Ely. I would spend twice the sum to defeat them. But there is a simpler way. Kill Ming Tai."

Tin Ely cursed in satisfaction. "It would be sweet as the juice of scarlet poppies to me," he chuckled, "but they would choose another, and one unknown, whose pistol would soon remove you, Louie Toy," he protested.

The merchant hesitated for a space.

"You were not so stupid in years gone by," he muttered, at length.

"And your explanations were not so vague in those days, Louie Toy. You are growing old."

His temper bridled in wrath. "Can not you see, fool, that if Ming Tai is killed by a Bow Chung man the Tong war will be renewed, and I will be forgotten in the strife that follows? Then, when much blood has been spilled, the Consul will compel a truce, and to avoid his wrath, they will not dare to slay for years to come."

"But what of Tin Ely? The police of these American devils have no mercy."

"You have killed before for less than half the price."

"But the Consul's agents are determined to bring death to all who break the truce."

"One thousand yen, Tin Ely."

"My life, Louie Toy!"

"One thousand yen, Tin Ely."

"One thousand yen, Tin Ely."

"You are a fool! You can slay Ming in the dark on the eve of the sailing of the great ship for Canton. I will pay your passage and will buy witnesses who will hold their tongues until after you have gone. Then, by their testimony, they will fix the crime on you, and them—then there will be a war of the Tonges such as there has never been before!" The merchant's tones rose exultantly, and his auditor's reply proved that his argument had won.

"You are a veritable sage, Louie Toy, and I will live in comfort to the end of my days," purred the highbinder contentedly.

There was a scraping of chairs, and their voices sank into an indistinguishable murmur as they put their heads closer together for an eager discussion of Louie's plans.

A wild-eyed Chinese maiden clutched the railing of the little balcony above, then, with a sob, she arose and groped her way toward the door, where she threw herself upon her couch in an abandonment of despair and passed the hideous, long-drawn night in tears.

Hers was a problem that would have sadly wrenched a stronger soul.

On the one hand her father's life. On the other that of the man she loved. Could she save either by informing the Consul, or would she thereby doom both to certain death? Her lover would, of a certainty, be turned over to those devils of the Americans, the police, and, no doubt, humiliated. Filial duty she owed to Louie Toy; and then—through some interference of the fates—Ming might be wounded only, and if she prayed to the Joss he might win back to life while her father would be forgotten in the long-drawn battle to ensue.

This was Thursday night, and the Korea was to sail Saturday at one.

Sen Chee kept silence.

On Friday evening a light rain fell, and by ten o'clock the few sight-seers who came to brave the paddles of Dupont Street had all gone to their temporary homes. Hop Wo and Bo Sing had carried some goods into the cellar where they stopped to extinguish the lights. Sen Chee was alone in the store, and Louie Toy stepped outside to put up his shutters, but just as he turned the screw, a shadowy form flitted past the door, and Sen Chee uttered a shrill cry as he beheld the face of Ming Tai. As Louie turned in alarm a shot rang out and the merchant fell prostrate across his own stall, a bullet through his brain. Then, as Sen Chee ran from behind the counter, another Chinese form sprang into view a dozen paces away and a pistol barked rapidly, but Ming Tai was in full flight and dove down California Street just as Policeman Carroll and two plain-clothed men, guns in hand, hove in sight around the corner of the alley.

Tin Ely, bewildered by this sudden turn of affairs, waited just a fraction of an instant too long, for, when he turned to flee, he ran plump into the arms of the sergeant who was hastening to join his men and who held him while Officer Carroll wrenched a smoking "automatic" from his hand.

Sen Chee, speechless with fear, pointed an accusing finger at the hatchet-man. "You poor little devil," said Officer Carroll pityingly. Then he snapped a pair of handcuffs on his prisoner's wrists. "You'll hang for this, you d—d highbinder," he muttered, turning away as the girl, with a shriek of anguish, threw herself upon the prostrate form.

Promptly at one o'clock on Saturday the Korea sailed, and in the center of a crowd of chattering Orientals in the steerage a sad-eyed Chinese maiden huddled close against the protecting arm of the hatchet-man, Ming Tai, as the good ship ploughed her way merrily through the Golden Gate.

MINUTE MEN OF TO-DAY.

By GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS

(From a copyrighted lecture delivered at Concord, Mass., April 19, 1887.)

Citizens of a great, free and prosperous country, we come hither to honor the men, our fathers, who on this spot struck the first blow in the contest which made our country independent. Here, beneath the hills they trod, by the peaceful river on whose shores they dwelt, amidst the fields that they sowed and reaped, we come to tell their story, to know if we are their worthy children; and, standing reverently where they stood and fought and died, to swear before God and each other that "government of the people, by the people, for the people, shall not perish from the earth."

This ancient town has never failed fitly to commemorate this great day of its history. Fifty years ago, while some soldiers of the Concord fight were yet living, twenty-five years ago, while still a few venerable survivors lingered, you renewed the pious vow. But the last living link with the Revolution has long been broken; and we who stand here to-day have a sympathy with the men at the old North Bridge, which those who preceded us here at earlier celebrations could not know. With them war was a name and a tradition. When they assembled to celebrate this day, they saw a little group of tottering forms, whose pride was that, before living memory, they had been minute-men of American independence.

But with us, how changed! War is no longer a tradition, half romantic, and obscure. It has ravaged how many of our homes, it has wrung how many of the hearts before me! North and south, we know the war. We do not count around us a few feeble veterans of the contest, but we are girt with a cloud of witnesses. Behold them here to-day, sharing in these pious and peaceful rites, the honored citizens whose glory it is to remember the martyrdom of American liberty and union. These men of to-day interpret to us, with resistless eloquence, the men and the times we commemorate. Now, if never before, we understand the Revolution. Now we know the secrets of the old hearts and homes.

No royal governor sits in yon state's capital; no hostile fleet for many a year has vexed the waters of our coast; nor is any army but our own ever likely to tread our soil. Not such are our enemies to-day. They do not come proudly stepping to the drum-beat, with bayonets flashing in the morning sun. But wherever party spirit shall strain the ancient guaranties of freedom, or bigotry and ignorance shall lay their cruel hands upon equality, or the arrogance of caste shall strike at equal rights, or corruption shall poison the very springs of national life, there, minute-men of liberty, are your Lexington green and Concord bridge! And, as you love your country and your kind, and would have your children rise up and call you blessed, spare not the enemy! Over the hills, out of the earth, down from the clouds, pour in resistless might! Fire from every rock and tree, from door and window, from hearthstone and chimney, hang upon his flank and rear from morn to sunset, and so through a land blazing with holy indignation, hurl the hordes of ignorance and corruption and injustice back, back in utter defeat and ruin.

Human Express Package.

Ticketed in an express package, eleven-year-old Harlin Bouchurs, son of divorced parents, travels between his father and mother. He arrived in Denver recently with this placard tied to his coat label:

"Harlin Bouchurs, en route to Dolores, Col., via C. B. and Q. to Denver, D. and R. G. to Ridgeway, R. G. S. to Dolores."

The boy's parents were divorced about two years ago.

Loot From Peking.

A story of the looting following the siege of Peking, here written for the first time, for The California Weekly, relates to the direct service of a rich mandarin, which went the way of darkness into foreign hands. Two English men, after looting had been made unsafe by the presence of the soldiery, set covetous eyes on this mandarin's silver, and plotted to steal it. They rented a native hotel near his palace, and dug a tunnel from within it to a point directly beneath his house. Six weeks were spent in making this subterranean bore, and infinite pains and ingenuity were expended in getting rid of the dirt, which they carried to the river nightly stuffed in their trousers' legs.

At last they were rewarded. They knew that the tunnel was complete, and so they bought a native boat with which to float down the Pei-Ho River with the loot. When everything was ready they opened the end of the tunnel at dead of night, secured a huge quantity of silver plates, returned to the hut, melted the silver into an unrecognizable mass, stole with it in sacks to their boat, and slipped away down the river in the darkness. For two weeks they emulated Huck Finn's adventures on the raft, and at last made the seacoast, and got to Manila with their booty. After carefully sounding silversmiths here they found one whom they dared to sell their treasure to, and brought it forth. He submitted it to tests of value while they looked on with glistening eyes.

"How much is it worth?" they whispered. "About ten dollars to the ton, I should say. That stuff is pewter."

And it was, too.

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

The Constitution and the Nation.

It has not been finally settled whether the hen is the mother of the egg or the egg mother of the hen, and likewise, men have not ceased to dispute as to whether the nation of the United States made the Constitution of the United States or the constitution made the nation. If that dispute were once clearly out of the way the progress of the nation might be greatly accelerated.

This brings us to ask the question, "What is a nation anyhow?" Webster says: "The body of inhabitants of a country united under an independent government of their own." One view of the case is that the body of inhabitants make the government; the other side almost goes to the absurd length of affirming that the government constituted the body of inhabitants. A clear understanding of the issue is essential to a proper appreciation of the trend of our national life.

It is a matter of common knowledge that one community differs from another in spirit and in the way it looks at things, one city differs from another in its ideals and in what it stands for, strives to attain or stoutly opposes, and who needs to be told that there is a broad difference in the spirit of the people of Massachusetts and Kentucky, of California and New York, of Georgia and Kansas. These differences will find expression in the usages which obtain in the several communities, in the character of the cities, the constitutions and the laws of the States, but was it the usages, characters, laws and constitutions which made these differences?

The American nation, as already stated, is essentially Anglo-Saxon in its love of liberty, in its power for individual initiative and in its genius for co-operative effort founded upon deliberation and agreement. Has this love, this power and this genius expressed itself in the constitutions and institutions of the American nation, or was it the constitutions and institutions founded under the constitution that made this people what they are?

When confronting a new step on the part of the nation one school of statesmen get down the constitution that they may ascertain from it whether or not the nation has power to take any such step. The other school declares off-hand that the nation may take any step it wants to and only refers to the constitution to see how that step may be taken. So far a constitutional way has been found for taking any step that the nation has really wanted to take, although after much discussion and with many heart burnings over the controversy.

In time, it would appear almost as though the whole political history of the great republic had turned upon the point as to whether the hen or the egg came first, whether the constitution made the nation or the nation made the constitution. In an issue so much mooted as this one it would be out of place for The California Weekly to declare, without limitation, for the one theory or the other, and yet one or the other, not both, must dominate the politics of the nation.

Perhaps it will be sufficient to say that, in recent years, at any rate since the Civil War, the general trend has been to the conviction that the American nation is of itself, and apart from any and all constitutions, a living organism, that it has all the powers that appertain to any other nation no matter what its form of government may be or whether it have a constitution at all or not, and that the constitution merely sets forth in formal statements, not what powers the nation has, but how the powers it has shall be used.

When the reader shall have made such a study of this controversy over the constitution as the importance of the issue merits, and has determined which view of the case he will make his own, he will be rewarded by learning with what political party he will wish to affiliate, and every citizen should affiliate with the political party that comes nearest to expressing his views of government. The lone social unit is about as inconsequential as the lone cipher.

Have You a Son?

Persons of foreign birth often put themselves upon inquiry concerning their government by adoption, but native sons sometimes seem to expect that preparation for citizenship will come without conscious effort. As with every other good thing good citizenship must be achieved. If the son is to become a better citizen than the father he must be given a better opportunity to fit himself for citizenship. The California Weekly is the only paper in California that has undertaken a School for Citizenship. It will put before its readers sympathetic analyses of American and Californian institutions, the spirit as well as the form, for the form is a mere gridiron without the spirit and not very intelligible. Has the reader a son of suitable age? Put The California Weekly into his hands. He may not avail himself of the opportunity thus afforded, but his father will have done his duty by him. He will have put a liberal education in citizenship within his reach.

Do You Hear Well?

The Stolz Electrophone—A New, Electrical, Scientific and Practical Invention for those who are Deaf or Partially Deaf.

MAY NOW BE TESTED IN YOUR OWN HOME.

Deaf or partially deaf people now may make a trial of the Stolz Electrophone at home. This personal, practical test serves to prove that the device satisfies, with ease, every requirement of a perfect hearing device.

This new invention renders unnecessary such clumsy, unsightly and frequently harmful devices as trumpets, horns, tubes, ear drums, fans, etc. It is a tiny electric telephone that fits on the ear and which, the instant it is applied, magnifies the sound waves in such manner as to cause an astonishing increase in the clearness of all sounds. It overcomes the buzzing and roaring ear noises and, also, so constantly and electrically exercises the vital parts of the ear that, usually, the natural unaided hearing ability is gradually restored.

THE PLEDGE OF CITIZENSHIP

I, a citizen of the United States of America, realizing that a free Republic is an impossibility unless the citizen performs his civic duty, hereby pledge myself upon my sacred honor never to fail to exercise my right of citizenship by voting at every election, primary or secondary, wherever it is possible and legal for me to render that service to my country, my health permitting me so to do.

In taking this pledge it is distinctly understood that I in no way obligate myself to vote for any particular party, any definite candidate or any certain measure. I am binding myself only to my Country, and pledging myself solely to the faithful performance of the duty I owe to her as a citizen.

WHY TAKE THE FOREGOING PLEDGE?

Those taking the foregoing pledge, signing and sending it to this office, will be enrolled upon The California Weekly's "School for Citizenship," which will be a permanent feature of this paper. It will entitle the person sending in his name to have answered, either through the columns of the paper or by letter, any rational question he may ask concerning public affairs, and, generally, by the person best equipped to afford the desired information. It will also entitle the signer to such special literature bearing upon the obligations and opportunities of good citizenship as may from time to time be issued. When a pledge is made in this way it is especially desired that it be taken and signed by young men lately become voters or who will cast their first votes two years hence. It will take but a moment to clip out the pledge, sign, enclose in an envelope, stamp and address to "School for Citizenship," office The California Weekly, 26 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, and it opens the way for a liberal education in citizenship.

THE SENTENCING OF RUEF.

The sentence of Abe Ruef to fourteen years in prison is a subject of congratulation, not because the enemies of Ruef may gloat over his fall, nor because the enemies of the graft prosecution may hope for a rest, now that a scapegoat is found, but because this conviction is the longest single step yet taken in the long and rocky road to justice.

Abe Ruef is sentenced. "But he has not begun to serve his sentence," answers the pessimist. True; but, leaving that, consider how much is already accomplished. Contrast Abe Ruef, the convicted felon, actually in jail and under sentence to the penitentiary, with the Abe Ruef of only two years ago, the owner of a mayor, dictator of a city and accredited agent of the maker of governors and senators. To have deposed that power is already a complete victory for the cause of public honesty.

What remains is the vindication of our judicial system. And on that point, we see no cause for pessimism.

It is the judgment of good lawyers that no error requiring reversal was committed in this trial. No legal procedure is flawless, and a long series of precedents has developed a habit of hypercritical minuteness in the review of cases which gives exaggerated importance to those flaws, and has brought more censure than they probably deserve on the heads of the individual judges who last follow these precedents. But there is no reason to suppose that the law, even in its present state, will require the reversal of this case, nor to believe that it would be reversed except under imperative requirement of law. At least, this is the sanely hopeful view.

There is a disposition on the part of some tired people and some malicious ones to cry "hold; enough! Ruef is convicted; why seek further?" But Ruef is not the whole, nor even the foundation, of the system of graft. The boss is a product, not the creator. When government is for sale, and those who should be the chief citizens of the republic are ready corruptly to buy it, there must be an intermediary. That intermediary is a criminal, and must be punished. But they who corrupt and they who are corrupted are criminals, too. Not all of each class can usually be punished, but if any are omitted it should not be the bribe-givers, who cover their crimes with the cloak of social respectability. The conviction of Ruef would be a sorry triumph indeed if it were the excuse for relaxing vigilance against those whose agent he was. The graft prosecutions must continue and they should have the unflinching support of public sentiment, for another two years, if necessary.

THE DISASTER TO ITALY.

The sympathy of the world, and first of San Francisco, will go out to the sufferers from the earthquake which has devastated Southern Italy and Sicily. The fire which destroyed San Francisco, in the wake of what was really only a moderate earthquake, struck the commercial imagination of our time as the supreme disaster of history, simply by reason of the unprecedented destruction of property and the mechanism of exchange. But the human disaster to San Francisco was insignificant. There were few deaths, and there was comparatively little physical suffering. Even the terror was absent, under the calm cheerfulness which disaster engendered in a self-reliant people. Contrasted with the human havoc and consternation caused by this explosion in the ancient forge of Vulcan, the San Francisco disaster was nothing. What we lost was money and buildings and a temporary deprivation of the modern conveniences of life. What Southern Italy has lost is a large share of its population, all its social organization, apparently all of its cities, and doubtless the present means of continuing even its agricultural life. At least the early reports, at this writing, indicate a chaos beyond all possible comparison with the disaster in San Francisco.

It is not a self-reliant people that has been thrown into confusion, and the problem of relief will be long and difficult. Southern Italy is beautiful and romantic, but the sons of Greek colonists, Roman slaves, and Moorish invaders, developed under many centuries of confusion and misgovernment, are a very different population from the energetic and prosperous people of Northern Italy. A certain religious fatalism will give them courage, but the civic problem must be handled from the outside. Fortunately, the present Italian government is abundantly capable of administering the task. It may not be able to supply all the money. In that case, the generosity of the world should respond.

WHAT IS THE HOPE?

Pessimism is easy. The San Francisco graft is only partly punished and the Pittsburg graft shows that San Francisco's disgrace was not unique. The Senate still belongs to the predatory interests, and the House of Representatives is about to elect Cannon. Things may be looking better, but it is a dreadfully slow process.

So pessimism is easy. But optimism only calls for a little further view. The "interests" may control a national convention (and did) just as they control Congress, but they do not dare let that convention nominate one of their own kind for president. Public opinion controls presidential nominations, even through the imperfect medium of political conventions. We had Roosevelt, we are to have Taft, and no power on earth can prevent the nomination, after Taft, of himself or some one like him, representative of the people. So the presidency, at least, the people have, because they take the trouble to insist on getting it. The people's control of the Senate, last bulwark of privilege, is also in sight. The old oligarchy is already deposed or discouraged, and each election sends to the Senate an increasing proportion of people's men (alas! not from California). A senatorship can be made a State issue, and a State issue can be fought, and sometimes won, on public and moral ground. The presidency is won, and of the Senate there is hope.

The House of Representatives will remain longest misrepresentative of the people because, paradoxically, it is closest to the people. The people insist on regarding their representative in Congress as a local officer, and elect him to "get things." The way to get things is to stand in. So the lower house of Congress may long remain a stand-in body, because the people want it so. But, with the President as boss, we can already get a considerable degree of popular legislation, even with both branches of Congress hostile. With a friendly Senate, the people will be in control. Then, the people's side will be the one to stand on. And so we shall get the House of Representatives also. The cities we are getting, by putting grafters in jail or scaring them honest. Governors, in increasing numbers, are representing the people, and clubbing their legislatures into doing so. Legislatures themselves are getting better. There is visible progress, and good ground for hope.

If anybody thinks that President Taft is to be "easy," he will soon find out to the contrary. Watch his present swinging of the big stick over a stand-pat Congress. The Roosevelt maxim "speak softly, but carry a big stick," is a good one, but President Roosevelt is temperamentally capable of carrying out only one-half of it. President Taft will realize both.

WHO SHALL BOSS THE HOUSE?

The "insurgents" in the national House of Representatives will doubtless accomplish a much-needed clarification, whether they accomplish any immediate reform or not. The main thing is to get an honest reexamination of the legislative mechanism, to see how far it can be made more directly responsive to the will of Congress without making it responsive to so many separate wills that the result is deadlock.

Historically, the dictatorial power conferred on the Speaker by the House of Representatives has been the natural result of the helplessness of unorganized numbers. The lower house of Congress is a very numerous body, in which each member represents a separate district and nobody represents the United States. The most important things to each member are his local bills, while the most important thing to the body as a whole are the national bills. There has to be some sort of a steeringman or steering committee, to secure for the big things their right of way over the small things, and to hold the big things to some sort of a coherent legislative program. This is done in England by the ministry, or government, and in every parliamentary government except ours by some constitutional authority, responsible for initiating and organizing legislation. There is no other way to do it, and our national legislature, lacking a legal repository of this power, is forced to provide an extra-legal one. To go back only a quarter of a century, to the days of Samuel J. Randall, the power then resided in the Chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. By holding back the supply bills, and using them to obstruct or facilitate other legislation, Randall dominated Congress to his will. The "insurgents" of that day sought a remedy by dividing the appropriation bills among many committees, with the final result that such a thing as an American budget is made impossible. Not only does the committee which provides for raising money have nothing to do with the spending of it, but the expenditures are determined by many committees, without consultation or system. So budget chaos is the chief heritage left by the older insurgents. Finally, after the scattering of the power of the Appropriations dictator had left Congress in a permanent dead-lock, Speaker Reed centered the power in the presiding officer, where it has remained ever since. The chief objection to the system, even now, is that Speaker Cannon happens to be a reactionist, and therefore any power residing in the speakership will be used on the side of reaction, so long as he wields it. And the chief vice of such a dictatorship is that the incumbent is able to perpetuate himself in power. If the speaker were a progressive, there would be little complaint. Only the stand-patters object to the dictatorship of President Roosevelt. Nobody, in fact, much objects to dictatorship these days, if it is on his side. And Congress must be managed by somebody. Left to itself, it is, confessedly unmanageable.

A NEW WAY OF CARVING SUCCESS.

A controversy over conditions in the county hospital has been going on in Sacramento. It began with a report made by the city board of health, which complained that the hospital was deficient and unfit. This brought forth the reply from the superintendent that it was merely a question of money; that it was true the hospital did not give the care which the indigent sick should receive, but it was because the county supervisors stinted the appropriations, and that the hospital would be made as good as the means available would permit. This sounded plausible, and if the discussion had stopped there the public would have attributed the admitted deficiencies of the institution to the penuriousness of the supervisors.

But Dr. N. K. Foster, Secretary of the State Board of Health, entered the controversy, and his rejoinder to the superintendent was crushing. He showed that the need of the hospital was not so much for new buildings or a larger number of attendants as it was for the adoption of ordinary sanitary precautions; he showed that disease-breeding flies swarmed in all parts of the hospital and no screens were used to keep them out; that filth prevailed where cleanliness should rule, and that until recently there was no sewer system, the sewerage being permitted to run out on the ground and poison the air. There was no answer to Dr. Foster's statement, presumably because there could be none. A little later representatives of both the State and the city boards of health followed the matter up with another publication in which they said that the hospital was supplied with one of the finest surgical departments to be found anywhere, but that sanitation was almost ignored. This was a severe thrust, because the man who was superintendent of the Sacramento hospital for many years, and who was succeeded recently by his son, enjoys a high reputation for surgical skill, gained by operating on thousands of indigent patients. The intimation of the boards of health was that he had cut and carved and made himself a master of surgery while letting sanitation take care of itself. There are doubtless other county hospitals in California no better than the one in Sacramento has been.

THROW OFF THE YOKE.

California has been politically a satrapy of the Southern Pacific railroad for more years than anybody cares to remember. It has deprived us of our liberties, corrupted our government, packed our courts, and falsified our national representation. Patriotic men have grieved, idealists have preached, and pessimists have sneered, but liberty is cheap and we have been busy. It is really cheaper to submit to usurpation than to throw it off, provided it does not rob us individually, so, measuring right and liberty by their price, we have submitted. A busy people may submit to almost any government, provided it does not increase taxes, and we have been busy.

But now comes the tax, and even Business is aroused. Against the proposed increase of freight rates, which will take fully $10,000,000 a year out of the pockets of the producers and consumers of California, there has been raised up probably the most effective organization, of business and people, that California ever saw. By mere agitation that organization has already stopped the increase of express rates and broken the steamboat combine. By all the resources of business and of law it will resist the increase of freight rates; and it will win. We may submit to the tyrant who usurps our government, but we will not yield to the robber who filches our purse. So we are organized for successful resistance.

Not to confuse the immediate issue, nor to mingle politics with business, does it not equally follow that California will never be free until it is aroused and organized to resist political as well as economic usurpation? The railroads do not rule us for amusement. They know that political control can be coined into business profit. When the people of California realize the corollary that foreign political control means domestic business loss, then they will be as urgent to govern themselves as the political bureau of the railroad has long been to rule them.

AN EXPANDING VISION.

Behold a vision, and a retrospect. Fifty years ago the renaissance of Japan began, but it was a decade or two before the world took more than a curious interest in it. Now we know that it was the most important thing that ever happened to the Pacific world. Ten years or more ago the renaissance of China began, but we have scarcely yet realized that it is so far under way. Yet the only critical period is already behind us. If China had been dismembered into European colonies, as threatened only a few years ago, the whole history of the world would have been started irrevocably in one direction. Because it was not dismembered then, it is never going to be dismembered, and the whole history of the world is now irrevocably started in the other direction. That crisis is past forever. The new China has begun, and the men who are to lead it are now studying, or recently graduated, in the universities of America, Europe and Japan. One stroke of an Emperor's vermilion pencil will change the educational system of China, whenever there are teachers ready for the new schools, and those teachers are now preparing. A university generation is four years; a school generation at most a dozen. Add the two, and you have sixteen years to spread Western knowledge to the uttermost confines of China. As Chinese government and institutions are all based on education, the ramifications of the transformation are incalculable. And as the Chinese are an industrial and commercial people, the first results will be industrial and commercial. Then, for us, comes the new and great expansion. Our ill-adjusted system of capital and labor prospers only in an expanding world. There must be new things to do with the surplus of the old, or capital becomes valueless. China will furnish the outlet, and can take up for generations all the expanding margins of the world's investment. It will make China rich and us rich. And California, at the front door of the white man's world, facing the front door of the yellow man's world, must guard the boundaries, but may also take the lead of both. It is a vision and a prospect which the imagination refuses to bound. The startling thing is that its realization appears immediately at hand.

THE PROPOSED DIRECT PRIMARY BILL.

A careful scrutiny of the direct primary bill, prepared by the Direct Primary League for submission to the coming legislature, warrants the opinion that it is a good measure, prepared in good faith by good men, and that if it were enacted into law just as it is it would prove reasonably satisfactory.

In saying this consideration is given to the state of the public mind at this time, which is not prepared for what it will be prepared for ten years hence. For instance, the bill proposes to do away with nominating conventions entirely, whereas, ten years later, nominating conventions are likely to be provided for to be held before or after primary elections in order to prevent nominations being made by insignificant minorities of the whole vote cast. This is the supreme danger of a direct primary nominating system, but that can not well be provided against at this time. It were better also if nominations for judicial positions were made by petition only, and left entirely out of partisan controversy, but that is likely to be accomplished by another measure and this one made conformable to it.

The measure is founded upon the assumption that government shall be by political parties and that if there are to be non-partisan candidacies they must be presented to voters by petition and not by primary elections. The test of time has proven this, in the main, sound. In no other way can government be by a majority. Without political parties the voting constituencies inevitably split up into factions and whoever takes office must govern with a majority against him and, sometimes, with a small minority committed to his support. This makes government irresponsible and uncertain. It is better to fight differences out in contests within political organizations to the end that government may be by responsible parties, as in England and America, rather than by irresponsible and unstable coalitions as in France and Germany.

Now what of the campaign for this measure before the legislature? The Herrin organization holds a majority in the legislature, not as absolutely as last session, but sufficiently to serve the purposes of the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company unless the whole State is set into action for the things it wants and will have. No person of sound mind supposes for a moment that the Herrin machine wants a direct primary law that will permit the people to direct. Mr. Herrin wants to do the directing. Back of Mr. Herrin stands Mr. Harriman and back of Mr. Harriman stands the whole Standard Oil confraternity who do not wish the Men of California to govern California. They want to govern it through Harriman, Herrin and the Southern Pacific Political Bureau. The existing system is adequate to that end. Herrin and his henchmen will find some way of defeating this or any other sincere measure—unless the Men of California make it plain that they will not be trifled with. In the senate is E. I. Wolfe and in the assembly Grove L. Johnson, able, artful lieutenants of Herrin. They will "quer" this bill if they can.

Therefore the only thing for the Men of California to do is to make a wedge of themselves behind the bill submitted by the Direct Primary League and with it break the Southern Pacific's legislative line. The bill is not perfect, but it is infinitely nearer perfect as it is than it will be after the Herrin forces shall have amended it into an unspeakable hodgepodge and so out of court. Those who believe with the California Weekly that the ultimate direct primary law will differ from this bill in essential particulars can afford to wait for time to justify their opinion, but they can not afford to put themselves in an attitude of hostility to this measure. Herrin has dugged a pit for such friends of a direct primary to fall into. Therefore get in behind this bill and push it along.

COMPERS, MITCHELL AND MORRISON.

The sentencing of Gompers, Mitchell and Morrison to jail for contempt of court startled the nation. That, of itself, will not hurt. It requires a jolt to set eighty-five millions of people to thinking and it is time for them to be thinking hard and to this point. There is an issue involved that must be worked out before we can have industrial peace in this country and the sooner it is worked out the sooner we shall have industrial peace.

Two years ago last August a group of metal polishers working for the Buck Stove and Range Company of St. Louis went out on strike. The American Federation of Labor espoused the side of the men and notified its great membership that the stove company was "unfair" and that "we don't patronize it." The stove company brought suit in a court in the District of Columbia to enjoin the federation from continuing the notification to its membership. The injunction was granted and the defendants openly disobeyed the injunction.

The defendants disobeyed the injunction because they were advised that it was issued contrary to law, holding that an invalid command is no command. The court held that any command issuing from a court is to be obeyed pending a final determination of the suit. This is the immediate issue and should not be difficult of determination without setting the whole country by the ears.

The paramount issue is as to the unlawfulness and impolicy of the boycott in any form, or of the lawfulness and sound policy of it in certain forms. This issue will not be settled until settled right and it cannot be settled right until public opinion makes up its mind what is right.

We are all of us boycotting persons, firms and corporations every day of our lives for one reason or another that seems to us to have sufficient justification, but we do that individually and, whether rightfully or wrongfully, no man-made law can reach us. How far we may do the thing collectively, and upon what justification, neither courts, legislatures nor congresses have finally determined. The issue must be threshed out so that all may know what their rights and obligations are, and the case of Gompers, Mitchell and Morrison should facilitate the process.

The boycott, whether primary, secondary or "persuasive," is an instrument of power. It may be well used, as when a community withdraws its patronage from newspapers that sell their editorial opinions and let for hire their news columns, to the deceiving of the public; or it may be wrongfully used, as in ruining an employer because he resists tyranny with fortitude.

The original cause of controversy between the Buck Stove Company and its metal polishers has been lost sight of. If the treatment of the men by the company was oppressive and against sound public policy the championing of their cause by the American Federation of Labor was proper and it was proper for the federation to inform its membership of the facts and to advise that patronage be withheld from the company until it repented of its wrong-doing; but if the American Federation of Labor ordered the boycott as a means of coercion, to enforce its will upon the stove company oppressively, that boycott was wrongfully employed and the labor organization should be held liable in damages.

This brings to view a fundamental delinquency of society and one that should be remedied. Society has established no adequate means of determining the issue of right and wrong between industrial adversaries. It has permitted these issues to be determined by waging private warfare at vast public cost and has not even put itself to the trouble of determining the rules by which such private warfare may be waged. The most it has attempted to do is to say that the boycott is not a legitimate weapon of warfare. In this it has probably gone too far, for the boycott is as natural a weapon of offense or defense as the fist and the rightfulness or wrongfulness of its use is to be judged by the facts in each case.

The point deserving of emphasis is that it is high time for organized society (government) to enter upon the task of furnishing some adequate tribunal for ascertaining the right or wrong in each industrial controversy, and then to declare to what extent, if at all, an associated boycott may be employed as a means of enforcing the right and resisting the wrong. The individual boycott is beyond the reach of any decision of court or legislative enactment. Like the fist it will be used as long as men resist evil.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

We have lately celebrated the birthday of the greatest character in human history and we shall, in a few weeks, be called upon fitly to commemorate the birthday of the greatest character in American history. At the moment that the body of President McKinley was lowered into his grave at Canton, Ohio, out of respect to him, the great city of New York, at a prearranged signal, stopped as still as stood the sun on the plains of Gibeon. Not a car moved, not a wheel turned and for three or five minutes those upon the street stood in their tracks with heads uncovered. The spectacle was one that brought tears to many thousand eyes. It was as though the whole city stood in the hush of the ante-chamber of death.

It is proposed that on the 12th of February next the great city of New York shall again pause from its rush for three minutes in honor of the birth of a baby a hundred years ago. It is likely that other cities will do likewise and it were well if every train, every car, every wheel of industry on this continent were to come to a full stop at meridian of that day, or at such a moment at each meridian line as will, precalculated, bring the continent to a full stop at absolutely the same instant, and not relatively. Nothing should be left undone that can be done to fix indelibly upon the American mind the significance of the birthday of Abraham Lincoln, America's greatest hero, for in the character of our heroes shall we find an evolutionary impulse tending to form the character of the ultimate American.

What is it that we find in the character of Abraham Lincoln that prompts a great city like New York, once in open rebellion against his authority, to stop short in its human whirl to bare the head and thank Almighty God that, a century before, a man child was born into the world? Is it because he was assassinated? So were Garfield and McKinley, but neither of these has the hold upon the American heart that Lincoln has.

America has produced other great men, greater in their several aspects of greatness, perhaps, than he, but in no instance has that greatness given them the premiership in the American heart that Lincoln holds. Washington was great as a commander and great as a statesman, and his name is greatly revered but not loved as Lincoln's is loved. Daniel Webster was a greater orator, Thomas Jefferson a greater politician and organizer, Salmon P. Chase a greater lawyer, but only Lincoln died a death that, for its courage, challenged the admiration of the world. Theodore Roosevelt has made a more robust and militant championship of the right as he sees it. Yet this man, who was once a great general, a great lawyer nor a great orator, according to the world's standards, stands head and shoulders above them all in the estimation of a grateful posterity.

What, then, are the things that we love in Lincoln? His steadiness of purpose, never wavering for a moment from his determination to save the Union. We love him for that. His tireless patience with the foibles and follies of those by whom he was surrounded and through whom he must save the Union if it was to be saved, his long-suffering endurance with the petty jealousies and bickerings over precedence among officers of the army without whose co-operation nothing could be done; his forgetfulness of self when those about him were consumed with personal ambition; his leniency for the South, his wayward prodigals whom he would welcome home, bind up their wounds and forgive them their trespasses. For these things we love Lincoln and for these this nation has made Abraham Lincoln its preeminent hero.

Come to think of it, it is not the qualities which the American nation has found in Abraham Lincoln worthy of highest admiration just the qualities which the world has found in the Man of Nazareth most worthy to love?

Avant Mr. Burns!

Mr. William J. Burns is persona non grata with the predatory gentry of San Francisco and the President is blamed for his being here. There is a latent hope in the breast of predatory gentility, aforesaid, that, with the stepping out of President Roosevelt, Mr. Burns may be recalled by the succeeding administration and commissioned to pursue such plain, ordinary, low-browed criminality as counterfeiting and smuggling, robbing postoffices and hen roosts. Mr. William J. Burns has been a troublesome guest in the metropolis of the Pacific Coast. He has kept the community by the ears for two years, has landed some persons in jail, if not in state prison, and has so tarred the reputations of a number of genteel robbers that their families will hardly rid themselves of the taint for three generations. But for him the gentle Peter Claudianus would now be as care free as the ubiquitous coyote, putting out of the way public prosecutors and indispensable witnesses with the facility with which coyotes eliminate incubator chickens from the tax roll. Roosevelt, Heney, Burns, uncouth persons, all! Among the shortcomings of Mr. Rudolph Spreckels there is none more unpardonable than that, having had the advantages which wealth and social distinction give, he has turned his back upon his class and consorted with such imperfect characters as Roosevelt, Heney and Burns. Avant Mr. Burns! Your presence in San Francisco is distasteful to many. Your methods shock their sensibilities and give them a sense of insecurity that embitters them toward you.

Will Let Him Down Hard.

There are evidences that the predatory gentry are preparing to let President Roosevelt down from official to private life with abruptness. Thereafter they will take pleasure in treating him with scorn. He will not be invited to attend their functions. He is looked upon by them as being a vulgar person with a very imperfect temperament. He is charged with having been given to gum-shoe methods with consequences so distasteful to the predatory gentry that their hearts are filled with bitterness toward him. In any controversy that may arise in the wilds of Africa between Theodore Roosevelt and the lions, they entertain the hope that the lions may have at least an equality of opportunity. It is a reasonable expectation that genteel rascality in and out of Congress, and apologists for genteel rascality in and out of Congress, will, during the last two months of his tenure of office, spare not the lash of their contempt from the back of Theodore Roosevelt. They feel that they are getting out of the woods, but they should not whistle too soon for they are likely to find whole jungles of discontent ahead of them. Whatever may happen to the "wave of prosperity," the wave of moral regeneration of official and business life in this nation will sweep on unimpeded. Theodore Roosevelt has committed his unfinished task to hands fit and willing to go on with "gum-shoe" methods so distasteful to predatory interests, but so thoroughly satisfactory to an awakened national conscience.

The Claudianes Case.

Great is dynamite! The civilized world is likely to see more of it before it sees less. In the hands of malevolence, unweakened by imbecility or whisky, its possibilities baffle the imagination. Isabel Martin trusted her bomb throwing to an irresponsible, derelict human wif, and, at the critical moment, he babbled. The demoniac who undertook to blow Big Jim Gallagher into atoms, for obvious reasons, took John Barleycorn into service and, at the crucial moment, he, too, babbled, else both of these offenses must have remained inex-pleable until revealed on the Day of Judgment. Perhaps it is to whisky and irresponsibility that society must look for protection from annihilation. The tracks that dynamite leaves seldom lead anywhere. What an uncomfortable feeling it does leave in the timorous mind to reflect that, for a few hundred dollars more or less, some person can be found so devoid of moral sense as to be willing to blow a whole household into space that the death of one man may be accomplished! And to think also that, to prevent the due and proper course of the law, there are those who will hire assassination by wholesale! At the time of the occurrence kid-gloved desperadoes and their sympathizers were quick to attribute the crime to dementia. The Claudianes trial proved the event to have been the result of deliberate design for a deliberate purpose. Wanting Paudevaris the law is not able to trace the murderous outrage to its source. The public mind is under no such disability. Its conclusions will be drawn as unerringly as the bow of Robin Hood.

Claus Spreckels.

There has been carried to his final rest one of the strong men of our time. Claus Spreckels was a man of affairs. He handled great enterprises as Ulysses handled his great bow, with ease, and in making a way for himself from poverty to fortune he made room for many. His ideals may not have been the highest or broadest, but they were those of his time and the best among the men of his class. His name will not be cherished as that of a great philanthropist, but he had no ambition to have his philanthropies heralded and felt himself under no necessity for appeasing the wrath of God by giving away ill-gotten gains, for his gains were not, according to the standards of his time, ill-gotten. Under an ideal form of industrial and commercial life no man will die as rich as he, but we are far from that ideal. And there is this to be said for Claus Spreckels and his methods: He found no necessity for befouling his path to great wealth by resorting to bribery and graft. There has never been a whisper charging him with seeking to corrupt the fountains of justice or the purity of the ballot. He was a resolute, plain-spoken, indomitable man with a rugged honesty of purpose that caused him to throw his influence upon the side of good government and square dealing whenever there seemed a necessity for his taking a hand in public affairs, for which he had no particular inclination. At one time there was talk of his having relinquished the Valley road to the general hurt and to his own advantage, but that talk had no better foundation than a sense of disappointment that the Santa Fe should have surrendered to the Southern Pacific and for that he was in no wise responsible. It was doubtless as much of a disappointment to him as to others and as unforeseen by him as by others. Full of years Claus Spreckels, dying, left his family a heritage more valuable than the millions he bequeathed—that of having acquired a great fortune without being either an oppressor of his fellow men or resorting to graft.

Only the Initiative This Time.

Elsewhere in this paper will be found a first draft of a constitutional amendment prepared by the Direct Legislation League of California for submission to the legislature for submission, in turn, to the people for acceptance two years hence. The League has concluded to bend its energies toward initiating legislation rather than having referred to the people legislation that may be deemed antagonistic to the public interest. There is no question that representative government has too often represented special interests rather than the common good and that this has been particularly true of legislatures and conventions. The general tendency, therefore, is for the people as a whole to take to themselves more and more of the powers of government instead of delegating such powers to persons who too often prove faithless. This tendency is wholesome and hopeful if it does not go so far as to attempt functions that cannot be performed in the aggregate. This proposed amendment should be given careful scrutiny and support given when perfected. The power to initiate legislation outside of a legislature will be found of great advantage many times.

Et Tu Pittsburg!

When there is a poisoned humor in the blood there is no knowing where the eliminating abscess will make its appearance. The cheek is not to be blamed if it appear there or the neck if it appear there. The bane is in the blood and only by purifying the blood can a cure be accomplished. It is so with ailments in the body politic. San Francisco had not worse men than Kansas City, or St. Louis than Chicago, and Pittsburg is not a sinner above many another American city. Somewhere there was a breaking down of the tissue at certain places and the evil humor had an opportunity to manifest itself. The moral quality is put to the test only in excavating the carbuncle and cleansing the wound, and, if San Francisco knows anything about it, it is hard to make the patient stand still and not fight back while the surgery is being performed. The patient is half the time in the truntrams and never without sympathetic on-lookers to urge the surgeon to desist and let the leprous rascal go. Palliatives may be applied, but no cure is to be looked for without cutting out the canker. San Francisco is doing its part of the work as well as it can and no doubt Pittsburg will do hers, but the malady is national and needs national treatment. The germ was communicated to the body politic from the money that passed through municipal fingers, from paper in Pittsburg, from gold in San Francisco. No kind of money but carries its germ. Those who get the most of it run the greatest danger of infection, and who pays too much for it is not wise.

The Case of Dalzell Brown.

There is wide-spread disappointment that one so worthy of eighteen years of imprisonment at hard labor should get off with eighteen months, less credit for good behavior, but the peculiar poignancy of the grief manifested in certain quarters suggests the hired wallings at a Chinese funeral. There are those wringing their hands with anguish who have seen whole families escape condign punishment without a quail. The spectacle suggests an ulterior motive, and no great depth of scrutiny is required to reveal it. The hope is that by calling upon the holy of holies to denounce partial immunity to Brown they may focus public reproach upon the District Attorney, just now much occupied with prosecuting the friends and principals of the wallers. Whether or not it was needful to give partial immunity to Brown, in order to obtain evidence for convicting his fellow conspirators, is not well known to the public. Granting, or refusing to grant, such leniency was a matter of soundness of judgment. Mr. Langdon may have erred. No especial divinity hedges him about to prevent his making errors common to his kind, but that his heart is right and his purposes patriotic only those accused of graft, their retainers, apologists and friends, harbor a doubt. But suffer not the bewailers to mourn without hope. Upon their arrival at Hades they will find Dalzell Brown there to greet them or will have not long to wait for his coming. It is written that no malefactor ever finally escapes the consequences of his acts.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By ALL-OF-US.

A new spirit appears to have come over the dreams of our California Democracy. One or two more baptisms and it will be well saying. This is not saying that the California Democracy would be able to retain its present high standard of idealism if it were in the majority, but that there has been a growth in grace no one can deny. If any doubt that statement let him read the letter reprinted below from Senator J. B. Sanford to his fellow Democratic legislators. The Senator is as right as right can be.

Ukiah, Cal., December 26, 1908.

Fellow Democrats—You are hereby notified that there will be a caucus of the Democratic members of the Legislature in the State Capitol Building, Sacramento, at 10:30 o'clock a. m., Monday, January 4, 1909.

Upon my arrival in Sacramento I will procure from Secretary Curry a suitable room to be used as permanent headquarters for the minority during the session. As soon as secured, location of said room will be posted on the bulletin board so that all may find the same. You are urged to attend this meeting as matters of great importance will come up for consideration.

The Democracy has great cause for congratulation. We now have nine Senators and twenty Assemblymen as compared to six Senators and six Assemblymen two years ago. By concerted action, we can become a potent factor in securing good legislation. What the people of this country want is good government, caring very little through what avenue, or party, it is secured. Let us as Democrats, do all we can to secure for the people good, clean government. Let us make no particular effort to "do politics." Let us vote for all good bills and against all bad ones. That's the best politics we can do.

Hoping that our struggling minority may become a strong, militant Democracy for the cause of justice and right, I am,

Yours for good government,

J. B. SANFORD.

Chairman Democratic Caucus.

Suppose that the free Republicans in the forthcoming legislature were to accept Senator Sanford at his word and as voicing up-to-date Democratic sentiment, might there not be a rattling of the dry bones in the Southern Pacific "Organization"? It is ill to speak of that organization as being Republican. No man has a right to call himself a Republican who owes a first allegiance to the political bureau of the Southern Pacific Company, and there are many men who have the audacity to call themselves Republicans who do owe and acknowledge such an allegiance. But what Senator Sanford says is true, truer now than ever before: "What the people of this country want is good government, caring very little through what avenue or party it is secured." If the Republican and Democratic free men in the legislature will get together and stand for good government we shall have good government and Herrinism cannot prevail against it.

An attempt is going to be made at the coming session of the legislature to secure the repeal of Section 1313 of the Civil Code of California, and all persons whose minds are reasonably freed of fears of popery and of mediaeval prejudices will say godspeed to the effort. Section 1313 is the one which prohibits persons having legal heirs from bequeathing to charity or pious uses of any kind more than one-third of their estates. It also makes it necessary that a will bequeathing anything at all to such uses, to be valid, must have been executed at least thirty days before the death of the testator. This has been a part of the laws of California since 1874, and the object of the provision is best given in the words of the supreme court, which said: "Section 1313 of the Civil Code . . . was passed to prevent improprietous alienations or dispositions, by languishing or dying persons, to the disherison of their lawful heirs. (See preamble to Statute of George II.)"

Another way of stating it would be to say that in the time of George II dying persons often sought to save their souls at the expense of their relatives by making hasty wills leaving their property to the church; but in these modern times, when the fear of his satanic majesty has so greatly diminished, there is not the same good reason as formerly for a statute of this sort, and no excuse can be offered for keeping it in the laws of California.

About the only object which such a statute now accomplishes is to impede the generous impulses of a certain number of persons who have property which they would like to bestow upon society when they die. Such a disposition should be encouraged and not defeated by an arbitrary prohibition. Little fear need be felt that abolishment of the one-third provision will result in wronging wives, children and brothers or sisters, first, because men and women generous enough to wish to make public bequests will in nearly all cases first provide for their families; and, secondly, because juries stand ready to break the wills of those people who have dealt unkindly with their kith and kin.

The repeal of the section has been undertaken by people who are interested in deserving public charities which are losing bequests by reason of it, and they ought to be supported in their efforts. The number of cases in which serious injustice would result from liberty to bequeath for purposes of charity or benevolence more than one-third of an estate is so limited that the chance of such injustice does not offset the ill effects of the prohibition.

There are those who have wanted to know how it happened that the clerk in the office of Secretary of State knew just what precincts to go to and what machines to look at in order to discover just enough errors on the right side to carry the constitutional amendment raising the salaries of State officers, which amendment slipped through by just two votes. Nothing easier.

The election returns are made to the Secretary of State by the clerks of the several counties and nearly always with a greater or less number of clerical errors chargeable up against them. In scanning and tabulating these returns care is taken to detect palpable errors and write to, or go and see, the county clerks in order that such errors may be corrected. There is no going behind the returns of the precinct officers, but only behind the returns of the precinct returns to the Secretary of State.

One means of detecting possible errors is to watch carefully the prevailing ratio of candidate to candidate or amendment to amendment in the different precincts. If in any one precinct there is a marked square from the prevailing ratio all around that precinct, error is suspected, and, upon examination of the original returns from that precinct, error is often found, chargeable to transcribing in the office of the county clerk.

With these facts in mind the clerk in charge of the election returns in the office of Secretary of State, carefully watched the returns on the amendment providing for an increase in the salaries of State officials. Therefore, when he found the amendment running square with the normal ratio in two precincts in Sacramento he went to the office of the county clerk and then to the machines that had been used and, sure enough, the record and not the machines were wrong. The record of the machines had not been taken down correctly. It was there plain as day and to correct the returns was the work of a few moments.

State officers have been shabbily paid. The amendment should have carried by many thousand majority and doubtless would have so carried but for the provision relating to Lieutenant Governor. That was an abomination. The innate justice of the increase in salaries has gone far toward causing the general public to wink the other eye because of the method taken in the office of the Secretary of State to count in that amendment. For it is nowhere whispered that the clerk in charge as diligently sought to find and correct errors that may have occurred in reporting such returns as would have counted against, instead of for, the amendment. The state house interest was not on that side. It is not clear what, if anything, can be done about it. If some citizen, or the Attorney General, were to enjoin the State Controller from drawing warrants in payment of the increased salaries it is likely that nothing could come of it without a recount of the entire vote of the State. That might cost $100,000 and prove the amendment carried after all. The vote was certainly close and the only fault to be found with the counting is in that not the same efforts were made to discover errors that could be counted against the amendment as for it.

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE.

The Children Are Home.

Riot of riddles, and chorals of shrieks.
Noise from the garret to basement below.
Rattle of drums, and bellows, and squeaks.
Nothing at all in the place it should go;
Papa quite maddened by racket and din;
Mama half lost in a noise-riven maze;
Bellow of trumpets and rattle of tin—
The children are home for the holidays.

Look where you step, for no one may tell What shall be found on the floor at your feet.
Hey, for that piercing and desolate yell!
Baby is striving a needle to eat.
Tom on the balusters, sliding down stairs;
Susie essays it, a clamor to raise;
Mornings of trials and evenings of cares—
The children are home for the holidays.

Ho, little urchins of gray eyes or blue,
You are old, you are old again;
All pandemonium shrieketh with you,
And Clamor, exultant, comes out of his den;
Yet when next week has climbed over the hill,
And quietude governs the house and its ways,
Perchance we will sigh that it seemeth so still.
When you are not home for the holidays.

Letters to Santa Claus.

You read with a smile that Uncle Sam's mails, during the Christmas season, are flooded with letters in quaint, straggling, immature chirography directed to Santa Claus, but do you not, on introspection, find that the smile is backed by tears which strive hard to dim the laughter in the eyes? It is so with me, at any rate. I think of the little, often grimy hands which directed the envelopes and crudely penned the ill-spelled petitions they contain, and to me there is something beautiful in the childish faith which would acquaint the good old saint with its baby desires. And then I remember how large a proportion of these blurred epistles will go hopelessly astray, never to reach their destination, and it seems pitiful that such faith should end in such wrack. To be sure, I know that earthly faith often goes such a way, but I should like to see the little ones spared the disillusionizing process. The Christmas time is not all happiness, much as we would like to see it so, and among those threads of pathos which are woven into its woof I think that these wee, queer letters to Santa Claus, which puzzle Uncle Sam, surely must be counted. Quaint little letters are they. Smile at them, as you must, but if there is a kindly heart in your bosom, tears will not be far away as you do so.

Little Pertinent Fables.

A broad smile shone upon that side of the countenance of Majestic Law which was turned toward Impartial Justice.
"I've got him," he said.
"Got whom?" inquired Justice.
"Got Claudians," was the reply.
"That is good, and I suppose that you, too, have the person in whose behalf his dastardly deed was committed?"
Slowly Majestic Law turned the other side of his countenance toward Impartial Justice.
It was streaked by tears, and a frown rested upon it.
"I have not," he said.
Moral: The Majestic Law may be pleased when it puts the fetters on the catpaw that gathers in the chestnuts, but it cannot successfully grin on both sides of its face while the monkey that manipulated the paw is at large.
"I came near making a terrible mistake," said the First Assistant at the Gate to Saint Peter.
"How was that?" the good saint inquired.
"Why, one of these genuine, quarter-sawed, hand-polished exponents of Real Culchah had arrived here from Earth, and—"
"You forgot that humility is divine, and tried to make yourself appear worthy of the honor he did you in appearing before you?"

"Well, hardly! He looked through the gate, and I heard him remark to a companion that already he could see several respects in which Heaven could be improved by making it look less commonplace, not to say vulgar. Right then is when I came near making my mistake."

"Tell me about it."

"Why, I was about to send him down stairs to look after the furnace, when I discovered a place where a humanly-kind, plebeian action he once had performed had scratched off his polish slightly, permitting a soul to shine through."

"So you admitted him?"

"Yes, but he made it by a scratch."

Moral: It may seem shocking to some, but it may be that there are some things little considered in the school of super-culture which will count most of all in that final "round-up" unto which we all journey.

Death and Dividends.

Under the street cars of San Francisco some sixty or seventy people are killed and about 300 are more or less seriously injured, annually. The United Railways, however, apparently are in doubt concerning whether they need adequate fenders, and, if they do, the question anent the variety they shall adopt gives them pause during which the destruction of human life continues.

A fig for a life, and a straw for its woe!
(Ho, but the wheels of our commerce are fleet!)

We are as foam, and as foam we must go.
(Traffic has music that sounds on the street.)

Why should we pause for a desolate cry
Sounding from one whom our Juggernaut slays?

Gold be our trophy piled glittering high.
(Here's to the Game and the player who plays!)

And what does it matter, a life more or less,
The red, gaping wound and the cry of distress,
The widow who mourns in her heart's loneliness,
If surely our dividends swell?

One life in six days, so the red record runs, (But fenders cost money, you really should know.)
And mothers are weeping by graves of their sons.

(At altars of traffic bow lowly and low.)
Out motto still be, "All the traffic will bear,"
In lives that go out 'neath the grind of the wheel,
For why need we trouble, and why need we care?
(Ho, red god of commerce, your glory we feel.)

And what is a body, though crushed into clod,
The flow of the crimson that moistens the Close eyes to all anguish and cheerily nod,
If surely the dividends swell

The Opinions of Rufus.

Some literature reminds me of some men
I've met—mighty well dressed outside, but no soul worth mention on the inside, and the queer thing 'bout it is that both on them has their admirers.

Course I b'lieve in culchah, but sometimes
I can't help rememberin' that the Good Samaritan didn't come from the culchured ranks of 'society, an' the Pharisee did.

I read the other day that Thor was the hammer-wielder. Then what did you mean by telling me he was dead?

Their's one consolation 'bout Ruef's case:
He stole a good deal of money from the people, but if the lawyers don't fall down—and

I reckon they won't—the people 'll git lots of it back through them.

The poet fellor said, "Tis better to have loved an' lost than never to have loved at all," but I've knowed cases where he might jest es well have left off the last half of the sentence.

Seems to me that there's lots of creeds in this world fer the same reason they's lots of coats. Y'see, it takes diff'rent sizes to fit our diff'rent shoulders.

I never knew but one man to live up to his epitaph, an' his got spilled by the sculptor.

Don't you realize that man's inventin' the aeroplane so es to be able to git high enough to ketch turkeys at 32 cents a pound?

With the "Lower Classes."

A woman physician of Philadelphia says that the time will come when "kissing will be confined to the lower classes."

Make me of the "lower classes,"

And let me remain in them still

My heart, grown cold and envious,

A kiss no more may thrill.

Make me of the "lower classes."

I fain would hold it so,

That memory of sweet kisses

Is best that my life may know.

The kiss that my mother gave me,

Ah, it was an unspeak prayer

For the boy whom her mother-longing

Held in its tender care.

Tenderly, softly caressing,

I knew not its value then.

But now I am missing its blessing,

The ultimate blessing of men.

The kiss of a little sweetheart

Who sleeps in a far-off place;

Sweet as the violet's fragrance,

Shy as the violet's face;

Soul white as the snows that drape her,

Ah, but my boy-heart knew

Her kisses were pure as the lilies

In robes that are gemmed with dew.

The little, soft pressure of kisses

From hairies I love so well;

The kisses of wifely devotion—

If these of our lowliness tell,

Make me of the "lower classes."

A part of their stress and strife,

For these are the heart's sweet trophies,

The best that it reaps in life.

Leap Year and Marriage.

In his "Department of Vital Statistics," for November, George D. Leslie, State statistician, allows one ray of the light of humor to penetrate the statistical gloom of his production.
Here it is:

"It may be remarked that because of the shyness of women concerning leap year proposals, the marriage total for 1908 bids fair to fall short of that for 1907 by 1,000 or so.
Thus, the marriages in California for January-November, 1908, number only 19,761 against 20,745 for January-November, 1907."

Thus, supposing that race suicide is a bad thing for mankind—which it might be in some instances—we have statistical authority for the assertion that leap year should be abrogated.
As I see it, it works the wrong way.

Gentle woman, being prevented by her coyness, will not propose to man during that year. Probably she is just as willing as ever, but she cannot bring herself to do so. "Now there is John," she says to herself. "He is perfectly charming, but suppose I should throw my net, and not catch him, how would I feel? No, I must not take the chance." So she sits back, and waits for the ordinary year.

The thought that it is leap year, on the contrary, often deters man from doing as his inclination prompts. "She is a nice girl," he says to himself, "and we could fix up that cottage I have in mind very easily, but it is her chance this year, and I fancy if she wanted me she would let me know." So he, too, awaits; each is deterred by the thought of the leap year privilege.

Wherefore, a has the leap year and its retroactive privilege!

Let's Decorate the Tower.

The California Promotion Committee is out with a suggestion that the upper part of the ferry tower be painted with crimson and gold. Good, so far as it goes, but it is respectfully suggested that the indicated color scheme would be deficient in variety. There would be, on the ferry building, but the dull gray of granite, the cold white of marble, the rich yellow of gold, and the vivifying crimson of the Promotion Committee. Why stop with this extremely limited list of colors while a large number might be made useful and Promotion Committee ornamental? There is, for instance, purple, which is a royal color; or blue, with which the Creator chose to drape the skies; or green, in which the grass and the Willie-boy are arrayed; or any one or several of those exquisite "very latest shades" with which almost any lady could make the members of the committee acquainted. The committee's idea is excellent to an extent, but it lacks in color versatility. We should not permit our tints to go to waste. With generous and unselfish use of them, we may make our ferry building a creation to give the Eastern visitor who sees it for the first time an impression that he has "got 'em again."

The Body, A. D. 3,000,005.

Thomas A. Edison has a theory that the human body will evolve into a shape of entirely different proportions from that now inhabited by the spirit of man. The head will develop out of all proportion to the body, in order to accommodate the bulging brain, and the arms and legs will atrophy from disuse and shrivel to mere spindles—the legs so small that they will not support the weight of the body, which will wheel about on some sort of individual motor car, and the arms retaining only enough strength to adjust an electric wire to the plate now occupied by the stomach (which will entirely disappear) and to turn on an electric switch so that the body can store up enough concentrated energy to keep it vitalized as it is now kept nourished by food. It is comforting to add, however, that it places the date of realization of this not wholly whimsical theory of the reorganization of the body some remote millions of years hence.

Girl Defeats An Army.

It is related in the Metropolitan Magazine that the army, headed by Sheridan and his staff, left Winchester by the valley pike early in the morning, just as day was approaching the Stephens City. Just as day was approaching the staff reached the tollgate and was discomfited by a young and beautiful girl, Charlotte Hillman, famed locally for her girlish charms. Even the war-hardened Sheridan seems not to have been proof against the persuasion of a pair of black eyes and a pretty face, and when toll was demanded straightway produced the tithe, setting an example that was followed by his staff.

"But," said Sheridan as he passed through the gate, "I can not vouch for my army."

When the common soldiery came the girl again lowered the toll bar and demanded toll. This was met by jeers from the guard. All day the dusty troopers passed through, and all day Charlotte Hillman stood at her post. For every ten soldiers who passed through the gate she cut a notch in the toll pole. Early filed beyond the Blue Ridge with the remains of his disorganized army, in the Valley of Virginia Lee Grant, the rebel's grand old and overwhelming numbers, gave up the fight; in the southeast Joe Johnston fired the last burlesque shots and peace came again over the North and South. Then, when relations with Washington had been established and the administration's policy was one of magnanimity, Charlotte Hillman counted the notches in the toll pole and sent her bill to Washington. And the bill was paid.

A BOY AND A BIRD.

By C. L. Carpenter.

I knew a boy once, one a rosy-cheeked, light-hearted lad, with a laugh that sounded like the musical scale, a smile like a girl's and deep thoughtful eyes. His one ambition was to catch a bird, a wild bird, and keep it for all his own. A bird that could be bought and had no attraction for him. He wanted to capture it himself. After much patience he succeeded in luring a robin into his cage, closed the door and made it a prisoner. Then he fed it with crumbs and chopped meat and lavished care upon it. For a little while all went well, but soon the bird began to droop and languish. An older and wiser head convinced the boy that the bird, being a wild one, could not stand confinement, but the boy could not for a time understand why this was so. He loved and cared for the bird and did not understand why the bird did not love him. But after quite a mental struggle, he opened the cage door and bade the bird go. For just a little while the bird hesitated and the heart of the boy leaped to think that perhaps after all it might conclude to stay. But no, true to its wild instincts, the bird spread its wings and flew away, not, however, until the boy had fixed a tiny ring of brass on one of its legs so that he might know it again if he ever saw it. For a whole year the boy watched every robin he saw, hoping it might be his bird. When it rained and stormed he used to wonder if his bird was safe and warm.

One day a robin with a broken wing fluttered by and the boy ran to catch it. What was his joy to find his longed-for bird with his ring on its leg. Oh how tenderly he nursed it and when the wing healed and the bird could fly after a fashion, he set it free again. But this time the bird refused to fly away but made its home in the cage it had formerly looked upon as a prison and the boy was very happy.

I knew a man—a man with deep sad eyes, with firm set mouth, which softens only when he gives a sad smile—this same boy grown into grey-haired manhood. He, too, had a longing to capture a bird—a wild-hearted, soulful woman bird. No bird used to him, or which might be purchased would do. He wanted a woman for all his own, to lure her into the cage of his heart and close the door. At last, after long search, he was successful—or thought he was. Oh he was so happy. He fed her on all the love of his heart, and she, too, seemed happy, but like the bird she began to long for freedom and after a long struggle with himself, the man opened the door of his heart and bade her go if she wished. When she hesitated, the man's heart leaped as the boy's had done, thinking he was mistaken. But she finally flew away, only little short flights at first, and the man thought she might be happy. But the wild nature was too strong and one day she flew far away and the man was left to console himself with a band of gold on her hand as a pledge between them, and so he goes about now looking and searching, thinking perchance he may find her again, always with that deep sad longing in his eyes.

This is just a simple little story, but it is true, for I was the boy and I am the man and I wonder if I shall find my bird with a broken wing.

Carleton's Bill.

Will Carleton tells the following incident which occurred in a hotel some years ago: Mr. Carleton asked for his bill. "Here is the check for you, Mr. Carleton," said the proprietor. "But," protested Mr. Carleton, "I don't know you." "Mr. Carleton," said the landlord, "some years ago my wife and I had serious differences, and we finally decided to separate. We had been married a good many years. I sent for a lawyer and he drew up an agreement about our property and how it would be divided. Just about that time I read your poems, 'Fetters' and 'I Am Out,' and 'How Betsey and I Made Up.' I was struck hard by the poems, and I took them to my wife and read them to her. She cried, and—well, we've been together ever since, and there'll never be a bill for you in this house, Mr. Carleton."

WHAT WE HAVE NOT

By JULIAN KORSKI.

The native Californians are too self-satisfied and proud of their blessed country to admit that they haven't anything you can find in any other part of the world. The word "impossible" is unknown to them; they can raise everything under the sun from the ostriches, seals, and whales, to Ruets, Schmitzes, Gallaghers, labor and capital trusts, strikes, boycotts, and the most corrupt and shameless bunch of rascals that ever camped in any city hall. But there is one thing you can't find either in San Francisco or Los Angeles, or anywhere else in this country, and that's a humorous paper. There is none.

This fact, that on the whole Pacific Coast there is not one humorous paper, is certainly one of the most striking features characterizing vividly the intellectual standard of that country. The natives do not even seem to feel the lack of it. They are entirely satisfied with the mirth-provoking products of the East. Life, Judd, Puck, Sis Hopkins, are in all show windows, and if you ask anybody about an original California humorous paper, the answer will get to his necks and perhaps to those of his readers also, and changed accordingly. It is probably a paying financial enterprise as most of the American society papers are. A cajoled snob and a tickled parvenu are always the best subscribers.

But how is it possible that a country like California, with such a genuine sense of fun, and with social conditions so adapted to originate all that is necessary to produce the laugh-provoking elements, how is it possible that the Pacific Slope, from San Diego to Seattle, has not produced a permanent humorous paper? It is sufficient to look over the funny pages of its daily papers, weeklies and monthlies to find out how rich in humor the Pacific Coast is. And not only the funny pages serve as proof for this assertion. Almost every report of every-day topics, almost every headline contains an obvious exaggeration, an unconscious deformity, a curious and comic phrase testifying to the unlimited sense of the ludicrous with which the slaving penny-a-liner, the sorry knight of the typewriter, the yellow interviewer, the yellow press-agent and the all-colored reading public are endowed. The newsmen lionize their readers just as much as they are lionized by them, mutually proving by the same fact that they are all funmakers worthy of each other. Why, then, instead of wasting their own precious material upon the columns where it is unnoticed and lost, why not attempt to establish a great humorous weekly, worthy of such a grand country as California?

Considered from the viewpoint of the psychology of humor, the social conditions of California, especially, and of the western part of the Union in general, offer at present a better field for a humorous paper than at the time when Bret Harte and John Phoenix wrote their immortal sketches and satires. They belong to the local-political class of humorists, depictees of local oddities and purveyors of fun, representing the most racial and most characteristic phases of our national humor. They introduced the humor of the Pacific Coast to the American public and to their countrymen, and they did it with extravagance in expression and thought. On the whole, it is a broad humor that frequently does not disdain the aid of bad spelling and common puns. It deals in incongruities of expression; it accentuates oddities; it sets the common place in ridiculous relief; it burlesques pretensions; it laughs at domestic, social and political mishaps, when they are not too serious.

Fifty years ago Bret Harte had to deal with countries and communities of an almost unexampled laxity, the laxity of civilized men grown savage. He dealt with the life of an entirely new people who having no certain past, could have no certain future.

It was a parish full of doubtful gentlemen. California at the time of the first rush after gold was actually a republic of incognitos. No one knew who anyone else was, and no one desired to know. In such a country gentlemen took more trouble to conceal their gentility than thieves take to conceal their roguery. In such a country everyone is an equal, because everyone is a stranger.

In such a country it is not strange if men in moral matters feel something of the irresponsibility of a dream.

One of the most characteristic illustrations of those conditions is Bret Harte's scarcely known account of the first jury trial in California:

Up to August, 1850, all criminals had been tried by lynch-law, and, if pronounced guilty by the boys, were hung to the tree. But times began to mellow down a little, and certain solid citizens began to fight for good old Eastern law. They wanted the jury-trial, as provided for by the Constitution. So at Big Gulch, in 1849, when a man had been accused of stealing horses, they decided for the first time in California to give the culprit a fair jury trial, the first jury trial in California.

Twelve good men and true were chosen on the jury, and witnesses were brought before them. Some swore to the good character of the accused, and some swore he was a horse thief from back to back. When the last witness got through the jury retired to give a verdict. They hadn't been in the juryroom over ten minutes when a crowd of outsiders came pounding at the door.

"What do you fellows want?" asked the foreman.

"Want to know if you jurymen haven't got most through."

"Not quite," said the foreman.

"Well, hurry up; we want this room to lay out the corpse in!"

The masterpieces of American humor, as typified in California, were not conceived in an atmosphere of the Evangel of Galilee, in the feeling of kindness drawn forth by pain, in pity and compassion, but there was always a tinge of surcharge and overplus of power, a buoyancy, a sense of conquest.

American humor does not know any difference of race or caste. For it, we are all human beings, all children of the common soul. It is free from the miserable tribal vanity, it scorns no social difference. It humbles the outcasts and vagabonds, and gamblers and waifs of either sex. For this reason, along with many others, the best American humor stands pre-eminent throughout the world and through all time.

The conditions have improved in California, the contrast between the life of the settled East and chaotic West with its reckless specimens of humanity, is at the present time not so gross and striking as it was when "Tennessee's Partner" and "The Outcast of Poker Flat," "Miss" and "Miggles" were written, when Bret Harte broke new ground and became the first literary interpreter of the new western life with all its breadth and freedom.

But really the chasm between West and East is still filled up yet, hardly bridged over, and all who know the Atlantic and Pacific Coasts will agree with me. The prevailing social and political conditions on the Pacific, especially in San Francisco, since the last catastrophe, are certainly not less abundant in deep humorous elements than they were in Bret Harte's time. I am indeed very much inclined to believe that they never before furnished so much material for a humorist as they do at the present time.

This country, in general, with its ever-changing conditions of a growing community, with its struggle of democracy, with its odd blending of hitherto antagonistic types, furnishes the humorist, whose study is humanity, with an inexhaustible supply of new grist for his mill. And if our funny papers were codified, it would be found that they owe a very large debt:

First: To the American savage, Indian, Jap, and negro, playing at civilization.

Second: To the Irish peasant governing our large cities with the help of the policeman, Irish labor-leader and Irish priest.

Third: To the comparatively few other human products of American development, as for instance the vulgar millionaire, the commercial traveler, the immigrant of whatever nationality, the laborite, the suburbanite, the professional politician and the husky farmer.

All these types in almost innumerable quantity are to be found in California, particularly in San Francisco. But here they are much better specimens, more picturesque and stronger developed than in the East.

The labor-union mayor, the political boss, the supervisors, are, or were, much more heedless, rapacious and indifferent here than there. The policeman is better fed and less visible on the streets of San Francisco than in New York. The labor-leader and walking-delegate smoke better cigars and wear more diamonds in California than on the Atlantic. And the Irish Roman-Catholic priest is more Roman-Catholic in San Francisco than the Roman-Catholic in Rome. It is the typical "Western exaggeration" we see everywhere, in San Francisco especially. Everything grows and develops in California quicker. The individual and social deformities here are more burlesque and the fun reaches almost the cosmic height of pathos.

California is waiting for its Aristophanes, for its Cervantes, for its Rabelais, for a man of deep laughter, who helps set straight the world; for a great joker and ironist endowed with the sublime sense of incongruity that has permanent value, full of intellectual keenness and sympathy, demanding of us not the random laughter of fools, but the collected laughter of the sane.

No country ever offered a richer opportunity for a great humorist, and his paper than the Pacific Coast offers now.

Where is the man? Where shall we find him?

Health and the Legislature.

A woman from Sacramento was arguing with a man from Berkeley about the capital removal amendment.

"You Berkeley folks can't name one good reason for removing the capital from Sacramento," she declared.

"O, come now," the man from Berkeley replied. "For one thing, the climate of Sacramento isn't at all healthy."

"You know very well that the legislature doesn't go to Sacramento for its health," retorted the lady.

THE WORK OF

Allen's Press Clipping Bureau

FOR PUBLIC MEN

Allen's Press Clipping Bureau has now had experience in six National and five State Campaigns. In this time it has had the honor of serving hundreds of public men, including members of the Cabinet, U. S. Senators, Congressmen, Governors, State Senators and Assemblymen, Mayors, and State and County Central Committees.

It has secured these men by bringing them quickly, easily, and cheaply, what the entire press has to say of them or the measures in which they are interested.

A thorough clipping service discloses the state and trend of public opinion, brings to attention false charges that should be denied, true charges that should be pursued; shows what editors need argument, and what editors need encouragement—in short, aids in handling the most powerful and important of political engines, the Press.

Having three offices, a staff of thirty people, and reading 2,000 coast papers per week, we have now unsurpassed facilities for very high-grade and thorough work.

We can cover counties, districts, the State, or the Pacific States.

Rates will be furnished on application.

PROVIDING FOR DIRECT LEGISLATION.

The following is a first draft of a constitutional amendment, prepared by the Direct Legislation League of California, proposing to amend Article IV, Section 1, to read as follows:

ARTICLE IV.

Section 1. a. The legislative power of this State shall be vested in a Senate and Assembly, which shall be designated the Legislature of the State of California, but the people reserve to themselves the power to propose by petition statutes and amendments to the Constitution and to adopt or to reject the same at the polls, independent of the Legislature. The Legislature may enact laws and propose amendments as elsewhere provided in this Constitution.

b. Upon the presentation to the Secretary of State of a petition signed by qualified electors of the State as many in number as eight per cent of all the votes cast for Governor at the then last election for Governor, proposing laws, statutes, or amendments to the Constitution, set forth in full in said petition, the Secretary of State must submit the said proposed statutes or amendments to the electors at the next succeeding general election occurring subsequent to ninety days after the presentation of said petition. In all matter pertaining to the submission and the adoption or the rejection of the same, the Secretary of State and all other officers shall be guided by the general laws, particularly those applicable to constitutional amendments, until legislation shall be especially provided therefor. If the number of electors voting in favor of any proposed measure, exceed the number voting against it, the proposed measure thereby becomes adopted and in full force and effect.

c. Any such petition may be presented in sections. Each section must contain a full and correct copy of the title and text of the proposed measure. Each signer shall add to his signature the place of residence, giving the street and number if such exist, or such a description of the place of his residence as will enable its location to be ascertained. The number of signatures attached to each section shall be at the pleasure of the person soliciting signatures to the same. Any qualified voter or tax-payer of the State shall be competent to solicit said signatures. Each section shall have attached thereto the affidavit of the person soliciting signatures to the same, stating that all the signatures to the attached section were made in his presence, and that to the best of his knowledge and belief, each signature to the section is the genuine signature of the person whose name purports to be thereunto subscribed, and no other affidavit thereto shall be required. Each signature, the genuineness of which is not called in question by the sworn affidavit of the purported signer thereof, shall be presumed to be genuine. Unless and until it be proven otherwise by official investigation, it shall be presumed that each petition presented contains the signatures of the requisite number of qualified electors.

d. Several petitions may be presented proposing measures to be voted upon at the same election. If measures be simultaneously proposed which contain conflicting provisions, the provision contained in the measure receiving the highest affirmative vote shall prevail.

e. A substantial compliance with the provisions of this section shall be sufficient for the proposal and adoption of any measure. This section is self-executing, but legislation may be enacted especially to facilitate its operation, but in no way limiting or restricting either the provisions of this section or the power herein reserved.

f. If petitions for the initiation of statutory law be filed with the Secretary of State not less than thirty days before any regular or special session of the Legislature, the Secretary of State shall transmit the same to the Legislature as soon as it convenes. Such initiative measures shall take precedence over all other measures in the Legislature excepting appropriation bills. The Legislature may enact any initiative measure, without change or amendment, but in all cases proposed amendments to the Constitution must be submitted to the electors for approval or rejection. If any such initiative measure shall be rejected by the Legislature, or no action be taken upon it by the Legislature within forty days from the date of its transmission, the Secretary of State shall submit it to the electors for approval or rejection at the next ensuing general election. The Legislature may reject any measure proposed by initiative petition, and propose a different one to accomplish the same purpose, but in such event both measures shall be submitted to the people for their rejection or approval by the Secretary of State at the next ensuing general election. The veto power of the Governor shall not extend to measures adopted by direct vote of the people. Any measure adopted by direct vote of the people can be repealed or amended only in like manner.

g. If for any reason, any measure proposed by petition as herein provided, be not submitted at the next succeeding general election occurring ninety days after the presentation of said petition such failure shall not prevent its submission at a succeeding general election, and no constitutional amendment or amendments or other measures proposed by the Legislature shall be submitted, except that at the same election there shall be submitted those measures proposed by petition of the electors, if any be so proposed as herein provided.

h. The enacting clause of every law shall be as follows: "Be it enacted by the People of the State of California."

Bret Harte's California.

The New York Sun, in a recent issue, comments in lively fashion upon certain criticisms of Bret Harte, as follows: "In an address upon 'Provincialism' delivered before the Massachusetts civic conference recently Professor Josiah Royce of Harvard University sought to dispel the illusion that Bret Harte has wrought into his high colored stories of frontier life in California."

Professor Royce was born in a mining town of the Sierra Nevada, lived there for some time in his youth and has a retentive memory. Harte, he says, did not know his mining camps, or knowing belied them. The social humor he depicts had no existence and was shrewdly invented for his purpose. "In fact, to quote Professor Royce, it 'never was on sea or land.' California had not had time to become provincial. There could be no types, for types have to grow before they can be known and described. The Harte stories of frontier life err in this:

"They depict the early California mining camp as if it were more or less an established institution, and portray the miners as if they already possessed a sort of provincial consciousness. For Bret Harte the early miner is already a definable social type—with a dialect and set characteristic customs and manners—with a local consciousness almost such as a peasantry or a Highland clan might possess."

We do not know, and doubt, that Bret Harte ever boasted that he held the mirror up to nature in his California stories (or any others of his pen) and derived his color from a society that actually existed. And we presume that it will make no difference to his readers. Their want is a story, and he supplies it. His art consists in taking them out of themselves and by turns amusing and terrifying them, mingling the humorous with the tragic and sounding the depths of their sympathies. The Sierras were his setting and he was his own prompter and stage carpenter. His method was thousands of years old, and will be practised as long as humanity wants a story. Such is art. It cannot be defined, nor can it be ordered by rule of thumb.

Declined With Thanks.

"In many respects it (the article) has a good deal of merit, but on the whole I do not think it suited to the Review. . . . Perhaps my judgment would not agree with that of others whose opinion I have respected. . . . After all, you know, we editors have no other criterion than our own judgment."—James Sparks, editor of the North American Review, rejecting a manuscript by Henry Wadsworth Longfellow.

Germany has launched the fourth of a series of battleships of the Dreadnought type. The new ship is named the Posen.

Thirty.

In all newspaper offices and telegraph offices the word "thirty" means "this is all," "the end" or "the last." A new "devil" in a Fresno paper's composing room, unfamiliar with the meaning of the word, was halted by the city editor as he was leaving that dignitary's desk with the hundredth odd batch of "copy" by the editor's remark, "Tell the foreman this is thirty on local stuff."

"Thirty, thunder," replied the lad. "It's about two hundred and fifty."

Broker's Disease.

The commonest ailment of stock brokers is kidney complaint, caused by having to stand on their feet hours at a stretch every day. There are no chairs and few seats of any sort in an exchange, and the method of transacting business allows few moments to use the seats. So common is kidney trouble among brokers that it might well be called "brokers' disease."

WHAT THE LEAGUE OF JUSTICE STANDS FOR

By GEORGE HENRY BOKE, Professor of Law, University of California.

After the failure of the Ruef trial in May of last year, many citizens were despondent at the outlook for justice in San Francisco. Farther, as many of them believed that the dynamiting of the witness Gallagher was not accidental, but might be traced to some effort to impede the course of justice in the graft trials, they felt there existed an urgent call for the citizens to stand together and in some way make their strength count against that campaign that was evidently being waged to impede the course of justice. Several meetings were held by independent groups of citizens out of this common feeling of indignation, and possible measures of organization were discussed. These groups learned of each other's existence, came together and formed the Committee of Fifty of the Citizens' League. Hundreds of citizens at once became members of the League. Starting with this little center of organized citizenship, the League of Justice established its headquarters and began its plan of campaign for the public honor and honest citizenship.

The League believed that the work of the graft prosecution was greater than any person, and that without regard to persons all who stood behind its work wished to see the course preserved to its own true standards of right. The League appreciated that many honest men had lost sight of the fundamental issue, had become confused upon incidental questions and had received a mass of misinformation which had served to further obscure the true situation in their minds.

The League believed that the function of a united body of citizens would be, first, to form a clearing house where all could have confidence in whatever was ascertained and given out. It was thought that the League should concentrate on the enrollment of citizens, so that men might be counted through their united strength, since individually they could present nothing but helplessness and disorganization.

Sometimes the question has been asked, "Why should there be any necessity for any such organization?" "Why isn't it sufficient to leave the situation simply to the courts?" "What right have the citizens to organize and to work in reference to the matter which is being tried out by the process of law?" Such a question is an indication of lack of discernment by the interrogator as to what is taking place before his eyes. Had this matter been left to the courts by certain forces to whose interest it is to prevent the course of justice in the graft trials, there would have been no occasion for such an organization, but it is a matter of fact and record, that the course of justice in the graft cases has not been left to the quiet process of law. On the other hand there has been a most desperate, insidious and dangerous campaign to prevent justice taking its course in the courts.

In order to realize the truth of this statement, one has only to refer to the kidnapping and dynamiting of the State's witnesses, to the jury bribing, to the crowding of the court room with hired thugs, to the malicious attacks made upon the persons of the officers of the law, to the mass of misinformation which has been set going, to the power that has been exercised to prevent business men from giving the courts their support, to terrorizing employees from expressing their consent to creating such a general feeling of fear in the city that men were made to believe that it was unsafe to take a stand for the cause of justice.

Therefore the League of Justice was not only justified in its organization, but the situation made some organization of the citizenship imperative if the city was not to be delivered over to the organization of evil forces and wrong-doers to shield themselves from the law.

The League believes in the law, it stands for the law, but it believes that without some organization to stand for the law, a situation might arise in which violence would enter into the city.

It is only the blind citizen who would let a situation drift until it is too late to prevent either violence or the degradation of the city before his own eyes and the eyes of the world. The man who would let a situation drift to a call. That this call to the spirit of the citizens was the spirit that prompted the organization of the League, is evidenced by the character of the men who entered its organization.

The League of Justice stands for the constructive side of citizenship, seeking honesty for the principles at stake in the situation in San Francisco, and standing firmly upon those principles at whatever cost to the individual. It believes that we must free our minds from all interest for or against persons as such at this time.

The League believes that the only defense of democracy is organized citizenship. The call of the League is for the citizens of the State to appreciate that the attempt to enforce the law against corruption in public life in San Francisco has brought in danger their citizenship.

Organization is the watchword. It is a part of the League's construction plan to afford this organization so that its mere numbers shall count as a great moral force in the community, as this is a moral, and not a political issue. It is one on which there can be but one response from the honest citizen who is awakened to the danger of the place on which he stands. A part of the work of the League is to open the eyes of the honest man "who does not see." The man who sees no need of the united action of citizens during the past months of remarkable events in San Francisco, surely needs something to open his eyes.

The League has organized branches in several ways, such as the Clergy Branch and the Physicians' Branch. The Woman's Branch is fast becoming a great power in the city. It is enrolling its members by thousands. It stands fundamentally for the moral peace of the home.

The League of Justice stands for the fundamental issues which lie back of society, for the preservation of those sound moral and legal relations necessary to the preservation of society by maintaining public honor, upholding instruments which preserve society from dissolution. It puts its whole issue upon the cause of justice and the battle for that cause.

As this issue can only be fought out by men, the League of Justice believes that men are faithfully fighting for the cause in the city should be supported as the representatives of the people in this battle for the preservation of the moral structure of society.

When the League of Justice investigated the actual situation it became impressed more with the character of the men who were leading this cause and became convinced that it could well stand behind them as men earnestly serving the people. The course of events led it to believe that all that the people needed was to come to know the inside facts of the whole situation, just as the members of the League had come to learn the inside facts. They believed that if these facts were known honest citizens who had occupied the dishonest position of a neutral in the battle would again become well informed as to the true situation and would be led to take the stand which made them count in the conflict of forces in their own society.

It is appreciated that this movement, formally but a matter of holding trials to ascertain the guilt or innocence of certain persons accused of public corruption, has a significance scarcely understood by many earnest persons in the community, much less by those whose narrow vision raises their self interest so high above the public interest as to obscure it from their view. The real significance of the situation in San Francisco lies in the fact that there now exists a conflict of forces in our society developed from the efforts of certain strong individuals to break up the moral structure of society by corrupting its public life for their own personal gain.

The attempt to enforce the law, which is merely the weapon of the society as preserving its public integrity, aroused all the power that lay in these strong individuals and the wealth that was endangered by this unsparring enforcement of law. The short-sighted citizen who would escape every battle which might in any way temporarily interfere with his personal affairs, was of course only too willing to join in the hue and cry raised by the persons endangered by this attempt to prevent the disintegration of society. To these two classes must be joined a third class, that of the honest citizen wanting to do right but who lacked the power to appreciate that every generation of men repeats this battle in some form or other, and that at every occasion of the rise of society against its exploiting enemies, the same old methods are used for undermining and attacking the personnel, the motives, the plans, the results, of the few men who have the courage to give battle to the entrenched power of those who have sought to exploit honest citizens who now stand bewildered and noncombattant while the battle rages before them.

The significance of the situation in San Francisco is not found in the conviction or acquittal of one grafter or any group of grafters. It was not found even in the cleaning out of the Schmitz municipal administration. It does not depend upon the temporary successes or defeats of a particular trial or even a series of trials. The real significance of the situation has its relation to the whole problem of democracy, of representative government, of the attempt of society to establish the law and govern itself. The power placed in the hands of the many instead of the few. The three aspects of the general problem of democracy, the three weak places in popular sovereignty and its expression in the people's government. It is in the factors pointed out in the three groups of citizens in the San Francisco situation. That is, the success or failure of representative democracy depends upon its ability to solve the problem which contains these three factors, namely: An exploiting group made up of a few powerful men who, by their wealth or political ascendancy, have obtained secret control of the organizations and powers through which this representative democracy must work, and exercise this power to further their own interest at the sacrifice of the interest of the low members in society, and at the cost of the slow destruction of society itself.

Second, the group embracing a much larger number of men who, though not definitely a part of this exploiting group, are so short-sighted that they are not able to discern any interest or antagonism to all matters by the immediate interest to their private affairs without relation to the demands of public interest or the cost in the future of the present steps they support. Because of their lack of vision, their self interest, their understanding of the real situation, they become ready allies of the exploiters of society, even participating, in petty ways, in the exploitation, or allowing themselves to be used for the purposes of the exploiters.

The third group, upon which rests the hope of democracy, is composed of the great mass of citizens who do not find self-interest so present to their minds that it obscures the real situation, but who stand ready to do justice to themselves and to the whole people to at least a limited degree. Here the great obstacle to success is the easy bewilderment of the minds of these citizens, their openness to confusion by the clever devices of the first group, the real enemies of society.

The real crisis of the situation is whether democracy is to succeed or not will be found in the ability of this group to be awakened to the actual situation that confronts them and in their readiness to respond to the call upon them to stand and fight, trusting in their cause and their leaders. By reason of their numbers, and the publicity of every fact known by them, they are prevented from knowing the inner strategy of their leaders, however faithful, and unless they have that strong resolution which adheres to the support of a great cause, they can easily be led astray by this or that subtle influence of the members of the first group.

So the real significance of the situation in San Francisco, to repeat, lies in its presenting in the most remarkable and open degree, an exposure of these three groups and the forces that work from the first, the alliance of the first with the second and the bewilderment and futility of the third. The actual challenge to the manhood and womanhood of San Francisco is, therefore, the fundamental challenge of democracy itself. It is the challenge of the powerful, the clever, the knowing, the unscrupulous and immoral, the criminal, the selfish, the exploiting, the short-sighted, to the forces that are attempting to establish a democracy in America, that are attempting to create a land of freedom for all men. It is not a temporary situation, it is not as some have thought a matter of persons, it is not a matter of merely cleaning out a city, but it is a clear problem of a people fighting for their own preservation, realizing that, to preserve their own strength, they cannot hesitate to put aside any sentimentality which would protect this or that individual at the expense of the moral rotting of the very bonds of society.

So, fundamentally, the situation in San Francisco is a challenge to the spirit of manhood and womanhood, a challenge to their discernment, to the degree that they are awakened. It is a test also of moral endurance, of the power of honest men to outlast, defensively and offensively, the campaign and poison of the dishonest and self-serving. The occasion calls to every citizen to bring forth all the reserve of strength and intelligence he possesses, to put aside all temporary issues, temporary motives and to determine the real ground he should stand upon and there to place himself.

The fact that a reign of terror has existed in this city—a fact which is so easily proved by citing the hundreds of cases where men dare not speak even of their allegiance to the cause of justice lest they lose their position, their business, their clientele,—indicates a condition of actual servitude of the citizen which now unfortunately exists and will continue to exist if democracy is not able to solve the problem presented to it. It is immaterial whether a person has a master standing over him with a lash for his back and property rights in his body, or whether he has a master who sits in some distant office determining his every act, his words, his moral position, and exercising, through fear, control of his ability to maintain himself in the industrial world. In either situation there is that condition of servitude so abhorrent to the spirit of a man.

This then is what democracy must win: freedom from this servitude, and freedom from the power of the exploiter to break down the bonds of society through the fear that he casts upon the rank and file of men. If these observations are sound the situation in San Francisco is to the highest degree important in relation to the history of the American nation. The conflict of social forces in this city makes the struggle here the vanguard in the new battle of democracy. It anticipates the future battle throughout the nation. Failure here is disastrous to the cause of democracy. Success here is of tremendous importance as indicating the power of the mass of citizens to discern and expose the true situation of the enemy and stand shoulder to shoulder in the fight against that enemy.

The call then is to the plain honest citizen to awaken to the real situation, to discern the real enemy, to see the masked battery, to understand the flank attacks upon his own generals and captains and, finally, to come down from the hilltop of the shivering bewildered spectators into the fighting ranks where the few men have undertaken to do battle.

The call is made. It is believed that victory is inevitable. It is believed that the people are ready to awaken, are ready to respond, are ready to fight, are ready to place their faith in their cause and to stand or fall as the event may be, in the battle for that cause.

Love's Victory.

At first I begged from Love what'er
He cherished most, and bade him see How good and sweet and wise I was
To let him give his all to me.

But since Love toiled so happily
To fill my heart unto the brim,
I learned wherein lay joy, and now
I beg to give my all to him!

—Charlotte Becker.

South African Millionaires.

Harry Barnato, who has just died in the prime of life, is the latest addition to the list of South African millionaires whose lives have closed prematurely and often tragically. Cecil Rhodes, it will be remembered, did not live to see his forty-ninth birthday, although he had qualified as a millionaire at least twenty years earlier, and Barney Barnato was only forty-six when he came to his tragic end on the high seas, but he had lived long enough to leave nearly £1,000,000 behind him.

Woolf Joel, Barnato's nephew, was much younger when at thirty-four a bullet put an end to his life at Johannesburg ten years or so ago, and yet he was able to leave an estate valued at £1,226,000. Herbert Matthew Davies accumulated £734,000 before he died at the age of forty-three, and Mr. Beit had made and left his millions before he had long completed half a century of years.—Westminster Gazette.

Hic Jacet!

O eloquent, just, and mighty Death! Whom none could advise, thou hast persuaded; what none hath dared, thou hast done; and whom all the world hath flattered, thou only hast cast out of the world and despised. Thou hast drawn together all the farre stretched greatness, all the pride, cruelty, and ambition of men, and covered it all over with these two narrow words, Hic Jacet!—Sir Walter Raleigh.

Two Too Valuable.

The late Henry Miller, who was guide, philosopher and friend to many book lovers within a thousand miles of New York, was a most successful salesman, says Harpur's Weekly. One day he called on Collis P. Huntington and showed him a rare copy of —.

"There are two volumes of this," said Mr. Miller. "The other volume is in perfect order, as you see this one is. You cannot possibly let them escape you, for you know you have nothing like this in your library."

"What is the price?" asked the railroad king. "Seven hundred dollars," said the bookman.

"Those are two valuable volumes for my library," Mr. Huntington exclaimed.

Mr. Miller went back to his place and sent the books to Mr. Huntington's house with a bill for $700. Next day the railroad king sent for him.

"Why did you send me those books?" he demanded, sharply.

"Because you bought them," was the bookman's calm reply.

"I certainly did not!" cried the millionaire.

"Oh, yes, you did," answered Mr. Miller.

"You'll remember perfectly well when I tell you what you said. You told me distinctly,

"Those are two valuable volumes for my library."

THE PLEDGE OF A SENATOR.

By CHARLES SUMNER.

(From his letter following the example of John Quincy Adams in 1803, accepting his post of senator to the United States Senate, May 14, 1851.)

The trust conferred on me is one of the most weighty which a citizen can receive. It concerns the grandest interests of our own commonwealth, and also of the Union in which we are an indissoluble link. Like every post of eminent duty it is a post of eminent honor. A personal ambition, such as I cannot confess, might be satisfied to possess it; but, when I think what it requires, I am obliged to say that its honors are all eclipsed by its duties.

Acknowledging the right of my country to the service of her sons wherever she chooses to place them, and with a heart full of gratitude that a sacred cause is permitted to triumph through me, I now accept the post of senator.

I accept it as the servant of Massachusetts, mindful of the sentiments solemnly uttered by her successive legislatures, of the genius which inspires her history, and of the men, her perpetual pride and ornament, who breathed into her that breath of liberty which early made her an example to her sister states in such service, the way, though new to my footsteps, is illuminated with lights which cannot be missed.

I accept it as a servant of the Union, bound to study and maintain the interests of all parts of the country, to exercise the most patriotic care, to discontinue every effort to loosen any of those ties by which our fellowship of states is held in fraternal company, and to oppose all sectionalism, in whatever form. With me the Union is twice blessed—first, as powerful guardian of the repose and harmony of thirty-one states clasped by the endearing name of country; and next as model and beginning of that all-embracing federation of states, by which unity, peace and concord will finally be organized among the nations. Nor do I believe it possible, whatever the delusion of the hour, that any part can be permanently lost from its well-compacted bulk. E Pluribus Unum is stamped upon the national coin, the national territory, and the national heart. Though composed of diverse parts, one, the Union, is separable only by a crash which shall destroy the whole.

In the conflict of opinion, natural to the atmosphere of liberal institutions, I may err; but I trust never to forget the prudence which becomes the consciousness of right. If I deem time to recognize as my guides the leading men of to-day I shall feel safe while I follow the master principles which the Union was established to secure, leaning for support on the great triumvirate of American freedom—Washington, Franklin and Jefferson. And, since true politics are simply morals applied to public affairs, I shall find constant assistance from those everlasting rules of right and wrong, which are a law alike to individuals and communities.

THE GRIFT CASES.

After more than two years of struggle to evade justice Abraham Ruef last Tuesday stood at the bar of Judge Lawlor's court, and listened to his sentence of fourteen years imprisonment in the San Quentin penitentiary, the extreme limit that the law allows in the event of conviction for bribery.

The verdict of guilty, of which this sentence was the judicial aftermath, was reported by the jury in the case on the tenth of December, 1908, and the nineteen days intervening between verdict and sentence, during which Ruef and his attorneys, to efforts to avert the doom which awaits him. There had been attempts, backed by ever-ready affidavits, to show that the jury which found Ruef guilty was both prejudiced and intimidated, but these were met by counter-affidavits secured by Assistant District Attorney O'Garra for the prosecution. On the final day (last Tuesday) an attempt was made to secure more affidavits for the defense, and four or five hours were allowed for this purpose, but the endeavor terminated in failure, and the sentence at once followed.

So an apparent goal has been reached in the Ruef case, and that justice has triumphed for the time being cannot be doubted by anybody who recollects that Ruef once confessed his guilt with tears and seeming contrition, a contrition which later was lost in brazen denial of all that he had confessed.

It is a desperate game that "Abe" Ruef is playing. Guilty as he is by his own word, and by the verdict of a jury of his peers, strife with the law is to be continued, for, once given up, nothing remains to him except stripes, stone walls and iron bars. So, after the sentence was spoken, there was a motion in arrest of judgment, which was denied by Judge Lawlor, a motion for a new trial, also denied, and notice of an appeal with certificate of probable cause allowed, after which Ruef was hurried back to jail.

How long it will take to thresh out the appeal it is impossible to forecast. It may consume one year, two years, more or less.

The work of securing a jury for the trial of Peter Claudianes, charged with dynamiting the house, in Oakland, occupied by former Supervisor James L. Gallagher and the family of W. H. Schenk, was begun on December 16, 1908, and on December 23rd, barely a week later, Claudianes had been tried, convicted and sentenced to serve a life term in San Quentin penitentiary. Such a record inevitably makes its own comparison with that scored in the Ruef case, nor can the comparison be avoided by anyone who is acquainted with both cases.

The testimony leading to the conviction of Peter Claudianes, with the exception of that presented on the last day of the trial, was given in these columns last week, and the exception would have been comparatively inconsequential had it not been for the testimony by Miss Mazie Garbarino, District Attorney Langdon's stenographer. She took in shorthand a confession made by Claudianes shortly after his arrest in which he gave the full particulars of his guilt, admitting that he had dynamited the Gallagher residence, and that he did so at the suggestion of Felix Fauduveris. Undoubtedly this confession had much to do in forming the opinion of the jury-men.

In the course of a conversation after his sentence Peter Claudianes, with many tears, practically confessed his guilt again. Since then, however, Nathan C. Coghlan has appeared as his attorney, and a stay of execution in Claudianes' case until December 31st has been secured. Whether an appeal will be taken at that time it is at this writing impossible to say with certainty, but it is a reasonable presumption that there will be. In this event the case may be on the judicial boards for a long time to come. December 31st was the date designated for setting the time for the trial of John Claudianes, and it is expected that it will take place very soon.

Personalia.

Marie Corelli declares that all men give her a feeling of intense repulsion, and that, after shaking hands with a man, days elapse before she recovers from a feeling of contamination from the contact. Masculine journalists are her supreme horror.

Messrs. Stieglitz and Steichen, two of the foremost leaders of the art-photography movement, have enthusiastically taken up color photography. Mr. Steichen having spent several months in Paris studying the new process, convenient to the Lumiere laboratories, which originated the color dry plate.

John W. Alexander, the foremost American portrait painter now living in America, arrived in New York from Pittsburgh when he was only a lad and practically penniless. He made his start in life as an errand boy for Harper's publishing house. He lives now in one of the most fashionable districts in New York.

David Belasco, the theatrical manager, is one of the California Club recently organized in New York City. The club holds monthly "links" at restaurants in the city, and plans to build a clubhouse as soon as its finances are adequate.

William Dean Howells has probably helped more struggling young authors by painstaking criticism of their manuscripts than by kindly encouragement than any other American writer. He has devoted much of his time and energy and thought to an unselfish endeavor to advance new writers. He is—probably as a direct consequence—a poor man to-day.

The editor of The Delineator is Theodore Dreiser, author of "Sister Carrie," a novel that received unanimous praise from the critics in spite of its small popular success. Mr. Dreiser was formerly editor of The Broadway Magazine.

"Little Lord Fauntleroy" is in real life Vivian Burnett, who has been in turn a newspaper reporter, an assistant editor of McClure's Magazine, and a partner with his mother, Mrs. Frances Hodgson Burnett, in the publication of "a" magazine for children. He is now on the shady side of thirty-five, and the romantic curls that figured so largely in "Lord Fauntleroy" have entirely disappeared. To shatter illusion at a word, the truth is, he is bald.

Cyrus K. Curtis, the proprietor of The Ladies' Home Journal and of The Saturday Evening Post, is a millionaire from the proceeds of these journals, and owns a steam yacht.

James Lane Allen, author of "A Kentucky Cardinal," "The Chion Invisible," and other books, is a bachelor, and writes most of his books in a hotel in Paris.

J. T. Trowbridge is 81 years old, and shows no infirmities of age. He has now in press a book to be published next spring, entitled "A Pair of Madcaps." He has recently sailed to Italy.

Frederick William MacMonnies, perhaps the most distinguished living American sculptor, is to return from his long residence in France to spend the remainder of his days in his native land. Mr. MacMonnies was born in Brooklyn forty-three years ago.

Senator Thomas C. Platt of New York is writing a book of reminiscences in which he promises to make plain many of the dark pages of political history, including the famous Conkling-Platt incident of the Garfield administration.

A GLANCE ROUND THE WORLD.

The evacuation of Cuba by the American army of pacification begins to-day with the return of the first provisional regiment of marines, numbering 900 men. The last soldiers will leave Cuba April 1st, that late date being used so that a model camp may be left for the new republican army in command of General Pino Guerra. April 1st will thus mark the first day of complete Cuban independence under the presidency of General Gomez.

France is the world's banker. Her annual savings amount to $1,000,000,000, and the average wealth is considerably more than $1,100 for every man, woman and child. These figures were recently published by M. Leroy-Beaulieu, one of the most distinguished statisticians in Europe, and are based upon reliable government statistics.

The Supreme Court of Missouri in a decision handed down December 23rd, last, has given the Standard Oil Company of Indiana and the Republic Oil Company of Ohio till March 1st next to wind up their affairs and leave the State. These companies were also fined $50,000 each, as was the Waters-Pierce Oil Company. All were decided to be subsidiary companies of the Standard Oil, and in conspiracy and combination to monopolize the oil business in Missouri. Unless the Waters-Pierce Company can show the court by March 1st that it has reformed its methods to conform with the state statutes, it must go also. The decree against the other two companies is without this limitation.

The cases were prosecuted by Attorney-General (now Governor-elect) Hadley.

President Castro has been practically succeeded in Venezuela by General Gomez, and has apparently relinquished all claims to control in that government's affairs. He has settled in Europe, and is reported to have carried with him a fortune of $60,000,000.

William H. Newman has resigned the presidency of the New York Central Lines. He is the man who planned and executed the task of organizing the New York Central, the Lake Shore, and the other Vanderbilt roads into one system with one body of officials for all. He also planned and got fully under way the work of making a modern Grand Central Station in New York City.

His successor will probably be W. C. Brown, first vice-president, whose policy will probably be to increase freight rates.

The Citizens Union of New York has lost, by resignation from its presidency, the founder and chief financial supporter of that very useful reform organization, R. Fulton Cutting. Mr. Cutting will continue to support the Union, but will devote his more active work to the Bureau of Municipal Research, an offshoot of the Union which seeks to reform local government by analyzing public records and publishing the results of its investigations as they affect the desirability of re-electing public officials.

Perhaps the highest mountain climbing ever done was recently achieved by Miss Annie S. Peck, who reached the summit of Huascarán in the Peruvian Andes, an elevation of 24,000 feet. Miss Peck weighs about 120 pounds.

The German Aerostations Company has ordered seven airships of the Zeppelin type, and will establish regular passenger service by air line between twenty-seven German towns, all lines radiating from Friedrichshafen, and taking in, among other places, Nuremberg, Leipzig, Berlin, Dresden, Strassburg, and Hamburg. Each airship will carry ten passengers besides the crew.

About fifty hitherto unknown water colors and oil paintings by the Dutchers were recently discovered—the water colors in a portfolio behind a bookcase that had not been moved for years, and the oil paintings in a paper parcel in a storeroom.

The Postoffice Department has emphasized its objections to the recent law of Congress permitting the use of ordinary stamps on special delivery letters by issuing a new and distinctive ten-cent delivery stamp. The ordinary stamps are, however, still legal for this purpose.

Mrs. Helen Longstreet, widow of the Confederate general, has been reappointed postmistress at Gainesville, Ga., on the ground of excellent record.

Theatrical ticket speculators will be driven from the sidewalks of New York this month. Mayor McClellan has signed an ordinance passed by the aldermen prohibiting such speculators from doing business.

Rear Admiral Robley D. Evans has declined the gift of a house from the citizens of Los Angeles. He has been warned by the experience of Admiral Dewey that such gifts in a republic have too many strings attached.

New York Names.

With all their breathless haste and eagerness to economize time, New Yorkers are probably unrivaled in America in the length of the names they give to their institutions. For instance, Frank Damrosch gave his popular school the name of The Institute of Musical Art of the City of New York. Rockefeller's several-million dollar laboratory at the foot of East 67th Street, is The Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research. Pierpont Morgan's greatest charity to the poor of the East Side bears the legend carved in stone above its portal, The Society of the Lying-in Hospital of the City of New York.

"The California Weekly is really a very creditable production, a journal with a purpose, an ideal, one having a good reason for existing."—Santa Cruz Sentinel.

"There is a lot of good reading in The California Weekly and it handles public questions in a style most refreshing, wholesome and all its own. It is healthy in tone and void of rant."—Martinez Gazette.

The Missouri phone.

An elderly couple from the back counties of Missouri walked rather timidly into the waiting-room of the Union Depot at Kansas City and sat down to wait for their train back home. The train announcer's resounding voice attracted the old lady's attention, as he chanted "Santa Fe train No. 7, for Emporia, Dodge City, La Junta, Albuquerque, Los Angeles, San Francisco, and all points west, on track No. 5—all aboard!" At last her eyes found him, perched on a balcony at the further end of the room, a megaphone at his lips. She punched her husband vigorously with her elbow and exclaimed:

"Look, John, he's hollerin' through a horn."

A NEW DISCOVERY

What appears to be a very important discovery has been made by a chemist in San Francisco. The proximate principles of a vegetable drug have been found which seem to act as if by magic in curing catarrh in all its forms. This new compound is sold under the name of Mem-bro-tone. A number of cases have been absolutely cured by one or two applications. More malignant or chronic cases are usually cured in from one to three weeks. This new discovery for catarrh is especially recommended for chronic inflammation and thick mucus discharge from the nasal organs. By stopping this discharge it seems to cure coryza, catarrh of the head and stomach, frontal headache, and in many instances has restored the hearing and sense of smell.

ADAM KIRK rarely paused to reflect upon his past life or to muse upon the stormy years through which he had fought his way to a commanding eminence as a consulting engineer at thirty-five. His existence had been a war since he could remember, and the incidents of battle had come too fast to leave much time for meditation.

But to-day he paused to get his bearings, for he had encountered a new foe who fought with unfamiliar weapons, and for a moment he had been dazed, then furious, then helplessly defeated. He was in love.

Love was a stranger to him. His earliest recollection did not date back to a woman's tenderness. His mother died when he was a few weeks old, and a neighbor woman had reared him to the age of four. After that he survived by the grace of God and by virtue of a constitution that is still the marvel of his friends. Kicks for caresses and cuffs for tenderness were given by his father. At eight he was earning his own living, selling papers and running errands. Here he learned the wisdom of the streets, shrewd insight into character, keen skill in bargaining. At the law of life that he who would live must hold his own, and he who would have must take. He claimed a share of a street corner as his territory for the sale of his papers; the ten-year-old bully who had monopolized it kicked him off, and was, in turn, roundly beaten and sent flying by the interloper. Thereafter he held his post against all comers by force of arms, and with the toughening of his thwack came toughening of his will as well.

Resolution became his habit; acquisition his ambition; action, swift and sure, his method of attack. He had no intimates. He led the "gang" by sheer force of will and muscle, but he had no lieutenants. From the pleasures of his companions he held aloof, not morosely but indifferently. Only two kinds of pleasure he knew. One was to rule, the other to acquire. The other was to enjoy the sunlight.

Somewhere in his heart nature had written the pleasant things of life in terms of sunlight. Dark days depressed him, but something in the brightness of the sun set his pulses flying, exhilarated his spirit, cleared his mind, and put him at peace with the world. So powerfully did this influence affect him that the word "light" came to be to him a synonym for all things good. With the unconscious poetry of childhood he spoke of the "light lady" who was a steady companion, and always smiled as she paid her nickel.

He had no schooling. His father dodged the compulsory education law as thousands do, nonchalantly perjuring himself by declaring that the boy was illiterate, and carefully seeing to it that Adam did not perjure himself as to the daily sales of his papers when he nightly made him "cough up," as he tersely phrased it, the earnings of the day. But in his first school Adam kept his eyes open for the earmarks of success. He soon discerned that the thick-robed men who sat in power in the marble-fronted buildings all about him were the men who bought his papers. Somewhere in those inky pages lay some magic call that gripped the minds of men and made them buy. He considered his spirit on gloomy days when the fog hung heavy over Market Street and the mournful clangor of the fog bells beyond the Ferry Building shot their menace to his heart. "Rich men can read," was the burden of his thought. "Rich, read," the words chimed in his ears. Suddenly, as he mused, the fog lifted, the sun gleamed on the building fronts about him, and "The light!" leaped to his lips as he recognized his friend. "Read, light." The words glowed across his mind in prophetic union. That was it, reading was light, so something to be desired, something worthy to possess.

To desire was to grasp, in his code, and he did not hesitate. "Say, kiddo, can you read?" he hailed a member of his gang.

"Sure, why?"

"You're on. Teach me."

And in odd moments, grasped as they came through the day, the wilful youngster learned to read. The skill to do it came slowly, but doggedness of purpose found its fair reward. The fascination of the printed page grew on him, the world of ideas beyond the Mission and the streets unfolded to his eyes, the brooding contentment of childhood grew upon him. Less even than before he found companionship among his comrades. He "swiped" books from the second-hand dealers' open stalls, he found the way to the public library, and stole hours of the day to read.

THE LIGHT

By E. FRENCH STROTHER

Written for The California Weekly.

One day he disappeared. His companions wondered at his loss, coveted his corner, made bold to usurp it, and held it undisturbed. His father made a few vain efforts to locate his missing source of revenue, and abandoned the search.

Adam has never yet described what happened during the next year. Somehow he beat his way across the country, landed in the hurly-burly of New York, drifted to his level in the Bowery, got a job as errand boy, and found his way to a night school. He was fifteen years old. He made no friends. A slow fury of ambition burned within him. His body had developed with his years. Bull neck, thick shoulders, slender hips, every mark of the perfect human brute was on him. Nobody bothered him, except once, when a bouncer at the Atlantic Garden mistook him for a familiar rough and tried to throw him out. The bouncer went to the floor with a cheek laid open to the bone, and Adam escaped the police in the turmoil.

Day found him promptly at his work. Night found him in his school. Midnight found him studying by candle light in a ten-cent lodging house. At twenty he had risen to be a clerk, and his studies had carried him to the entrance grade of high school. He resigned his job and went to school. Out of hours he sold papers, lit street lamps, waited on the tables at a cheap restaurant. Days at a time he went without food. Many nights he studied through till daybreak. In three years he finished the work of four.

He went to Yale. The football coach sized him up with the delighted staccato exclamation of an expert who has made a find, and offered him his expenses to go into the squad. The first day on the practice field he downed his man and broke the poor lad's collar bone. The second man he tackled fouled him, and Adam laid him out at a blow with three teeth broken. The coach let him out and Adam silently found other means of livelihood. What he wanted he found, and what he found, he took. This meant war, but fighting was his meat.

He graduated as a mining engineer, with first honors, and listened unmoved to the laudatory words that went with his diploma, put the sheepskin in his pocket, and disappeared. A month later he waded into the office of a mining syndicate in San Francisco. The manager was busy, couldn't see him the office boy said. Adam walked straight into the private office.

"Here, what're you doing in here?"

"I want to see you."

"I told you I wouldn't see you now."

"You do see me, don't you? I want work."

"Nothing doing!"

"Need a superintendent of a mine?"

"Nothing doing, I said. Get—"

"Vat for foreman?"

"Go to the—"

"Need any holes?"

"Well I'll be— Say, what do you want here, anyway?"

"Work. I told you I don't just want it, I'm going to get it."

"Well, this beats me. Come around to-morrow and I'll see what I can do."

"Right now's better."

"The nerve— By George, you are the goods. Go to the Lost Cause mine in Mariposa County and run it. Heaven help you, though. Instructions by next mail. Good day."

Adam found the mine in possession of a horde of wild Cornishmen who were on a strike and had barred the superintendent out. Here was the manager's little joke. Adam found the superintendent.

"You can leave this to me," he said.

"You? I'm boss here, young fellow. Get to—"

"You're nobody. Read your mail and hike. And don't be too blamed slow or I'll bite you."

He walked over to the mine. A dozen rifles greeted him. He walked on in silence, straight into the group of howling rioters. "Who's boss here?" he asked. A gigantic fellow stepped out.

"I'm—"

"He went down like a shot."

"Who's next?"

A bullet whistled by his ear. Reaching over he caught the prostrate figure by the neck, lifted it in front of him and drew his pistol.

"Show down," he roared, "mine's a straight flush."

He made his terms and the men went back to work. In five years he occupied the manager's office in San Francisco. At thirty-five he opened offices of his own, and had plenty of business. He was pretty well satisfied with himself. He could look out of his windows onto the corner where he had sold papers as a boy, and he still felt the thrill of the sunlight as it shone in across the hills.

He had many acquaintances, no friends. Shrewd men backed his judgment and paid his liberal fees. Many men admired him, but with admiration born of fear. He knew no women. He despised them; they were weaklings; they didn't count; he never noticed them.

But to-day he was strangely disturbed. He had passed through the throng of Market Street an hour ago, and his eyes had photographed a vision of rare loveliness, a girl with the rosy cheeks of her Californian sisters, with laughing eyes, with the carriage of a thoroughbred. A glimpse, and she was gone. Somehow her picture stayed in his mind. He thrust it out and went to work. His pencil halted and the paper disintegrated. Between his eyes and the paper was the vision of this girl, swimming in a mist of yellow light. With an oath he put it from him and went back to work. It would not down. Hour by hour, day after day, it haunted him. He was raging. Then he paused. Something must be done to stop this folly. He had conquered everything before, he would give an hour to getting rid of this disconcerting dream.

So he paused to take his bearings and by force of will to clear his mind. The vision arose again before him, swimming in its golden mist. Unconsciously he let it linger, yielding to a subtle thrill of pleasure. The sun streamed in his window, adding a brighter glory to the halo round his dream. "Girl, light," he mused. He leaped to his feet, mused, "I'm ready for action. The light! That's it, by—I'll have her."

He hardly slept or ate until he found her. But he did find her. She lived on Russian Hill, immured from clamor, cloistered in this quiet little settlement of cultured homes. Her father was a merchant of the older days, retired from business into a library of old books to nod in skull cap and slippers over Omar's verse and Lubbock's prose. Outside the library he daughter ruled the house. She was an only child, and her mother was dead ten years ago.

Adam soon made an access to the house. Phillips, the banker, introduced him to the pastor of the church, the pastor introduced him to Mr. Vallentyne, a cultured man, and a hundred dollars invested in the gift of a rare edition of the Rubaiyat made the old man a friend for life. He advanced quickly to invitations to the quiet evening dinners, and came often. Her name was Laura; he adopted it within a week, with such assurance of his right to do so that the girl's instinct to reprimand him faltered short of speech. He had no thought but that she should be his wife. It did not occur to him that she might refuse. He wanted her, and what he would have he took. He was only yielding to custom in biding his time to reach out and take.

He stooped to strategy. One evening he took Phillips with him, got him started on a discussion with Mr. Walliston about the laws of banking, and drew Laura to one side. Bluntly he made his next move.

"I'm hungry," he said. "Where's the pantry?"

No "may I," "please," nor "if's" about it. Laura led the way, instinctively obedient to his force of will. In the pantry he helped himself to jam and bread and cakes, gathering his hands full, and said:

"Come on into the dining-room."

There he set his booty down, closed the door nearest the library, and faced around.

Look here, I did this for a bluff to get you off to myself. I want to tell you something. I want you to be my wife. You are going to be my wife—wait—I saw you one day on Market Street, I have seen you every hour since that. I didn't sleep until I found you. I want you, need you, shall have you, do you hear?"

Laura looked at him with flashing eyes. She spoke softly, but with a disdainful preciseness of articulation.

"Shall! That is a strong word, Mr. Kirk. I give it back to you; you shall not. And when you know women better you will know that this is a poor way to win them."

"Yes, shall. I always get the things I want, and I shall get this, if it often takes time, but I win in the end. Only remember that I warned you."

Laura had smiled.

"But you see, Mr. Kirk, I'm not a thing. I'm a woman. There's a difference."

And she was gone.

Adam rejoined the men in the library, and as he and Phillips walked down the street a little later the banker marveled to hear the austere Kirk remark, "It's a beautiful night, Mr. Phillips. I am sure to-morrow will be full of light."

He saw very little of Miss Walliston for several weeks. She made adroit occasions for being absent when he came, smiled sweetly when she had to meet him, but skilfully as women can took care that he should have no tete-a-tetes. Kirk was maddened. He was playing at a woman's game, where finesse was more valuable than fear, and where every weapon of his warfare in the world glanced harmlessly from the arm of this slender girl. At length he thought he saw his chance. He had taken Phillips to the house again, and started up the old discussion. Then he rose to go.

"Just remembered I'm to meet a man at my office. No, you stay here, Phillips. Don't get up, Mr. Walliston, Miss Laura will see me to the door."

And raging inwardly Miss Laura did. In the hall Adam spoke. "This nonsense has gone on long enough. You are going to be my wife, and you'd as well stop this business of avoiding me and get used to my ways. It's a good idea to get acquainted with the man you are going to marry before you marry him."

Laura paled with anger.

"Mr. Kirk, you make love like a beast in the jungle, and until you learn that true love is born of gentleness and not of pride, you will make few conquests. And until you learn the amenities of civilized conversation I do not care to see you again."

And with blazing eyes she swept out of the hall, leaving him to find his way out by himself.

He breasted the shrill wind from the Golden Gate with a black fury raging in his brain. He was used to resistance; it braced him for sterner action. But he was unaccustomed to defeat, and this defeat embittered with a taunt, maddened him. Love was lost in anger, and the bitter tide surged higher as he strode blindly on. His mind was busy with plots of retaliation, with schemes to beat down the frail resistance as it seemed to him that stood between himself and the capture of this latest object of his impetuous desire. He gloated in fancy on the joy of triumph, the exultant pride, with which he would bring her to his will and say, "I told you so."

He pulled himself short with a snort of anger, with the keen practical reaction from fancy that had made him big in business. What were these plots, these schemes, these anticipations? Bubbles, empty as the air. As he paused, the vision rose again before his eyes, a rarely winsome face, a slender form, the carriage of a queen—all swimming in a golden mist—but in the eyes a look of gentle reprimand that cut his heart. "Love is born of gentleness, not of pride," rang in his ears. He could see the eyes still looking at him gravely, the sweet mouth half ready to invite him back. Through his heart swept a sudden thrill of tenderness, of longing, of self-abasement, of the complete humiliation of a lofty pride. He choked back a sob, man-fashion, with an oath. Over him had flashed a vision of the emptiness of his past life, its barren splendor of success, and another vision of the glow of its possibilities if lighted by the glow of love.

He did not sleep that night. Hour after hour he tramped the empty streets, fighting the battle of his life with his awakened soul, learning the strange lesson that he who would save his life must first lay it down, and that he who would know the triumph of love must first know the abasement of pride in seeking it. With the dawn came peace, and the Adam Kirk who unlocked his office door before the office boy got down was a stranger to himself of the day before. He wrote a note at once.

"My dear Miss Walliston:

"I have spent the night learning my first lesson in humility. May I not come to you this evening, as a pupil to his teacher, for my second lesson? I have also some apologies I sincerely wish to make.

"Faithfully your friend,

"Adam Kirk."

The messenger returned at noon with a brief reply:

"My dear Mr. Kirk:

"Tonight at seven.

"Laura Walliston."

But his second lesson was not one in humility, though not less amazing to him than the first. For he learned that when love has humbled pride it casts down its own weapons of defense. That night, two figures stole from the shadowy porch on Russian Hill, mounted the crest and looked down upon the wondrously lighted city, across the bay, up to the starlit sky, and back into each other's eyes. Laura spoke first.

"Isn't a beautiful world we live in, dear?"

"It was not beautiful to me until you made it so."

And hand in hand they watched the moon come up and bathe the world in mellow light, symbolical of love.

A Tolstoy Story.

A Western magazine editor narrated at a Tolstoy birthday dinner in Chicago an interesting story.

"Tolstoy," he said, "abominates sneaks, spies. He intensely abominated Melikoff.

"Melikoff, one day, suspecting that a good deal of revolutionary work was going on at Tolstoy's estate, visited Yasnya Polyana unexpectedly.

"Do you come," said Tolstoy to him, sternly, 'officially or as a private person? If you come officially, here are my keys. Search. Examine everything. You are quite free to do so."

"But count," said Melikoff, 'believe me, I come to you as a private person.'

"Tolstoy looked at him in silence. Then, calling two stalwart mujiks, he said:

"Here, pick this man out of the house!"—New York News.

Mistaken Idea.

"I don't know much about the politics of your country," remarked the visiting Englishman, "but I have read of your politicians. Mr. Bryan belongs to what is known as the Democratic party, does he not?"

"No, sir," answered the man with the bulging brow. "What is known as the Democratic party belongs to Mr. Bryan."—Chicago Tribune.

Warning.

"Elect me," said the candidate, "and I will enforce all the laws."

"There is no use talking that way," said the boss. "In the first place, you can't possibly get through all the laws in your first term of office, and if you try it's a sure thing you will never get a second."—Washington Star.

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

The Constitution in the Making.

The Constitution of the United States was the handiwork of a convention numbering forty to fifty men. Sometimes there were less than forty participating, but never more than fifty. They got to work May 25, 1787, and concluded their labors September 17th of the same year. They made of the convention hall a threshing floor and upon it they heaped all the ideas relating to government to be found in the thought, literature and experience of their time and they flailed and winnowed until they separated every kernel of good grain from the chaff and blew the latter away.

Reading the reports of the debates had in the convention, as left to us by James Madison, it is hard to realize that the delegates chosen to represent the thirteen colonies in that convention were great men. Many of their contentions appear, as viewed from our standpoint, and 121 years of national history, to have been childish. Wise old Benjamin Franklin prattled in his stilted way while Washington, as chairman, preserved his dignity and impartially held his peace. Even the great Hamilton doubted the possibility of any republic governing so large a territory as that comprised in the thirteen original States.

The framers of our constitution stood in about equal dread of a monarchy and a democracy. Their preference would have been, had they dared stand for it, an aristocracy composed of the first "characters" to be found only in the first families, but, seeing no likelihood of such a form of government being accepted by the people, they wisely refrained from seeking to establish one.

A principal cause of contention from first to last was fear of the larger States on the part of the smaller States and for a time this seemed likely to wreck the Union. Delegates from smaller States openly declared that they would prefer to be held as dependencies of some foreign power than to be subordinated to their larger neighbors and insisted that, whether big or little, each "sovereign State" should have the same voice in the councils of the nation and the same vote. Neither gradation nor wealth was to be allowed preponderance of influence. At times it seemed that this must prove an irrepressible conflict and that if the smaller States were brought into the Union at all they would have to be whipped in and held by force after they were in. Forbearance and compromise finally wore the cause of contention away. Each State was given the same representation in the senate, which was looked upon as likely to become the paramount power in government, but members of the House of Representatives and the President were to be chosen with reference to population.

A strange incongruity in the situation was that the delegates from New England, where government was and long had been an almost pure democracy, stood in greatest dread of democratic institutions whereas delegates from the southern States, where society and government were essentially patrician, and confined to a few first families, had considerable faith in the ability of the common people to participate in affairs of government.

There was also an undertone, almost of hopelessness, of finding any basis upon which stable and just government might be established other than that of autocratic power tempered by greater or less resistance to aggression on the part of the populace. James Madison, in speaking of this inability, demanded to know if the public conscience could be relied on to maintain justice when it did not suffice among individuals to order their conduct after standards of rectitude. He had found majorities ruthless in their tyranny over minorities not able to make a stout resistance. Religion, which should bind all men in one common brotherhood, had been employed with relentless rigor for the persecution of fellow mortals. It was this feeling of hopelessness of founding just government upon conscience or religion or the forbearance of majorities that led to the idea of checks and balances, of setting one department of government over against another, to prevent either of them acquiring too much power, that pervades our constitution from title to signatures.

And these checks and balances have been checking and balancing from the adoption of the Constitution until now, never quite satisfactory and yet never failing departing from the original intent. The Senate is jealous of the executive, the House of the Senate, and President and Congress of the power and influence of the supreme court. The legislative, executive and judicial departments of our government have been, as the architects planned they should be, co-ordinate yet independent departments, but not as co-ordinate or as independent as the framers of the Constitution hoped they would be. The public has taken a larger share in government than the constitutional convention conceived possible and this has been to the strengthening of the executive because the executive can be made more readily responsive to the popular will than either of the other departments of government.

Do You Hear Well?

The Stolz Electrophone—A New, Electrical, Scientific and Practical Invention for those who are Deaf or Partially Deaf.

MAY NOW BE TESTED IN YOUR OWN HOME.

Deaf or partially deaf people now may make a trial of the Stolz Electrophone at home. This personal, practical test serves to prove that the device satisfies, with ease, every requirement of a perfect hearing device.

This new invention renders unnecessary such clumsy, unsightly and frequently harmful devices as trumpees, horns, tubes, ear drums, fans, etc. It is a tiny electric telephone that fits on the ear and which, the instant it is applied, magnifies the sound waves in such manner as to cause an astonishing increase in the clearness of all sounds. It overcomes the buzzing and roaring ear noises and, also, so constantly and electrically exercises the vital parts of the ear that, usually, the natural unaided hearing itself is gradually restored.

THE PLEDGE OF CITIZENSHIP

I, a citizen of the United States of America, realizing that a free Republic is an impossibility unless the citizen performs his civic duty, hereby pledge myself upon my sacred honor never to fail to exercise my right of citizenship by voting at every election, primary or secondary, wherever it is possible and legal for me to render that service to my country, my health permitting me so to do.

In taking this pledge it is distinctly understood that I in no way obligate myself to vote for any particular party, any definite candidate or any certain measure. I am binding myself only to my Country, and pledging myself solely to the faithful performance of the duty I owe to her as a citizen.

WHY TAKE THE FOREGOING PLEDGE?

Those taking the foregoing pledge, signing and sending it to this office, will be enrolled upon The California Weekly's "School for Citizenship," which will be a permanent feature of this paper. It will entitle the person sending in his name to have answered, either through the columns of the paper or by letter, any rational question he may ask concerning public affairs, and, generally, by the person best equipped to afford the desired information. It will also entitle the signer to such special literature bearing upon the obligations and opportunities of good citizenship as may from time to time be especially desired that it is especially desired that it be taken and sent in by young men lately become voters or who will cast their first votes two years hence. It will take but a moment to clip out the pledge, sign, enclose in an envelope, stamp and address to "School for Citizenship," office The California Weekly, 26 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, and it opens the way for a liberal education in citizenship.

WHAT THEIR OWN FIGURES DISCLOSE.

What is the financial condition of the transcontinental railroads at this time when increases in freight tariffs are being proposed, and justified, on the ground of necessity? Fortunately, we are not reduced to the necessity of accepting blindly the assertions made by the railroad representatives. The belated annual reports of these railroad companies have been coming out, and financial journals have added many facts of interest.

With the Southern Pacific the year ending with June 30, 1908, although including eight months of depression, was not a bad one. That company earned eight per cent. over and above expenses and fixed charges. It is only three or four years since the Southern Pacific began paying any dividends on its common stock, yet in this hard year Mr. Harriman's railroad, after paying fixed charges and 6 per cent. on preferred stock, has left enough to pay not merely the six per cent. on common stock but two per cent. more. How many kinds of business are there in California which could make an equally good showing?

Next take the Union Pacific. The lucky holders of Union Pacific stock luxuriate in dividends of ten per cent. This company's report for the last fiscal year makes a wonderful showing. The Union Pacific earned for dividend purposes $35,719,399; of this $3,981,951 was due as dividends on preferred stock, leaving for the common stockholders enough to pay 16.23 per cent. on $195,487,900, only a shade less than the percentage earned in the year 1906-7, the banner year of railroad profits. Is it because his best railroad earned only 16.23 per cent. last year that Mr. Harriman finds it necessary to raise rates of freight on California products seeking Eastern markets? But it may be said that these figures cover a period which ended six months since and show little regarding the present conditions of the railroads. What are those conditions? We have the statistics for four months ending with the 31st of October, and they make a showing that almost any business man in California might envy. What business man, who had been doing so well, would talk about cinching his customers with increased rates?

For the four months period to November 1st, Southern Pacific gross has declined 10 per cent., while its net has increased $2,296,916, or 18 per cent.

Concerning Union Pacific, its gross receipts in October declined $114,011, or 1.4 per cent., while expenses declined $1,042,769, or 22 per cent., and its net increased $914,529, or 22 per cent.

The Wall Street Journal puts it in this way: "For the first four months of the year up to November 1st, Union Pacific's gross had decreased but $167,000, or less than 1/2 of 1 per cent. In other words, its gross earnings practically ran parallel to the highest points touched by the company. The net earnings during the same period increased $3,333,069, or 30 per cent."

That is to say, in these times of commercial depression the net earnings of one of Mr.

Harriman's railroads have been eighteen per cent. better than they were in the same months last year, and the net earnings of the other have been thirty per cent. better. How does that sound as a note of transportation poverty and railroad distress? It is true this showing is secured in large part by reducing expenses and not by increasing gross earnings; but, however obtained, it ought to be regarded as cheering to the stockholders and indicates that it will be some time yet before Mr. Harriman's companies will have to ask for the services of a receiver.

The other transcontinental railroads are of less importance to California than the Southern Pacific and the Union Pacific, but all of them are doing well. The Atchison, it is true, reduced its dividends from six per cent. to five, but recent reports show that its earnings are holding up well, while such great economies have been effected in operating expenses that the showing for stockholders is a fine one.

J. J. Hill's two transcontinental lines have nothing to complain of. Last year the Great Northern earned seven per cent. dividends, and is doing so still, in spite of large expenditures upon improvements and equipment. As for the Northern Pacific, the Wall Street Journal states that during the four months to November 1st it has earned a total operating income of $11,576,712, which is $106,000 more than in the first third of the preceding year.

The statistics given are sufficient to prove that the railroads in which the Pacific Coast is specially concerned are not suffering to any such degree that they need to adopt extraordinary measures to protect their stockholders at the expense of other business industries; to the contrary, the evidence makes the strongest showing of the injustice of such a move coming at this time when general business is in such condition that it needs to be nursed and conserved in every way.

Railroads have suffered a good deal in the decline of gross earnings, but, as we have shown, they have been able, through reduction of operating expenses, to pay their dividends and even to increase the proportion of their net earnings. . . . at other branch of business can present a showing as good? The conclusion, then, must be that on grounds of necessity the proposed advance in freight rates is without justification. The effect on the industries of California of a freight advance at this critical time would be most serious.

MULTIPLYING JUDGES.

Justice needs to be administered promptly. To administer it promptly the judicial force must be adequate. The position of a judge is a trying one. Where everyone about him is wrought to a high tension the judge cannot avoid a strain upon his own nerves, and a work-worn judge is in poor plight to fulfill the duties of his office. It would prove a poor economy to have few judges than needed as it has proven poor economy to have judges poorly paid.

But who is to determine when there are judges enough, the politicians? They are doing it and there is reason to suspect that they often strive to create judicial positions for political rather than for judicial reasons. This will bear watching. He who causes two judges to occupy benches where one was enough is neither a benefactor of his State nor his country. The tendency to degrade judicial positions to the status of political patronage, to be doled out in payment of political services, is one to be resisted. This is the more important where, as in California, the one litigant that has cases in every court of every county has within its keeping the determination of how many judicial positions there shall be and who shall fill them.

When, as in Alameda County, an effort is making for the creation of additional judicial positions, the issue needs to be thoroughly threshed out. It is not sufficient for men to say offhand that more judges are wanted or are not. Who knows? The judges now on the bench, no one else, and no additional judgeships should be created unless the judges now on the bench, sitting to bare, memorialize the legislature to create more and support the memorial with a showing of facts. Reducing political positions to the status of political pay is abominable.

SENATOR PERKINS PRO AND CON.

The pros: George C. Perkins is a self-made man. From the humblest beginnings he has by tact, energy and sagacity made his way to wealth, to the highest office in the gift of his State and has already held that office as long as any two senators California has had. He is a kindly man. Those who are numbered among his intimates are extremely fond of him. He has had a varied and instructive experience and his abilities are good. His sixteen years of service have advanced him to positions of influence in the senatorial body. He is a valuable man for California. He can "get things," for he is a tireless hustler and effective persuader at the departments and among his fellow members. He is personally clean. There is no suggestion that financial considerations influence his action. The longer he is kept there the more influence will the mere effect of seniority give him.

The cons: George C. Perkins is a politician. He is in no proper C. Perkins is a statesman and, at Washington, is seldom consulted by those whose statesmanship keeps Uncle Sam in the middle of the road. All his life he has trusted his political intuitions rather than his conscience and the President is said to have said of him that he can turn a corner quicker than any jackrabbit in California. He espoused free silver when he was not in favor of it, and he contrived to get the legislature of California to instruct him as to his policy regarding the Philippines that he might not have to carry the burden of responsibility by himself. If he were less of an eel he would be more of a man, but being an eel has enabled him to wriggle into a good many good things and out of a good many tight places. Professing to have been all along a stanch friend of President Roosevelt and his policies he was, two years ago, before it was certain which way the cat would jump, sending out literature to the papers of California, under his frank, nearly every batch of which carried covert thrusts both at Roosevelt and his policies. While he has plenty of worldly wisdom he has little schooling and slaughters English with as little remorse as the king of the cannibal islands killed and ate missionaries. Financially above reproach he makes merchandise of everything political and, with one or two exceptions, has used the patronage of his office to rivet the chains of Southern Pacific political domination upon the wrists and ankles of California, and he has done this, not because he is in sympathy with Herrinism or enjoys the confidence of Herrin, but to purchase the negative friendship of the Southern Pacific's political bureau. This is the head and front of his offending.

California ought to have a better man in the United States Senate than George C. Perkins, but it does not at this time seem likely to get one. No man of senatorial calibre has been fit to accept the invitation of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League to go before the people to make a canvass as an avowed candidate for the office. Besides, Southern Pacific domination has not been conducive to bringing out men of statesmanship size. The railroad political bureau cannot use, and therefore has no use for, a man of brain power and independent mind. That bureau wants tools and hand tools at that and, so long as that bureau is in power, public life in California will offer few inducements to big men unless self sacrificing enough to enter public life with the unselfish purpose of breaking the chains which bind California to the chariot of Standard Oil. When such men come to the front California will follow the lead of New York in substituting an Elihu Root for a Tom Platt. Only a free State can be represented by free men, in the United States Senate or elsewhere.

TOO MANY ELECTIVE OFFICERS.

The direct primary will be a brilliant success in nominating governors. Also in nominating sheriffs. It will probably be largely a failure in nominating state treasurers and secretaries of state. But, in that failure, it will be no more than the election already is. We do not elect our state treasurers. We automatically ratify their appointment by the convention of the dominant party. A popular man may run a little ahead of his ticket, an unpopular man a little behind. A competent man has neither advantage nor disadvantage. The people exercise no choice on these minor state offices, because they have none. The places ought, in good theory, to be appointive, and in fact they are appointive, only the appointing power rests in the nominating convention of the dominant political party, instead of with a responsible public official. The abolition of that convention will not change the general relation of these offices to the popular choice; it will only expose it. We have not realized that we do not elect these officials, because in form we did elect them and in substance our rulers commonly chose us acceptable men. Under the direct primary, the acceptable will be squarely up to us of choosing these men ourselves, or realizing that we do not do so. In the latter case, we shall then, in due time, provide a proper method of choosing them by appointment, we to elect the appointers.

Popular government is too complex, anyway. That is the chief reason it has fallen into the hands of professionals, whose interest is to keep it complex. An English voter will be called on, at fairly frequent intervals, to vote for the common councilman of his ward, or for a board for his town, and once in seven years or less, for a member of parliament. Practically, he votes for no one else. In England were a republic he would, of course, vote for president, for his representative in the upper branch of the national legislature, and perhaps for a very few other officials, but the list would be short, as it is short in Canada and Australia. The choice is direct and simple, and the people have an opinion and express it. If we want to make popular government workable by anybody but experts, we must simplify it along similar lines here.

But also we must escape the alternative evil. An elective officer with large appointing power is practically invincible for re-election. That is the reason any one elected Speaker of the National House of Representatives can maintain himself in power indefinitely. If the appointive power is extended, in this country, the minor offices must be recovered from politics, by the merit system, and the men who appoint the major appointed officers must be held to some sort of a responsibility to issues or policies, that will prevent a machine from remaining invulnerable.

able when the policies of its head are disapproved. The thing can be done in a simple government. A complex government, like ours, invites the Boss and his corps of experts, who run for us the machine whose intricacies we find it too troublesome to master ourselves.

A GRIEVOUS BURDEN.

The attention of the reader is called to an article in another column entitled "The Burden of Outworn Laws," written for The California Weekly by Dr. William Frederic Bade, of Berkeley. It deals in a condensed form with a subject of great interest to those who care to go beneath the surface of things that they may lay hold upon fundamental tendencies in the main currents of human affairs.

As Dr. Bade has shown, law had its origin in custom and to custom was generally given a religious sanction which made the priests the judges and the priestly code the law of the tribe, clan or country. When the civil law was divorced from the sacerdotal the two traveled on lines more nearly parallel than many suppose. The theologian and the jurist possess many analogies in temperament, type of mind and conscious or unconscious purpose. Their predominating penchant is for the systematic. What volumes, tomes, sets of books, libraries have not the theologians laboriously written that the Lord our God might deal with mortals, here and hereafter, in orderly fashion, immutably as the spheres revolve in their appointed ways throughout space, never jostling each other or wobbling ingloriously as they whirl! What junk has it all become!

And for every chapter, volume, tome, set of books or library that the theologians have written the jurists have penned a companion bound in calf, with this difference—the junk man is cheated of his stock in trade. The theologian has the supreme advantage that he possesses in the forty thousand words that Jesus left to the world an ever-flowing spring to which he may return when he has been too far afield, that he may refresh himself, get his bearings anew and make another start. The jurist has no such unfailing resource unless he, too, bring his burden to the same fountain, which he has been little inclined to do, speaking in a judicial sense. Since the separation of sacerdotalism from jurisprudence there has been a feeling, rather than a belief, that the philosophy of the gentle Nazarene is not adapted to this world in any such measure as would make it a foundation for a system of jurisprudence and nothing short of a system will suffice the judicial type of mind.

It is this concept of a judicial system that, of itself, and apart from the human quality, will suffice to mete out justice in all cases, that weighs upon our social order like a Cheops in the time of Jesus the sacerdotal system "lade men with burdens grievous to be borne," so now the system of jurisprudence, which time has evolved, because dead hands reach up out of forgotten graves to wreak their will, and the minds of men are prone to lose themselves in labyrinthine mazes of their own making, either paralyzes justice under a staggering load or forces the settlement of causes outside of court lest a worse thing come upon aggressor and aggressed.

Throughout the religious world has lately gone the command of a recovered rationality: "Back to the Christ and the truths he taught," and with results full of promise for a regenerated world. Is it not about time to send from lip to lip and heart to heart through the realm of jurisprudence a command to return to the simpler forms and principles of a law that found its origin in the simple customs of common men? It is true that the relations of man to man are more intricate than they were of old, but the essential principles are as simple now as ever and need to be as certainly applied. The jurisprudence of our day is as artificial as was the sacerdotal code in the days of Jesus and weighs about as heavily upon the people.

WHO SHALL GUARD THE GUARDIANS?

A free press is the guardian of the public liberty. But who shall guard the guardian? Only too visibly, it needs guarding. We have government by newspaper, and as we bring government closer to the people it becomes still more government by newspaper. Tammany does not need newspapers, but a reform movement must have them and the direct primary is physically impossible without them. As our newspapers are, so shall our liberties be. And our newspapers do not hold out an encouraging prospect. Who shall guard them?

Obviously, first the newspapers shall guard themselves. Let honest men who run newspapers run them honestly. Most men prefer honesty, if it is not too expensive. Let then the newspapers watch each other, as court reviews court. The fear of reversal or criticism by other courts is the only thing which prevents the arbitrary power of judges from being arbitrarily used. But, finally, let the people watch the newspapers. While the people must for the most part judge the accuracy of newspaper information by information which they can only obtain from the newspapers, thus confining their investigations to a circle in which there may be no facts or truth, it is nevertheless true that no newspaper can make a policy of deliberate misrepresentation or careless sensationalism without being found out. The people already know the character of their newspapers even better than they know that of their public officials. If they will care as well as know, if they will repudiate the newspaper that betrays them, even if it also entertains them, then government by newspaper will become safe, because it will be in fact government by the people. At the last, it is the people's responsibility and the people's power.

REVERSING THE CURRENT.

The interrelations of life are getting too complex for our economic theories. Direct competition, as the sufficient regulator of prices, was dethroned long ago. When the price of meat, or lumber, or freight, goes up, it is always by the simultaneous inspiration of all the companies, without consultation—so they simultaneously say. Business has acquired a strange telepathy, and a puzzling altruism. And now comes the abolition of even indirect competition. Nobody expects railroads to compete, but water competition is the very fundament of the terminal rates theory, consequently the railroads provide their own water competition, and we have the strange spectacle of steamboat companies deliberately charging rates that destroy their own profits—because they are owned by railroad magnates, who find railroad profit in steamboat loss. Railroads are run for profit, but we see coal-mining roads deliberately run at a loss, to increase the profits of mines owned by the same men. When industry is depressed, the Wall Street bears make their killings. But not now, when there are bulls on Wall Street who can afford to stand losses in the stock market indefinitely, in order to protect their industrial interests against greater losses. So we find men buying when it would be profitable to sell, closing mills when it would be profitable to run them, and altogether stemming with success the economic current. It is as easy to reverse the law of supply and demand as it is to make water run up hill—and we are doing both. When the same person is both buyer and seller, and controls both competitors, all economic signs fail.

MUCK-RAKING THE TARIFF.

There is an announced intent, on the part of several enterprising magazines, to muck-rake the tariff. They will find material enough, as Ida M. Tarbell has already demonstrated. But they will also find themselves dealing with an issue whose dual nature they may not themselves realize. The protective tariff is an economic policy and a political scheme. Protection is the fixed policy of the American people, and even the academic are beginning to understand the justification of this policy. Anyhow, there is no prospect of changing it, and no good reason to do so. But protection, like all other forms of special privilege, has its relations to corruption. Protection is in the general interest, but a particular schedule is often enough procured for a particular interest by political methods not ideal. These methods deserve exposure, and any possibility of them (there is less now than ever before) should be eliminated from the pending tariff revision. But the revelations of the muck-rakers will lead to the conclusion of purer politics, not of economic free trade. If protection is for the best interest of the country, we want it. If it has been accomplished by crooked politics, we want that stopped. There is no inconsistency between sound economics and sound morals, even if in some instances the alliance has been of sound economics with unsound morals.

It is easy to get the best men in any city to serve on a Civic League, to do hard, unpaid work looking unofficially after public affairs. It is rarely possible to get these same men to serve on the common council of that city, to look, officially, after those same public affairs. Evidently it is not lack of public spirit, but rather lack of official spirit. Is it class pride which prevents men of one class seeking office by the suffrages of another? That can hardly be the usual reason. What, ever it is, city charters should be so framed as to encourage the service, in their public offices, of exactly the sort of men who cheerfully serve as unofficial watchers of public office.

Those interested in California and its prosperity, will read with thoughtfulness the article elsewhere in this issue, prepared for The California Weekly by Mr. C. H. Bentley, regarding the advance in trans-continental freight rates. It had been the purpose to allow some representative of the railroads to give the railroad side of the rate question, but it was decided by gentlemen having that in charge not to take the subject to the public through the press. We are warranted in inferring from this that the subject is not one for discussion, but for action. The issue is as to whether they can do it or not, and it rather looks as though they can, but by doing it without a showing of justice they will speed the day when every such act will be reviewed by power of government.

Once more "the people of California, represented in Senate and Assembly," will proceed to enact ostensibly representative legislation. How merely ostensible that representation has often been is only too painfully remembered. But there is really reason to hope. The coming legislature does not all represent the people. Too much of it represents the "organization," which represents Herrin, who represents Harriman, who represents the Rockefeller world-trust. But the coming legislature is going to do its deeds in daylight, and light is the great purifier. The people will watch as they never did before; they will care, and they will know that misrepresentation is a curable evil. To watch, to care and to know, that is to exercise self-government, whether it is effective or not.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

In the presence of such a disaster as lately visited Sicily and southern Italy is there reason for wondering that superstition exists in the world? Is there occasion for marveling that the semi-barbarous ancients peopled the earth, the air and the sea, with beings of great power over material things, and with dispositions so uncertain as to cause them to visit their wrath upon mankind because of the most trivial delinquency or oversight?

If the Lord had not finished his world why did he people it and admonish his children to multiply and replenish it? Is anything, even the universe, a finished product? Are not new worlds forming and old worlds wandering in rayless paths through illimitable space? If the order of the universe needs not human suffering, but crashes and tremors, crashes down and blots out indiscriminately, with what assurance can we claim a moral order for the universe? Is Almighty God, himself, working as we are working, with refractory materials, and only doing, as the best of us are doing, the best he can with the materials in hand and under the conditions in which he must work?

How old, how outworn and how threadbare are the queries above propounded! What islands, seas, countries, continents, have been discovered since any new light was shed upon them! Has any sage through the ages added to or subtracted from what was said on the subject by Job long prior to the Christian era? And to what conclusion did Job come? Why, only this, that he did not know, yet trusted the universe, because there was nothing else for him to do except to take the advice of his wife, curse God and die. What alternative is there for us that Job did not have? Only this, that the Man of Nazareth assured his followers that there is a father to the human race and that he not only knows the thoughts without his solicitude, and that somewhere, somehow and sometime, the children of men will be taken care of and equitable recompense meted out. Though he slay, yet must we trust. There is nothing we can do.

Yes, on second thought, there is something else. We can recognize the fact that the earth is unfinished, that earthquakes do happen, that they are sometimes followed by tidal waves, that houses indifferently may fall upon those who are inside, that houses built of combustible materials will take fire and burn together with those who are pinioned within. We can take cognizance of the fact that certain portions of the surface of the earth are more frequently visited with seismic disturbances than others, that they have been more severe in such places than elsewhere. We may cease to build man-traps where men and women are likely to be entrapped within them and build more strongly and safely.

In countries where the wind is strong men build to resist the winds so far as they may. Where the winters are cold they build houses warm. Where the snow falls deep they pitch their roofs sharply that the snow may slide off, not flat the snow may pile up and crush down. Why should the factor of earthquakes be regarded as negligible in building when no man neglects to consider the factors of wind, temperature, rain or snow?

Southern Italy, where earthquakes have been more than half the habitable globe beside. The fact has been known since the dawn of history, but how inadequate the provision made for it. "Alas! how, forsooth, do mortals reproach the gods, for they say that their evils are from us, whereas by their own infatigations they suffer beyond what is destined." Is this any less true now than in the days of Homer? The ways of God are past finding out, but the wisdom of this world should be sufficient for taking at least reasonable precautions in building cities and houses for people to live in. There are problems which the world makes no progress in solving, because it cannot. Gates of adamant bar the way, but this we may know: Our flesh is vulnerable as a subject to vicissitudes against which we may protect ourselves if we will.

The Flesh Pots of Sacramento.

The poverty of statesmanship in politics is well exemplified in the petty scramble for legislative patronage at Sacramento. It is a piggyish squabble to get lumps out of the flesh pots, not always for the legislators themselves, but often for the political town-trots and odd-jobs men, camp followers at the tail of the political host. Each legislator feels that he must throw some sop to his particular lackey for, no sops no lackeys, and lackeys are as necessary in conducting campaigns as hotels.

Not all the sops go to lackeys. Members themselves desire to eke out their inconsiderable revenues by getting son or daughter, or—well, there is a type of attache, always in some number, not mentionable in polite society. A decade or so ago these unmentionables gave a ball and, that night, there was not a committee in either house that could muster a quorum. There is much sowing of hold-over wild oat seed at the State capital during a legislative session, so much of it that wives sometimes insist on being put on the attache pay rolls for prudential reasons. Yet there are earnest, capable men there who hate the word "patronage" and detest the clamorers for it. Were it not for these the commonwealth would long since have been brought to ruin.

Yuan Shi Kai.

The depositing of this statesman from his high office in the Chinese government may prove a history-making "incident," as it would be characterized in diplomacy. It would indicate that the reactionaries are in power at Peking and that Yuan has somehow lost his hold upon his own province, for, once before when he was summoned to Peking peremptorily, he went promptly, but accompanied by a bodyguard of 30,000 of the best troops in China. He was most cordially received and returned with new honors instead of minus his head as would have been the case had he gone unattended.

When the Boxer fanatics began stirring up the people in his province Yuan invited a number of them before him to explain the movement and the reasons that supported it. They came and, among other things, assured the governor that they were so protected by holy charms that the bullets of the infidels' best rifles would fall as harmlessly from their bodies as so many peas snapped at them. Yuan expressed much interest and asked that the phenomenon be immediately demonstrated, promising to join the movement if the test held good. Accordingly he ranged them all against a wall and ordered a squad of soldiery to take pot shots at the protesting visitors with the best European rifles. That ended the Boxer rebellion in his province.

A Man Who Dares.

Among the many good appointments made by Mayor Taylor there is none that promises more for San Francisco than that of Mr. F. G. Sanborn to succeed Hugo D. Keil as police commissioner. Mr. Sanborn has the courage of his convictions. He is a man who dares, and it may be confidently anticipated that what Theodore Roosevelt was to New York, as member of the board of police commissioners, Fred G. Sanborn will be to San Francisco. The other nominations to commissionships are excellent. This one is particularly excellent.

Not Going to Pittsburg.

There are those who are disappointed that Francis J. Heney is not going to Pittsburg. That he might go to Pittsburg was quite the mildest desire his enemies have been able to entertain regarding him. The smoke, the heat, the fiery furnaces have naturally suggested to their receptive minds his going at least to Pittsburg. Some saw in the mere idle rumor of his going to Pittsburg a strong indication that the President must be behind the graft prosecution in San Francisco and it has been wished also that the President might go to Pittsburg or some other station farther along the main line. But Mr. Heney is not going to Pittsburg. He is coming back to California to take up the good work where he left it off with an increased likelihood that he will make good in it. A health to Mr. Heney!

They Got It.

The House of Representatives demanded of the President that he forthwith furnish that maligned and ridiculed body with full information as to the foundation for his remarks concerning restrictions put upon the expenditures of the secret service fund. They got it. Those who fancied that the President was about to signalize his retirement to private life by kowtowing before the most numerous body of law-makers and craving their pardon have seen their fancy dissipate like a mirage before a tornado. The blast from the presidential megaphone cleared the legislative atmosphere and now the newest of the members of that body knows who's who. Indeed, the predicament of the house moved the house itself to laughter, while the nation roars from ocean to ocean. Oh! that Tom Dozier might tell us how, he of the peroratorial sublimity! As for Tawney, Smith of Iowa, Sherley, Fitzgerald and Joe Cannon—the old gray wolf of them all—it's no laughing matter for them. They knew why they sought to tie the President's hands and the nation now knows why. The President did a good job. Eighty-five millions of American citizens are rejoiced and only Cannon, Tawney, Sherley, Fitzgerald, Smith of Iowa and the Argonaut of San Francisco are sorry.

Advising Mr. Taft.

It is surprising what solicitude the predatory press is manifesting in regard to the heritage Judge Taft is likely to hand down to posterity as twenty-sixth President of the United States. It is pointed out to him from all points of the compass that if he persists in carrying on the Roosevelt policies and indulges himself in the Roosevelt hobby for publicity the Taft posterity will hang its numerous head in shame. The historian of the future will "throw it up to them," that he was a mere under-study of Theodore, of the "imperfect temperament," a sort of "me, too," president, lacking a mind of his own. Naturally, to save himself and posterity from contumely, President Taft should turn his back upon Roosevelt and his policies and seek advice from those who, by grace of God and the connivance of Satan, by industrious thrift and grand larceny, have come to hold in their keeping the commercial well-being of a great nation. Do these worthies look upon William Howard Taft as a spring chicken?

Let the People Vote On It.

The legislature of California is again asked to submit to the people the issue of allowing women the ballot. The California Weekly is not especially enthusiastic for this extension of suffrage—except when it notes the character and purposes of the men who vehemently oppose it. That excites a positive hankering to see the women go to the polls and vote such men out of political life. They would do it. The real issue is not whether women want the ballot or do not want it, whether they have "rights" to be upheld or "wrongs" to be redressed, what their "proper sphere" is or where it is, but whether or not the common good would be advanced by their full participation in public affairs. It has been twelve years since California has revealed in a suffrage campaign and why not let the men vote on it? It will put no end of "go" into the contest and relieve it of the monotony of job chasing. Pass the issue to the people Unprecedented But Just.

The Supreme Court of the United States denied the application of the government for a rehearing of the issues raised in the $29,000,000 rebate case. The court did not say why. It did not have to. The laity can guess the reason and not require three guesses either. It has not been the judicial custom to allow the plaintiff an appeal in a criminal action, but only the defendant, and any departure from that rule would tend to disturb that which, by immemorial usage, has become endowed with a quasi sanctity. It goes for nothing that the custom grew out of a desire to make the path of impecunious innocence as nearly thornless as possible, yet must shield the richest and greatest and most law-defying corporation on the globe. There runs a legal maxim that "when the reason for the law fails the law fails" and the Supreme Court of the United States has lost an opportunity to put that principle to good use. Meantime, the Commonwealth Club of California is striving to have the criminal procedures so amended as to give the State all the privileges in enforcing justice that the defendant enjoys in escaping it, and the United States may do well to follow California's example even though sensible to an unprecedented degree.

In Chicago a woman pestered Emerson to tell her what he thought of Goethe's "Elective Affinities," and when at last she succeeded in extorting his reluctant comment it was this: "Madam, I have never felt that I had attained to the purity of mind that qualified me to read that book."

When asked if he had read J. S. C. Abbott's Life of Napoleon, Emerson said that he had, and added: "It seems to teach that the object of Napoleon in all his wars was to establish in benighted Europe our New England system of Sunday schools."

WHY FREIGHT RATES SHOULD NOT RISE

By C. H. BENTLEY, Chairman of the California Shippers' Executive Committee.

The present controversy in the matter of freight rates arises from the fact that the Transcontinental Freight Bureau—representing practically all the railroads interested in trans-continental freight—has published a new schedule, advancing the rates on thousands of commodities both east- and west-bound.

The feeling of those believed to be responsible for the advance seems to be that in recent years freight rates have been reduced so far that railway earnings are inadequate; that for this reason, and because of hostile legislation, roads have been unable to sell bonds to cover cost of extensions and improvements; that the advance is small, and that it will make no difference to the consumer or dealer; that the advances affect "commodity" rates and no advances are made in the "class" rates; that California shippers in particular have no complaint, as their rates are very low and figure, on the long hauls, a lower rate per ton per mile than the rates in any foreign country.

In the belief that the relation between carrier and shipper is one of mutual interdependence, the shippers allege that the very general advance is arbitrary, in that the welfare of many industries has been disregarded, and that proper consideration was not shown; that it is inopportune, for the reason that trade is depressed and many of California's products are unable to find a market; that it is unnecessary for the reason that the roads chiefly involved are paying dividends, and the net earnings, as shown by the statements of the roads recently published, show an increase over corresponding periods of 1907 both before and after the beginning of the financial stringency; that on many of California's commodities the old rates must have been profitable, and that the proposed advances, made on some commodities which are unable to find a market, are unjust.

Turning back to the position of the carriers—Mr. Harriman wrote to The American Mining Congress Convention: "That as the railroads are developing, freight rates have been diminishing. Now the impression exists that the railroads are owned by a few rich men; and it is contended that because these men are rich they can stand a restriction to a small return on their investment. But the fact is that the railroads are not owned by a few rich men."

udden Changes Destructive.

In reply, it may be said that there has been no reduction in recent years on many commodities affected by the advance; in fact, some of the rates have been in effect for fourteen years, during which time the carriers required shippers to ship in much larger units in order to secure the minimum carload rates, and many other obvious economies in transportation have been effected. When a wagon road over private property has been in common use for five years, the law of California does not permit the owner of the land to stop the use of the highway. Similarly it would seem that when certain rates have been in effect for a long period, and industries have been established, and encouraged to strive for certain markets, the expectation of the rate being maintained, the shippers might well be protected against any closing of the avenues of trade, at least until the carriers demonstrate good and sufficient cause for a raise, before a competent tribunal.

As to the effect of hostile legislation and the attitude of the people discouraging investment of capital in railroad securities, it is a significant fact that the railroad bonds backed by honest assets have sold freely, even during the period of financial stringency. The sale of bonds on the New York Stock Exchange during the year of 1908 was the largest in the history of that institution, and a very large part of the sales was of railroad bonds. So far as the attitude of the people is concerned, it will be conceded that the stockholders of railroad companies are numerous, and that the enterprise of clever men should be adequately rewarded; but the fact remains that the control of the management and policy of the great railway systems is in the hands of a very few men who cannot be in close understanding or sympathy with the communities which they serve. When two or three men can arbitrarily determine the welfare, if not the commercial existence, of whole communities, the people rightfully take alarm.

Are Larger Revenues Necessary?

Mr. Ripley, the president of the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railway, says that the roads require larger revenues. What shall be said of the producers who are unable to market some of their products, even at figures below cost, and who, in some cases, are carrying stocks of the crop of 1907 as well as of 1908?

Vice-President Brown, of the New York Central, is quoted as saying that the movement to advance rates on the Eastern roads, on traffic not within the scope of the Transcontinental Freight Bureau, has been postponed for sixty days or more because of the inability of the traffic officials to inform themselves fully on the schedules, and that, as business is improving, it may not be necessary to advance rates at all. "This position," according to the New York Journal of Commerce, is the one "which the Pennsylvania Railroad has taken from the start." California shippers feel that the Western roads might well have done likewise.

One-Tenth Cent Raise Material.

To consider briefly the other features of the position taken by the traffic officials: It has been answered that the advance of only 1-10 of a cent is material, when the products are competing with similar products from other districts for markets to which the competing product already enjoys a lower rate of freight.

The reference to the fact that "class" rates have not been advanced is misleading—from the fact that nearly all the products of California products is under "commodity" rates, and most of them have been advanced.

The comparison with foreign countries, as to the cost per ton per mile, is unfair, as the conditions are so different. Having regard to the value of human life, foreign roads are not allowed to have such long stretches of single track, nor do they have grade crossings in any populous districts; their cost of construction is therefore much greater. The shipments are in smaller units, hauls are generally short, and the tariffs must accordingly bear proportionately heavier charges for receiving and delivering. Some of the foreign tariffs, moreover, include actual delivery to consignee, involving cartage and incidental expenses.

Recent Railroad Economies.

Mr. Ripley says that all materials have advanced in cost. What has he to say about fuel? Since many of the present tariffs were introduced, the cost of fuel has been discovered and put into general use on this, the western and most expensive part of the haul. Railroads were paying five to six dollars per ton for coal, now more than replaced by four barrels of oil at a cost to them of about fifty cents per barrel. It is estimated that the railroad companies are buying annually in California about 8,000,000 barrels of oil, or saving approximately four million dollars as against cost of coal used when many of the rates were put into effect. There is also reduced expense in the handling and firing.

The shippers believe that the old rates must have been profitable for the former reasons: When many of the present tariffs went into effect the roads had to figure on hauling many empty cars, as the westbound freight movement was much less than the eastbound. The movement is now more nearly balanced, and there is much smaller movement in empty cars.

The action of the Interstate Commerce law in stopping rebates and passes has brought a further saving.

The radical changes made in grades and curves, and shortening of distances would not have been made were it not that the cost of transportation would be reduced. Some materials have advanced and some wages have been increased, but it is believed that the improvement in motive power and equipment, whereby the same freight crews are enabled to move and handle a largely increased volume of traffic, will easily offset such increases. The improvement in motive power and in the construction of cars has brought large increase in capacity, and the dead weight of rolling stock handled is proportionately reduced. Within recent years, the capacity of cars has been increased from twelve to twenty and thirty tons. Formerly, shippers of dried and canned fruits were obliged to load but twelve tons to get minimum carload rate—now they are required to load at least twenty tons to the car. This is a direct saving to the carriers, and, in many respects, is to the detriment of producers and sellers.

The enormous growth in the general volume of business handled, East and West, certainly makes for reduced cost per ton of freight moved. The consolidation of the roads under one general management, as is found in the Harriman System, has brought economies in the management and operation.

Raise Without Consultation Unjust.

It may be that the roads are entitled to advance their rates on certain commodities, but it is believed that the very general advance now in effect, even on the principle of "charging what the traffic will bear" is, in many respects, unnecessary and unjust; that the mutual interdependence of carrier and shipper should have been recognized, at least to the extent of consulting producers, manufacturers, and shippers as to crop and market conditions; that manufacturers handling seasonal products should have been warned before their active season of production had been arranged.

One illustration must suffice. Rugs grown here have on hand considerable stocks of the crop of 1907 and a large part of the crop of 1908. An average selling price for a period of years would be 3 cents to 3½ cents per pound. They are now unable to get 2 cents per pound, and importations are coming into Eastern markets. The old rail rate was $1.00 per 100 pounds; it is now raised to $1.10, and serves to encourage further importations. On the other hand, the railroads haul asphaltum for forty cents—the same distance—rather than let it go by sea.

Consolidation is the order of the day, and it is a logical progressive development, for it should give increased efficiency and bring economy. The people do not want government ownership, nor do they want government control, and they do not want government legislation; and yet, if the carriers persist in what appear to be arbitrary methods against public policy, an increase of the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission will inevitably come. The abuse of power on the part of those controlling transportation will likely bring abuses on the part of the power of the people. The attempt to legislate regarding railroads, without giving due consideration to the necessities of railroad business, has been disastrous; and it is equally true that the attempt to manage railroads without regard to public policy must end in failure and disaster.

BURDEN OF OUTWORN LAWS

By DR. WILLIAM FREDERIC BADE.

The advent of the art of writing among the ancient Egyptians was an event of supreme importance in the progress of primitive culture. But in the long run it hampered them in the development of a consistent body of civil and ceremonial law. Like the vaunted laws of the Medes and Persians, what had once passed into writing was irrevocable. Though sucked down for a time in the whirlpool of human affairs, it was liable at any time to appear again upon the surface of life farther down the stream. The changing standards of the centuries, instead of displacing one another, were forced to co-exist in furious disharmony. This became the curse of Egypt—that her priests and law-makers could not forget.

In 1901 French excavators uncovered the now famous Code of Hammurabi. It is the oldest law code in the world, having been compiled 2250 B. C. There is archaeological evidence to show that the Assyrian and Babylonian lawyers studied and annotated the great code down to 500 B. C. Here also the persistence of old standards of justice amid new conditions, and the growing complexity arising from the effort to adapt old laws to new needs must have seriously impeded the administration of justice.

The same causes with their resultant consequences are found operative in the so-called Mosaic Code of the Hebrews. Fundamental elements in this code date back to the great Hebrew law-giver, twelve or thirteen centuries B. C. Numerous correspondences with the Code of Hammurabi, older by a thousand years, suggest the inclusion of some statutes that originally formed a part of legal procedure among the Semites from time immemorial.

On the other hand, a large section of the code, especially in its ceremonial portions, was formulated not much earlier than four centuries B. C., while Deuteronomy represents a body of transitional legislation connecting the earlier and the later strata. We therefore possess in this body of Hebrew civil and ceremonial law excellent material for studying historically the effect of growing legal complexity upon the administration of justice. One of the early Hebrew traditions gives an interesting account of the establishment of a judicial system. Jethro advises Moses to "provide out of all the people able men, such as fear God, men of truth, hating unjust gain . . . and let them judge the people at all seasons." Decisions rendered by these men naturally constituted precedents, which were followed in recurring cases.

While these decisions did not distinguish between civil and ceremonial practice, they describe in the first instance civil procedure, Israelitish law, therefore, just as the early common law of England was based originally upon cases and precedents rather than upon statutory enactments. It is the process, corresponding to similar developments among all primitive peoples, by which custom becomes customary law and is finally codified for use in civil cases. Since in antiquity the origin of tribal customs was as a rule referred to the tribal God, every custom was a religious custom and every law derived therefrom was a divine law. This is the reason why the administration of law in ancient times became almost exclusively a function of the priests. Thus the Deuteronomic Code, six centuries B. C., makes not the king, but a tribunal at the central sanctuary, the court of final appeal.

The increasing complexity of judicial procedure, naturally, corresponded to an ever increasing complexity of the legal system. New laws were constantly being formulated as new cases were referred to the priestly tribunal, and each new decision rendered established a new precedent. Since former written laws were retained upon the statute books, a conflict of precedents inevitably arose. Legal enactments adapted to the exigencies of nomadic life had to be amended or expanded to meet the needs of an agricultural population.

The growth of cities and commerce created situations and an environment uncontemplated by the simple laws of earlier days. The regulation which required the land to lie fallow on the seventh year, probably designed to perpetuate the old communal right of ownership, could have had no meaning among nomads. But it is an attempt to apply a principle of nomadic life to a peasant community. Most of the civil laws of Deuteronomy show that they belong to a later stage of society than the first legislation. Under the old law, for instance, seduction was treated as one of pecuniary loss to the girl's father, who is entitled to collect from the seducer the full purchase money customarily paid on the occasion of a marriage. In Deuteronomy such a case is not treated as an infraction of property rights, but of social purity, punishable by a fixed fine. Here a more advanced social order manifests itself by growth in morality and refinement.

It is as the protest of a finer feeling of morality that one must understand Ezekiel's curious assertion that Jehovah had given to Israel evil, deadly and polluting laws. For tradition claimed divine origin for the earlier legislation, but the more delicate moral sense of a later age revolted against the inherent injustice of many of its ordinances.

In these progressive efforts to realize through the amendment of earlier laws a higher ideal of justice is discovered another factor that frequently favored the mal-administration of justice, through the multiplication of conflicts between the codes. Usually the Israelites enforced the enactments of the latest code when these invalidated earlier regulations. But the retention on the statute books of laws framed in a less enlightened past provided the opportunity, seldom neglected by rascals in all ages, to invoke the sanction of law upon lawlessness. A similar result, with equally disastrous consequences, is achieved when the technicalities of legal procedure are used to defeat the ends of justice which they were enacted to serve.

In the development of Israelitish-Jewish law, the period of greatest obscurantism fell at the beginning of the Christian era. Various reformulations and amendments of the earlier codes, progressive complication of enactments, serial attempts to reconcile the irreconcilable, and the nullification of the past by the new law by trifling casuistry and technicalities, worked out their cumulative effects at this time. The purpose of a good law, whether prohibitive or mandatory, is to uphold justice and the sense of duty in civic relations. Hence the spirit of a code of laws is always reducible to a few simple principles. When the letter of the law is construed into a subversion of these principles, it is time for someone to arise who in the name of outraged justice can expose the legal phrase-mongers who "strain at a gnat and swallow a camel," who are scrupulous in the titling of "mint, anise and cummin," but omit the weightier matters of the law—justice, mercy and good faith.

It was the speaker of these words who reminded the perjurers of his time that sophistry could not free them from the sanction of an oath that laws must be respected and enforced in their primary and simple intentions when they serve the good of the social order, or be held subject to annulment when they become tools of injustice. In every age such relentless moral earnestness is needed to free the law from hampering accretions and make it stand out in its moral purposes like Tennyson's oak in December—"naked strength".

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE.

Skereed of Things.

Firs' I was skereed of lightnin' when I wusn't but a kid,
An' claimed it was too strenuous in everything it did.

I stopped beneath an oak tree once to claim its shel'r'in' care—
Well, when the lightnin's card was left the oak tree wusn't there,
An' when the neighbors picked me up I noticed I felt sick,
An' so I said I'd mosey on where lightnin' wusn't so quick.

Right then an' there I wes't'ard turned to try another State,
An' oft I said, "The soil is fine, the climate's trooly great."
An' then one day I wandered out; a blizzard wandered in,
An' when they scraped the ice from me they also scraped the skin.
They couldn't tell which part was ice an' which was me, you know.
Well, I got skereed of blizzards then, an' said I guessed I'd go.

The next place that I landed in was pleasant to the eye.
One day a little cloud appeared against the azure sky,
An' when that little cloud got done I jedged it done me harm.
Fer it had took my house away an' also took my farm.
When I was found twelve miles away, folks say that I looked wan
An' gasped, "I'm skereed of cyclones, too, so I'll meander on."

At las' I found the Golden State, where days with shining feet
Come tripping o'er the hills of dawn a smiling world to greet;
Where God seems near, so very near I almost hear His voice
That whispers me, "Look up, dear soul, and in my gifts rejoice,"
And so I linger through the days with sunshine all aglow.
Of course I'm skereed of earthquakes some—but not enough to go.

No, not enough. I see the days in gleaming ranks enrolled.
Like beads upon a rosary by angel fingers told.
No lightning's lance, no blizzard's might, no cyclone's dreadful power;
Of summer's sunshine are the days, of gold they're every hour,
An' so right there I've fixed my camp, an' little 'tis I fret.
It may be better Up Above—but I'm not ready yet.

Now That the New Year Is Here.

Don't let the fact that you greeted the New Year with a horn encourage you to take too many of them before the year is gone.
The chief thing that the New Year brings is a continuance of old duties.

There is one consolation, such as it is: If we had kept all our vows a year ago we would not have had such a splendid opportunity to "swear off" again this year.

The poorest man who bid good by to the old year was he to whose soul it had given not one upward look.

The vow that is not good on December 31st is not likely to be constructed of very substantial timber on January 1st.

You must not be slow if you wish to keep in the procession. Remember that in our grandisires' time the years traveled by ox team, but now they take the electric line.
Your friend wishes you a happy New Year, and there his part in the matter ends. It remains with you to make it happy or otherwise.

There is no stone wall between the years. The line is imaginary, and the stern realities of life find no more difficulty in crossing it than you do. The joys and sorrows, pleasures and cares, of 1909 will walk with you as old acquaintances.

A Prayer.

Give me not, Father, of Thy might,
The strength my work to do,
For mine it is to bear the load
That all my days renew.
Nay, I must go earthily way
O'er rocks of doubt and care,
Alone, unaided, yet I ask
Of Thee the will to bear.

I know the hurt of wounds that rend,
Red wounds I must endure,
Yet do I go my stumbling way,
In Thy great love secure.
Oh, sometimes it may hap that I
A brother's pain may share;
Then let me turn to him in love,
And give me will to bear.

I would not, Father, dwell alone
In fog of selfishness,
But where poor Sorrow makes her moan
Would reach a hand to bless,
And if my burden thus shall grow
With weight of others' care,
I will not ask Thy strength to aid,
But only will to bear.

The Opinions of Rufus.

If you don't b'lieve that hope springs eternal in the human breast, es the poet feller said, jest watch some fellers playin' fer a "ten full or better" on a nickel-in-the-slot machine.

I don't want to say a word 'gainst John D. Rockefeller, but I can't help inquire, if he wants to organize a deemsynary trust, w'y he don't do it. Seems to me that sech a trust with half a billion dollars backin' or so orto be middlin' effective. In answerin', don't speak oil together.

The imperative mandate, the initiative an' referendum, gover'nment control, an' them things, allers remind me of daisies on the grave of Populism. It's a beautiful idee, but it don't help the Populist corps any.

"Heaven ain't reached at a single bound." Es fer es that's concerned, neither is the other place, but I've saw some fellers that didn't seem to need more'n two or three jumps to make it.

I've bout 'ccluded that it's better to see a thing ten years too late than it is to see it ten years too early. In the latter ease you're classed as a crank, but in the former 'most everybody, bein' 'flicted much the same way, says, "Well, he is a trifle conservative, but he certainly is a fine feller."

What Ailed the Cow.

Dr. H. S. Tanner, of Long Beach, says that, as a sanitary measure, the teeth of all cows should be brushed, washed and thoroughly cleaned frequently.

Hey diddle diddle,
The cat and the fiddle,
The cow jumped over the moon.
She heard the man say
In a casual way,
"We will scour bossy's teeth this noon."

The little dog laughed,
As the bossy he chaffed;
The barnyard was all in a row.
Oh, say what you may,
There was riot that day,
But I'm blessed if I blame the cow.

Comrade of Mine.

Comrade of mine, let's sit down together
Here, as the shadows of even entwine.
We have been out in the stress of the weather;
Let's dream together, old comrade of mine,
Dream of the days when the glow of the morning
Silvered the valley and purpled the height,
Every white summit in glory adorning
With banners swung out by the Angel of Light;
And, though it now seem but a vision divine,
We dwell in that country, old comrade of mine.

Do you remember the pathway, mist-hidden,
Leading forever and ever away
Unto the country, to childhood forbidden,
Whose denizens all are awary and gray?
Ah, but we looked to that pathway with longing,
Lured by its mystery, held by its spell,
Giving but laughter to voices of warning
From those who a space in the farther land dwell.
We've trodden that pathway where shadows entwine,
And we fain would go back, old comrade of mine.

Here as we sit in the murk of the shadows
Smile on us faces of those that we knew
Ere they went out to the Upperland meadows,
Leaving us, lonely, to journey thereto.
Laughter of childhood that greeted the dawning.

Singing its music as sweetly as then—
Memory, lead us o'er hills of the morning;
Let us have part in that music again,
For ne'er is a strain so wholly divine
In all of life's symphony, comrade of mine.

Comrade of mine, let's sit down together,
Add to our visions one perfect and true,
How, when we've done with the world and its tether.

We shall turn back to the valley we knew,
Back o'er the mountains of doubt and disaster
Unto the country with morning aglow,
Where, at the word of the wonderful Master,
All we have missed we forever shall know,
Ah, at the thought of it dimming eyes shine,
And weary hearts lighten, old comrade of mine.

A certain man who had amassed wealth in divers ways (but why ask questions?) until he was recognized as a Prominent Citizen and a Higher-up, was met by a Patriotic Taxpayer.

"The Grand Jury says that you have been bribing," said the Taxpayer.

"It does," complacently responded the Prominent Citizen.

"It has traced bribe-money to your very door," the Taxpayer continued.

"It has," the Prominent Citizen replied with even greater complacency.

"I have talked with the Dear People, and none of them doubt your guilt; no, not even your friends deny it."

"True," said the Prominent Citizen, with a haughty smile.

"What are you going to do about it?"

"Do? Why, nothing except keep mum."

"Don't you mind everybody's belief in your guilt?"

"Not at all; oh, not at all, I assure you."

"But, being guilty, are you not afraid that the prosecution will terminate in your conviction?"

"Not in the least. You see, I will say nothing, and so the prosecution will have to overcome it."

"Overcome what?"

"Why, the legal presumption that recognized guilt is innocent."

And, smiling urbanely, the Prominent Citizen went on his way.

MELODIES IN ::: MOODS :::

Opportunity.

Master of human destinies am I
Fame, love, and fortune on my footsteps wait.

Cities and fields I walk; I penetrate Deserts and seas remote, and passing by Hovel and mart and palace, soon or late
I knock unbidden once at every gate!
If sleeping, wake; if feasting, rise before
I turn away. It is the hour of fate,
And they who follow me reach every state
Mortals desire, and conquer every foe
Save death; but those who doubt or hesitate,

Condemned to failure, penury, and woe
Seek me in vain and uselessly implore,
I answer not, and I return no more!

STORM IN THE MOUNTAINS.

By H. Van Allen Ferguson.

The storm sits at the organ,
Whose dusky pipes are trees,
And he sweeps the leafy keyboard
As players sweep the keys
When groined roofs of cathedrals
Shake with the harmonies.

Play on, O wild musician;
Touch the responsive keys,
And make the huge pipes tremble
With ravishing melodies!
I feel the zealot's rapture,
I know his ecstasies!

Boom, boom bells of the thunder,
As when the Host invites Man's kneeling adoration
Before the altar lights—
The mystic, waxen planets,
That wink in perfumed nights!

What are the fanes and altars
That bow before Time's rod?
This is the grandest temple
That Levite ever trod—
This vast psalm best expresses
The majesty of God!

Inquiries have been made concerning the authorship of these spiritual lines, but no one has been found who knows who H. Van Allen Ferguson is or was. Can any reader of The California Weekly throw light on the subject?]

THE WORK OF

Allen's Press Clipping Bureau FOR PUBLIC MEN

Allen's Press Clipping Bureau has now had experience in six National and five State campaigns. In this time it has had the honor of serving hundreds of public men, including members of the United States Senate, Congressmen, Governors, State Senators and Assemblymen, Mayors, and State and County Central Committees.

It has aided these men by bringing them quickly, easily, and cheaply, what the entire press has to say of them or the measures in which they are interested.

Thorough clipping service discloses the state and trend of public opinion, brings to attention false charges that should be denied, true charges that should be parried; shows what editors need argument, and what editors need encouragement—in short, aids in handling the most powerful and important of political engines, the Press.

Having three offices, a staff of thirty people, and reading and coast papers per week, we have now unsurpassed facilities for very high grade and thorough work.

We can cover counties, districts, the State, or the Pacific States.

Rates will be furnished on application.

COMMUNICATIONS.

Control of Legislators.

To the Editor, The California Weekly:

In a recent article on the Legislature you speak of the watching of that body during this session, of the "organization" men, of the control of members by the "railroad organization," and of the courage required by the legislator to stand against the conditions that confront him. You say also that "possibly it can be made more unsafe to stand against the people than to stand against the machine."

The success of the initiative and referendum in Oregon—not to mention other States—has shown that it is not only more unsafe to stand against the people than against the political machines, but that with the initiative and referendum powers in the hands of the people it is useless, vain and fruitless for legislators to attempt to stand with a machine against the people. The demonstration is complete. A political organization or a railroad or other "machine" is powerless to obstruct the will of the majority of the voters of Oregon in a matter of legislation, for with the initiative and referendum the people are supreme.

In connection with your editorial, and what you say of the political power of the "railroad organization," it is almost a shock to read Section 2 of Article I of the Constitution of California, which is:

"All political power is inherent in the people. Government is instituted for the protection, security, and benefit of the people, and they have the right to alter or reform the same whenever the public good may require it."

If what you say of the "organization" and of the "railroad machine" is true, has not the political power that is "inherent in the people" been taken away from them? If what you say is true, then it must be true that our State Government is not now used for the "protection, security, and benefit of the people," though it was instituted for that purpose. It must be admitted, then, that the "public good" requires that the people avail themselves of their "right to alter or reform" a part of their State Government.

Alteration and reformation do not mean revolution. It is not necessary to turn things upside down, but merely to turn a few things right side up by replacing in the people's hands the "all political power" that is inherent in the people. As in industry the simplest machinery that will accomplish a certain result is the best, so is it in politics, which is the science of government.

Not only should we protect ourselves against corrupt and corrupting political organizations and machines, but it is our high duty to protect our law-makers and other public servants against them. As we pray that we may not be led into temptation, it is our duty to shield our law-makers and other public servants from temptation. No less conscientiously should we take temptation away from those of our fellow citizens who use corrupt means to influence our legislators to do wrong. Is it not better to prevent evil than to punish, or attempt to punish, men who yield to temptation?

Consider, then, the positive gains to be accomplished by direct legislation through the initiative and referendum. The vote power in the hands of the people in case unwise or vicious legislation is enacted; the enacting power in the hands of the people if the legislature fail or refuse to enact needed legislation; the submission to the people by the people of proposed laws and amendments to the Constitution, and the adoption or rejection of the matters submitted to be determined by majority vote.

Our legislators will thus be freed from suspicion. Men who seek temptation will not care to go to the legislature. Political bosses and machines will be powerless to obstruct the popular will, and then we may say, with truth, that "all political power is inherent in the people."

W. G. Eggleston.

lation League of California

The Wit of Emerson.

One day when the philosopher Ralph Waldo Emerson was looking out of the window at a winter storm, he said, musingly: "I snow."

He was asked whether he approved of Platonian friendships between men and women. "Yes," he said, "but hands off."

A literary woman who had heard a report that Emerson was rejecting some of his old beliefs asked him: "But you do believe in the immortality of the soul, do you not, Mr. Emerson?" "Madam, we are not swill," was the startling reply.

They Do, Indeed.

"I understand that your wife and daughters have acquired several foreign languages." "Yes," answered Mr. Cumrox, "when they're having a good time in society or at the opera they talk French or Italian. But when it comes to telling their troubles they get back to plain English, so that I can take a hand."—Washington Star.

A HAZARD OF MINING FORTUNES

By F. L. BOSQUI.

On one of the hottest days of the Nevada mid-summer Doc Winters, proprietor of Klondyke Wells, moved a chair into the shady doorway of his saloon tent and sat down to wait for customers. In front of him spread the dusty yard, littered with broken bottles, and separated by a barb-wire fence from the road. Beyond, in the fierce glare of noon, lay the desert—a drab wilderness of sagebrush, showing on the far horizon a girdle of lonely hills and composing a picture of desolation which assuaged well, on that day and hour, with the old man's cynical, almost vicious, humor.

Doc Winters had been gloomily observing the approach of an automobile, praying that a sudden accident, or the craving of a thirsty traveler might compel it to stop at the Wells. But the big machine, crowded with passengers who, as Doc sadly perceived, gave not so much as a passing glance at the conspicuous sign over the door on which the paint was scarcely dry, dashed past and disappeared in a cloud of dust. At the same moment the disappointed landlord, bitterly mindful of dwindling profits since the motor-cars had supplanted the stage lines, rose contemptuously from his chair and mechanically took his place behind the bar. There, by way of diverting his mind from the contemplation of an unprofitable morning, he lifted a pail of water to the shelf in front of him, and addressed himself with savage energy to washing the soiled glasses left over from the day before.

It was just two months since Doc Winters and his friend Lem Stinson had left Austin for the scene of the new gold discoveries. Both men had lived half their lives at the county seat. Winters had been in turn a case-doctor, a prospector, a saloon-keeper, but in spite of his versatility seemed never to prosper. Stinson, on the other hand, was a wide-awake man of affairs and had by dint of native shrewdness got control of a lucrative livery-stable and freighting business. He also prospered in a small way, when his times were dull, and occasionally sought Doc's advice. For Winters was an older man and was fond of distributing superfluous wisdom, especially to Stinson, whom, oddly enough, he considered impulsive and visionary and in need of a restraining hand.

On this, the most extensive of their expeditions, the two men had nearly fallen out at the Wells—Lem insisting on forging ahead to Goldfield, Doc on staying behind. They had parted, however, on a friendly footing, and two days later Lem wrote his friend that he had taken a lease on a fine-looking block of ground, urging Doc with all the eloquence of his simple vocabulary to come and join him. But Doc Winters looked upon this new folly as just another instance of Lem's bad judgment. He had had some experience of mining camps. He knew how little credence was to be placed in newspaper reports of rich discoveries. Doc had unprofitably followed several Nevada booms, and had, at last, after many good many hard knocks, learned his bitter lesson. . . . So the gist of the poor scrawl he sent back to Lem Stinson was that he had decided to stay where he was—that a bird in the hand was worth two in the bush.

In the meantime Winters and his family had pitched their tents at Klondyke Wells—a name his wife had given the place in a moment of enthusiasm, excited by the discovery of a piece of float at their tent door. Doc had bought the ground from an Indian, because it had a well on it and showed signs of being mineralized. He built a crude house and barn; and in a short time the straggling desert settlement that sprang up around his corral became an important half-way station between the two big mining camps. The trader's goods came first from the crest of the hills behind Tonopah—a white speck in the great level waste that stretches away to the south as far as Goldfield. Here stage passengers stopped for meals, and horses were changed, fed and watered. A hired man looked after the cattle, while Doc himself presided over the bar. His wife and sister-in-law—careworn, haggard women who had never known anything but drudgery—slaved early and late in the eating-tent, fighting flies and heat in summer, struggling with the cold in winter.

For a time it was a profitable business—this supplying food to travelers and fodder to horses; and the bar, too, was a source of revenue, though good judges of liquor seldom patronized it a second time. But as the travel increased, the profits of Klondyke Wells seemed to fall away. Rival stage lines began to vie with each other in making good time, and drivers halted only long enough in the corral to change horses.

Then the automobiles came. "You can't make them blamed things work on these roads," said Doc Winters to his wife. She was of the same opinion; and down in their hearts they cursed automobiles and the people who rode in them.

"But I ain't afraid of 'em!" declared Winters; "we've got our claims; and when Sam and his millionaire friends down in Frisco take hold we'll have the biggest excitement right here ever seen in Nye County!"

His faith in Sam was linked with the one absorbing dream of his ambition. It was his belief, he was sure, that this influential brother would eventually supply the funds necessary to develop his claims, and fulfill those golden promises which Doc's fertile imagination had read into a single cold, curt communication from the "millionaire" stating that when he had time he would certainly look into "that Klondyke matter."

This glorified brother whom Doc had not seen for twenty years presided over a grocery store and bar in the Potosi. Sam Winters had been a valuable political service in his precinct, and had been rewarded by a grateful party with a sinecure in the City Hall. He was a heavy, lethargic man, with a red face and bloodshot eyes. Doc cherished a photograph of him, taken in a south-of-Market-street studio with curled mustaches and hair plastered down in a sleek semi-circle on his forehead. In thanking Sam for this inestimable token, Doc had announced his intention of having it enlarged in crayon. In the same letter he had said: "The claims I own here, and they're going to be a big boom in this section as soon as the bottom falls out of Goldfield, which won't be long, as I've got all the water in the country corralled and the best place for a town with lots laid out in hand you can grow anything with a little water. . . . I sent you three sacks of rock to be assayed from my claim and wish you'd let me know what your friends will do we'll have to get to work pretty quick as others is after my ground and I want to give you first show."

The assays had been made, the certificates had shown no values, and the letter remained unanswered.

Doc waited patiently for several weeks. Then one day came the news of a big bonanza "wind" on the Golden Zone, the claim Lem Stinson and his friends had leased; and a few days later Lem himself drove through the Wells on his way to the coast.

Doc saw his old partner dismount with a sensation of mingled curiosity and envy, which he tried to conceal by an overdone cordiality. Lem's story was a long one, told with much circumlocution. Doc listened absently while his eyes wandered. He was thinking not so much of what Lem was saying as speculating upon the chances where his opportunity would come. He interposed a few remarks about his claims, which—it had come over him like a flash—Lem Stinson, of all men, was now in a position to place before the world of mining investment. The trader's goods came first from the crest of the hills behind Tonopah—a white speck in the great level waste that stretches away to the south as far as Goldfield. Here stage passengers stopped for meals, and horses were changed, fed and watered. A hired man looked after the cattle, while Doc himself presided over the bar. His you put 'em up to some of the big lugs down in Frisco that you said wanted to buy out your lease?"

"I wish you'd ha' come to Goldfield, Doc," returned Lem evasively; "you'd made an everlasting barrel of money."

"That's all right," said Doc. "but I've got a mine right here, and you know it!"

"Done any work on it?" inquired Lem. "Work! why, say, look here," and Winters took down a specimen of quartz from a shelf over the bar.

Lem examined it. Doc stood off awaiting the great man's verdict with eager, blinking eyes.

"It aint half bad-looking," drawled the visitor.

Then, after an awkward pause, and with a cruel inconsequence which utterly dashed Doc's hopes, Lem suddenly recalled an exciting episode in connection with his lease, brightening over the reminiscence, and as he rattled along he quite forgot about the piece of rock and let it drop to the floor.

When Lem had gone, the proprietor of Klondyke Wells stooped down and picked up the precious specimen, gazing at it awhile tenderly before replacing it on the shelf. Then he sat down dejectedly in front of the bar, and for a good half hour suffered the acutest misery he had ever known in his life.

He finally pulled himself together, went across the room to the bar, and fortified himself with a long drink preparatory to writing for the last time to Sam.

He had already written several letters to his brother, to which no answer had come. But this was to be his supreme, final effort, his masterpiece. He closed and locked the door of the saloon, and with ink and paper before him on the card-table, settled down to his difficult task. . . . That night the letter was entrusted to a teamster bound for Tonopah, with explicit directions for registering it in the postoffice. The writer had calculated to a nicety when the answer should arrive, allowing two days for Sam to raise the necessary capital.

The harrowing suspense of that intervening week totally unitted Doc Winters for the most ordinary duties of life. He wandered aimlessly about the corral or shut himself up for hours in the saloon, refusing admittance even to his wife. But Doc was merely passing through a crisis which he considered nobody's business but his own. Over and over again he repeated to himself the most telling passages in the momentous letter which he had committed to memory. He recalled with especial satisfaction that portion of the document referring to his old partner: "I guess we've got a big boom here, Lem. . . . That just made two million out of the Golden Zone. Him and me was partners out in Austin. The Golden Zone aint far from here and Lem says this is the same identicle ore he's got in Goldfield and its the finest quartz he ever seen and he's going to take hold with me here, if you doant, but you've got first chance."

On the forenoon of the day Sam's answer was expected Winters drank more whisky than he had taken in the whole of the previous year. He hung stolidly over a card-table in the saloon until midday, nodding and staring into space, and after a final unsuccessful attempt to reach the bar, stretched out his legs, sank down in his chair, and fell asleep. There his wife found him when, a few minutes after the arrival of the mail, she burst excitedly into the room.

Doc awoke with a start, saw a letter in her hand, and revived sufficiently to tear open the envelope and scan the contents of a brief note signed by his brother's widow. Then, with a gasp, he let her throw her drop to the floor and collapsed in his chair.

The frightened woman picked up the letter and read the brief announcement of Sam's sudden death. For a few moments she stood staring down helplessly at the prostrate form

THE TRUTH ABOUT THE GATUN DAM.

A considerable part of the service which The California Weekly is to be called upon to perform for its readers will be the correction of the falsehoods published through carelessness or design as news, the effect of which must be to deceive the reading public to its hurt. The failure of the Gatun Dam, lately exaggerated in the news columns of the daily press, may have been the result of carelessness, but the chances are that it was the result of design and that the same editor of the President and his policies that lately attempted to establish the Panama Canal purchase transaction as the bottom of the unfounded rumor. The article following is from a source of unquestioned reliability and is commended to the reader for careful consideration.—Eds. California Weekly.

In the past few weeks a report regarding the failure of the Gatun Dam on the Panama Canal has been passing through the news and editorial columns of the daily papers. It is probable that no one could now trace the origin of the report, but that point is immaterial. The headlines in the papers took various forms: "Failure of the Gatun Dam," "Break in the Isthmian Wall. The Chagres River Pouring Into a Bottomless Pit," are samples of the announcements.

A report came from France stating that French engineers were certain that the Americans would never complete the canal. A wise old owl on the Portland Oregonian wrote learnedly on the failure of the dam, but trusted to the Americans to engineers to pull us through. Mr. Lincoln W. Bates, whose plan for the construction of the dam was not adopted, rushed into print and said, "I told you so." And so it went.

By this time those newspapers have kindled the succeeding day's fires and those fires have gone out as fires do. Later papers are kindling new fires and probably the report of the failure of the Gatun Dam has gone from the memory of most men. It is instructive, however, to examine this particular report.

It may be well to state by way of explanation that the construction of the Gatun Dam has not yet been started. As projected it is to be an earth fill dam which, by impounding the waters of the Chagres River will create a large lake, the lake to serve as a part of the finished canal. The lower edge of the dam, or toe as it is called, is at sea level and will be exposed to wave action from a body of water. In order to carry the water of the river around the dam a new channel or spillway is now being excavated. The material from this spillway is being dumped on the land below the future toe of the dam, partly as a protection for the toe and also to get rid of the material. It is being "wasted" to use an engineering term. The wasted material is heavy and firm and it is dumped on a soft ground. Naturally the heavy material settled as was expected to do. It is a common incident of engineering. An example can be seen on the Southern Pacific between Benicia and Suisun where the heavy fill of the railroad has squeezed out the soft mud below.

As far as can be ascertained a sudden settling of the waste dump below the Gatun Dam formed the slender base upon which was erected the inverted pyramid of lies, sensation, misinformation and misdirected comment about the failure of a dam the construction of which has not been commenced. A telegram to the engineers at Panama asking for details of the failure of the Gatun Dam would have brought the reply that the dam could not fail as it had not been built. This, however, would have spoiled the sensation. An amusing feature of this incident was the labored editorial comment as if the editorial writers really knew the news report to be true.

The work at Panama is at present the greatest engineering undertaking in progress. It is going forward without hitch under the management of capable men and will be completed and opened for traffic at a date reasonably close to that set for completion. It is a great work in which all Americans are interested and of which all will be proud. The smallest fly that ever settled upon a chariot wheel was of more consequence than are the newspapers of this country to the real progress of the work. Yet it is irritating and to a certain extent discouraging to find that when brave and capable men of this country are working under trying conditions to prosecute a gigantic work to a conclusion which will be the pride of every American, the newspapers can see in the great work nothing but a source of misrepresentation and sensation.

L'Envoi.

When Earth's last picture is painted and the tubes are twisted in drier,
When the oldest colors have faded, and the youngest critic has died,
We shall rest, and, faith, we shall need it—lie down for an aeon or two.
Till the Master of All Good Workmen shall put us to work again!

And those that were good shall be happy;
they shall sit in a golden chair;
They shall splash at a ten-league canvas with brushes of comets' hair;
They shall find real sauts to draw from—Magdalene, Peter and Paul;
They shall work for an age at a sitting and never be tired at all!

And only the Master shall praise us, and only the Master shall blame;
And no one shall work for money, and no one shall work for fame;
But each for the joy of the working, and each, in his separate star, Shall draw the Thing as he sees it for the God of Things as They Are!

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN.

One In 305 Governor Gillett's first biennial message addressed to the legislature and the people of California is a plain, business-like statement of some of the important facts about the finances and other concerns of the State government. After the usual prelude on prosperity, he plunges into a discussion of hospitals for the insane, explains that one reason for increased cost is the higher prices for food supplies, rejoices because only one person in 305 is now in such a hospital as compared with one in 281 six years ago, and indulges a proposal to erect more buildings for the Stockton, Napa and Southern California hospitals.

Mum on a Reformatory The San Francisco harbor improvements and the State Printing office are then commended and the purchase of more machinery for the latter is suggested. In the chapter of the message devoted to the prisons the subjects of pardons and paroles are discussed and modifications of the parole law suggested, including one to establish a system of paroles for county jail prisoners, which no doubt is desirable. But the governor does not commit himself on the question of the establishment of a reformatory prison, which is about the largest question connected with our penal policy.

Engineering and Architects A good deal of attention is given to the newly established State Engineering Department, for which great success is claimed on the score of economy as well as efficiency, and it is proposed that the powers of the State Engineer and his Advisory Board be enlarged in several directions. This is a matter the legislature will do well to look into, for there is no doubt that the State building law calls for some kind of overhauling. Under the present arrangement the Engineering Department manages all building operations, the State Architect being subordinate to the State Engineer. The earthquake of 1906 demonstrated that architecture without engineering is a most unstable dependence, but the new arrangement appears to have lacked as much in expedition and efficiency as it has added in strength.

Revised by Its Friends On the subject of railroads the governor renews the recommendation made by the attorney general that the legislature shall now, after thirty years of inaction, proceed to "pass all laws necessary for the enforcement" of the section of the Constitution with reference to discrimination in fares and freights. He also suggests a more stringent pass law. Apparently this plan of railroad legislation is now "program" and will be put through, though when the same thing was advocated, only more vigorously, by Governor Pardee, in his retiring message, it was not program and was ignored. Events have been moving in the last two years, and it may be good policy to have the railroad laws, like the tariff laws, "revised by their friends." We may be sure that, under this system, there will be only such laws enacted as the railroads wish to obey or wish to have others obey. It will be so easy!

Think Hard On This Next in the list of topics discussed comes good roads, and Governor Gillett renews his proposal for the issue of $18,000,000 of road bonds, the State to pay the principal and the interest to be taken care of by the counties through which the roads are built.

No Politicians Need Apply The work of the joint legislative committee on banking is endorsed and stricter laws called for to regulate reserves and loans. The governor appears to have changed his mind relative to the need for having the banking department headed by a banker. When it was first broached he pool-pooled at it.

Last Worse Than First A State farm and school for orphans, especially for orphans who have been inmates of institutions partly supported by the State, is one of the proposals to which the governor has committed himself in this message. He wants $125,000 appropriated to buy a farm and a commission to prepare plans. He believes such a school would have from five to seven hundred in attendance and while admitting that the expense would be large, asserts that the school would be worth more than it would cost. Before acting on this suggestion of his excellency it will be well to pause and think. The condition of dependent childhood is had enough at best but entrusted to the care of a lot of place hunting politicians selected by Hatton, Parker and Burke their last condition would be worse than their first. California should not hurry to put this scheme through.

No Use for Politicians Neither in this chapter of the message nor in any other is there anything to show that in preparing his recommendations on penal and charitable institutions the governor took counsel with the State Board of Charities and Corrections. What is that board for? Governor Gillett signalized, as well as scandalized, his administration by relieving two non-political humanity-loving members of the State Board of Charities and Corrections in order to afford "recognition" to two "organization" politicians. One of these has rendered distinguished services to the cause of charity and correction by failing to attend a single meeting of the board. The other is not so bad, but is a board chair freed from political influence and repression, should become a power for good in State affairs by standing between the people and officialdom, to watch, advise and report to the public. No politician has any use for such a board and Governor Gillett is a politician.

River Navigation The governor recommends, and rightly enough, an appropriation of $400,000, to match an equal appropriation expected from Congress, for improvements of river navigation, chiefly, of course, for the Sacramento and San Joaquin rivers. This is hardly a drop in the bucket compared with what is required when nation and State shall take the work seriously in hand, leave politics out and get down to business. It has not been forgotten that Governor Gillett manifested his interest in the river problem by removing from office an engineer in charge who knew the rivers as some men know their back yards and put in his place a really fine fellow as innocent of river knowledge in California as the upper reaches of the Amazon or Yang-tze-Kiang, and he did it merely because the engineer in office chanced to be a Democrat. That wasn't a fault. It was at the worst only an infirmity which in no wise incapacitated him for useful service. Until our rivers can be taken out of "organization" politics it is of comparatively little use to put money into them—except where Uncle Sam has the exclusive spending of it.

Please Try Again Two years ago the legislature enacted a standard insurance policy which was not approved for the reason that the governor did not think the bill a good one. He now invites the legislature to try again, which it will probably do if someone will kindly show it how. The task is not a real easy one.

Strong for Tax Reform On the important subject of tax reform the governor comes to the front with a strong indorsement of the work of the State Tax Commission, which body he wants continued, and he asks the legislature, also, to submit a new amendment to the Constitution which the commission may prepare on the lines of the old one which was voted down at the November election. This excellent measure was voted down partly because the voters did not quite understand it, partly because of the narrow-minded self-interest of certain municipalities, but perhaps mainly because the Southern Pacific political bureau seemed to be for it. A little judicious opposition to the measure on the part of Mr. Herrin and his push might help it another time when it comes before the people. However, this time, it is quite certain that the proposed plan for reforming our tax system is for all concerned, although not improbable that the amendment as submitted may be improved. The principle of the amendment that was beaten was sound and will some day be adopted by all the States in the Union.

Plenty of Pardons No one will claim that Governor Gillett has been austere and unrelenting in relation to pardoning persons who have been sequestered from time to time for the public's well-being. His message shows that he has granted 48 pardons within the two years against twelve granted by former Governor Pardee during his first two years of office, and he has granted 84 commutations to fifteen granted during the same length of time by Pardee. There is a soft spot under the governor's ribs which perhaps does more credit to his sympathies than to his judgment.

Gillett is No Hughes Those who look through the governor's message for some expression regarding the race-track issue will look in vain. It isn't there. Possibly he had no heart for the issue having been raised or, possibly he had heard that the Herrin "organization" had promised to keep hands off, stand aside and watch the fight. However it came about, there is nothing in the message to indicate that a great reform movement, now sweeping over California, having in view the prevention of the demoralization of many, is of the smallest interest to the Governor of California. Governor Gillett is, in this particular, about as unlike Governor Hughes as civilization is unlike civic ignorance and the people of California are likely to note the difference.

Legislature Ready As the daily press will have told our readers, the legislature of California is organized and ready for business. Phil Stanton was made Speaker of the Assembly. He had to wait two years for the honor but it came at last. One reason given for his having to wait was that the Hermites felt insecure and uncertain as to what Stanton might do. They are likely to feel more so by the time this session is over, but they may have their rights considered. They are not more uncertain of Stanton than he is of himself. If the bits get into his teeth and he feels a good grip on them he is as likely as not to make a dash for liberty merely because he feels like it.

Wright or Leavitt, Which? It has been decided by resolution that the Senator Leroy Wright of San Diego, and not Frank Leavitt of Alameda, is to be the Republican floor manager of the State Senate. Perhaps so. Everybody will know more about it later, but the management of that body is not to be determined by resolution. Leavitt is a good deal stronger (and worse) man than Wright and is likely to have Lieutenant Porter and Eddie Wolfe on his side. They are birds of a feather. "Wright is organization," too, but so is nearly all San Diego, thanks to the inerness of patriotism and the alertness of bargain counter politics, and Wright has trained with the "organization" more from association than from choice. The public will wish to see Wright win, but it will be surprised if he does not have to play second fiddle, despite the efforts of the better element to back him.

The Graft and Allied Cases.

Because of the holidays, the graft and allied prosecutions on both sides of the bay have reached a time of rest between more strenuous labors. To be sure, there have been motions, orders, arrangements for appeals, etc., some of them of no slight importance in their bearing upon the outcome of various cases, but of actual trials there have been none.

Over in Oakland, Peter Claudianes, having been duly convicted and sentenced, as heretofore reported, has been hustled into Coleman 1st to file a bill of exceptions pending his arrangements for the appeal which he, or his attorney, has decided upon. That he has no large faith in the outcome of such an appeal is suggested by the fact that he has waived delay in the execution of his sentence and has been taken to San Quentin prison, there to await the result of his attorney's efforts in his behalf.

John Claudianes, who, like his brother Peter, was indicted for dynamiting the residence of former Supervisor James L. Gallagher, appeared before Judge Waste on December 31st to have his case set for trial. His attorney, Nat Coghlan, moved for a delay on the ground that as he (Coghlan) was a member of the State legislature he could not act in the trial until that body had adjourned. Such a postponement being agreeable to District Attorney Donahue, as the new trial jury is not available now, but will be later, the motion was granted and the case was set for the second of next April.

The unforeseen not intervening, Patrick Calhoun will be brought to trial next Tuesday under an indictment charging him with offering a bribe to former Supervisor Nicholas for his vote for an overhead trolley franchise for the United Railroads. He appeared before Judge Lawlor last Monday and, through his attorney, A. A. Moore, asked for an immediate trial. The request was accompanied by a suggestion that the defense felt it could not have a fair trial before Judge Lawlor. Being then asked by the court whether this meant that there would be a motion for a change of venue, Attorney Moore responded that there would not, that what Calhoun desired was an immediate trial and that he would take advantage of no technicalities; a promise which, if carried into effect, will shorten the trial in a degree to amaze those who have watched the development of other graft cases, that of Abraham Ruef, for instance. In order to give Mr. Heney, who, with Assistant District Attorney O'Garra, will conduct the prosecution, time to travel here from the East, the case was, with open opposition on the part of the defense, set for trial on the date above given.

E. A. S. Blake, who was convicted of an attempt to bribe a prospective juror in the Ruef case, was, on December 31st, sentenced by Judge Dunne to four years' confinement in San Quentin prison. Efforts were made to secure a light sentence, but Judge Dunne held to his own idea of the enormity of the offense, and the penalty inflicted was but one year less than the maximum.

The trial of Adolph S. Newburgh, indicted with Frank J. Murphy and E. A. S. Blake for attempting to bribe John Martin Kelly, a prospective juror in the Ruef case, began last Tuesday. It will be remembered that Blake was convicted under this indictment and later confessed his guilt, asserting that he had acted in his attempt at bribery on the suggestion of Newburgh and Murphy, who were Ruef's attorneys. Blake's conviction was followed by the trial and acquittal of Murphy, which the District Attorney, as well as many others, held to be a miscarriage of justice. Now comes the trial of Newburgh, in which the prosecution will be conducted by District Attorney William H. Langdon and his assistant, William H. Hoff Cook. At this writing the selection of jurors is in progress, a special venire of one hundred having been summoned, and it probably still will be so when this issue goes to press.

Abraham Ruef's recent efforts to delay the deserved fate which awaits him have taken the form of a motion to be allowed 120 days in which to prepare and file a bill of exceptions. The prosecution, that thirty days, which it would be ample time for this purpose, and the court notified the defense that reasonable time would be allowed. It was expected that the matter would be decided on the seventh instant.

The cases against Tiry L. Ford, Thornwall Mullaly, William M. Abbott, Abraham Ruef and Eugene Schmitz, which were set for trial before Judge Lawlor last Tuesday, were continued until February 2nd.

of her husband, groping for words to express her mingled pity and contempt, yet dreading his waking wrath. She shuddered as she saw him slowly move, then feebly clutch the arms of his chair and raise his bleared eyes to hers. Not finding the sympathy he needed, he commanded in a thick voice, "You better get out; you can't do no good here!"

She turned and went meekly out of the tent; but Doc Winters stayed there the rest of the day, with a bottle on the table in front of him, doing what he could to assuage the misery of his defeat and despair.

At the end of the following week another letter came.

"You read it," said Doc submissively to his wife; "I can't seem to gather my wits. Fact is, I aint been worth shucks sence I took that spell."

"Why, it's from Lem Stinson and marked the Grand Hotel!" exclaimed Mrs. Winters proudly, after an interval employed in wiping and adjusting her glasses.

There was another long pause while her eyes moved slowly and laboriously along the almost illegible lines.

"He says if you'll go back to Austin he'll give you the liveliest stable business and his house to live in, and then he says, 'I guess I don't have to live in Austin any more. Frisco's good enough for me. I'm putting up at the Grand; and next week I'm off to New York to see the sights with Joe Brady. You remember little 'Faro' Brady who used to go round people's back yards in Austin getting jobs sawing wood. Well, Doc, in two months he made a clean two hundred thousand cash in his Goldfield lease. Sorry you can't go along. But that stable's a good business, Doc. You stick to it.'"

And this time Doc Winters followed his friend's advice.

Blaine on Garfield.

Blaine's oration on Garfield ended with this famous passage:

As the end drew near his early craving for the sea returned. The stately mansion of power had been to him the wearisome hospital of pain, and he begged to be taken from his prison walls, from his oppressive, stifling air, from its homelessness and its hopelessness. Gently, silently, the love of a great people bore the pale sufferer to the longed for healing of the sea to live or to die, as God should will, within sight of the heaving billows, within sound of its manifold voices. With a wan, fevered face, tenderly lifted to the cooling breeze, he looked out wistfully upon the ocean's changing wonders, on its far sails, on its restless waves rolling shoreward to break and die beneath the noonday sun; on the red clouds of evening, arching low to the horizon; on the serene and shining pathway of the stars. Let us think that his dying eyes read a mystic meaning which only the rapt and parting soul may know. Let us believe that in the silence of the receding world he heard the great waves breaking on a farther shore and felt already upon his wasted brow the breath of the eternal morning.

Paternoster.

Few readers know that the word "paternoster," so frequently used in novels of the Middle Ages, refers to the Lord's Prayer in Latin as used in the Catholic ritual. The full prayer follows:

Pater Noster qui es in coelis, sanctificetur nomen tuum, adveniat regnum tuum; fiat voluntas tua sicut in coelo et in terra. Panem nostrum quotidianum da nobis hodie: et dimitte nobis debita nostra sicut et nos demus debitoribus nostris. Et ne inducas in tentationem sed libera nos a malo.

Amen

Boys.

At a recent Bombay school board examination, one of the tasks was an essay on boys, and this was one of the compositions just as it was handed in by a girl of twelve:

"The boy is not an animal, yet they can be heard to a considerable distance. When a boy hollers he opens his big mouth like frogs, but girls hold their tongue till they are spoken to, and then they answer respectable, and tell just how it was. A boy thinks himself clever because he can wade where it is deep, but God made the dry land for every living thing, and rested on the seventh day. When the boy grows up he is called a husband, and then he stops wading and stays out at nights, but the grown-up girl is a widow and keeps house."—Pittsburg Bulletin.

WALLED religiously apart from the outer world, the nodding blossoms in the sacred garden of Santa Barbara Mission flourished in peace and profusion and ran color-riot. Came, of a sudden, a presence into the garden—a dainty, feminine presence. Gossamer-shod, she flitted through an archway and across the dried clay with twinkling step so light that the drowsy gardener noted not its advent. Bright-plumaged as the humming-bird was this little maid. Her short silky skirt revealed a pair of slim and graceful ankles, a filmy robe, clinging to her slender figure, her soft brown hair fell in clustering curls and brushed her olive cheeks, her lips were a pouting scarlet line, and her eyes, long-lashed and heavily-lidded, flashed in derision at the oblivious gardener as, with a swish of rustling garments, she seated herself upon the bench.

For ten full minutes she nestled there watching, with languid interest, the antics of two white butterflies who fluttered crazily from flower to flower. Suddenly she scurried behind the bench and dropped from view as came another presence into the garden. A presence full of years and bowed by time. A presence in priestly robes, with tansured poll, on whose forehead the scanty locks were silver-gray; who leaned upon a staff and tottered feebly toward the bench with free hand outstretched and eyes dim as fury. The old priest, placid in senility, leaned back upon a bench and nodded in the shade.

A brown head peeped over the high stone back, a small hand stole timidly forth and possessed itself of the white cord-end that depended from the padre's waist, then pulled with gentle pressure, until, in some small wonder, he fumbled at his robe and found his girdle drawn taut. He followed its length with shaking fingers until they closed upon the girl's soft hand; then she laughed happily and, running from behind the bench, nestled close beside him, a rare smile lighted his face and the old eyes peered lovingly into hers.

"Inez, mujerita; what do you here?" he questioned lowly.

"My father is in Santa Barbara, to collect the final payment for the hides," she said. "But where is your duenna?"

"Pouf! Donna Maria takes her siesta at the casa of the Padres, and I—stole away to see you, padre mio." A hand, light as a rose-petal, touched his withered cheek, and he chuckled pleasantly.

"You were ever a wayward chit, even when you were a toddling babe; but now you are let me see—a senorita of eighteen. Why, you are a woman. I truly named you 'mujerita.' You must hasten back to the casa, or Donna Maria will be roundly scolded by your father should he return and find you gone."

She laughed contemptuously. "There is small fear, Padre Gabriel. He is busy with the Americanos. For the hide-drogher sails on the evening tide, and there are many compliments to be passed and much of arguement to be drunk before they part."

He stroked her hair gently. "Come, come; little one," he said, "take my blessing, and leave me to my garden. It will be better so. But return with Donna Maria to-morrow when you may stay longer, and of this visit she need never know."

"Why, Padre Gabriel, you countenance a sin," she chided mockingly. "But you cannot drive me from you. I came not for your blessing, but for your advice."

"For my advice?" incredulously. "What troubles your pretty head, child? Why, Inez, is not your marriage with Don Pablo arranged?"

"Yes. But I do not love him, and I need your help."

"Within the Mission walls, my daughter, there is little known of love," he said solemnly, as he lifted his hand in a protesting gesture. "But surely Donna Maria understands such things far better than his child."

She bit her lip impatiently. "Yes, yes, padre. But Pablo de Reaga is almost forty, and, as you say, I am a 'little girl.' Besides, he has a hacienda and raises vegetables and such nasty things, and is fat, and beats his servants, and—and, perhaps, would beat his wife; and I am a daughter of a ranchero, and I love horses and cattle, and despise vegetables!" She stamped her little foot. "It might have been possible six months ago, but since the hide-drogher came and the Americanos, I—I—" She buried her face suddenly on his shoulder and a sob burst from her lips. Slowly he lifted her head, a world of trouble in his old eyes.

"Who is the man?" he questioned simply. "Blush-roses mounted to her cheek. 'I did not say there was one, padre. But I must be honest. I have no friend but you; the others would laugh at me. I hardly know myself, whether it is love, but ever since Senior Marston, the agent of the great ship, came to see my father, my heart beats strangely, and though he is not of our race or our religion and wears strange clothing, queer buff trousers and a great coat with shiny buttons, his face is handsome and his eyes so blue and so honest when they look into mine that I am almost afraid of him.'"

"Have his eyes looked often into yours, mujerita?"

"I—I fear they have; for he spends much of his time at the rancho, and no one seems to notice us. And when we held the fiesta and a fandango in his honor, Don Pablo thought to shame him before my people and proposed that he take part in our games; and when he assented and fell from his horse as he tried to pluck the buried chicken from the dust and was rolled over and over and almost trampled upon by the cruel hoofs, he only laughed good-naturedly at the gibes of the caballeros, while he brushed himself off with his sonbrero, and quite won the friendship of all save Don Pablo."

"And he has won your love?"

"Nay; I did not say so. He has taught me many words of his queer language, and strange to say—'love' was one of the first I learned." She frowned pensively. "But he has said nothing to me, save with his eyes, and I fear to read their message. And his ship sails before midnight," she sighed.

"He is not of your religion, my daughter."

"Therefore I sought you, padre. I know my soul is all in all to you. When I was a tiny child you were my comforter. Is it right to deny one's heart for one's soul's sake?"

"These are strange thoughts, child."

"They mean so much to me. I need your counsel."

"But this man has not spoken to you!"

"No."

"And may not?"

"Your words are true. But my heart tells me that he will seek me before he sails."

"Your body is so a shell; your soul is everlasting. Look to your soul!"

She grasped his arm tightly. "Oh, Padre mio, have you never known what it is to love, to see a beautiful thing that means all in all to you, one with whom you might trust your happiness till the end of your days? And then, when every wakeful moment is filled with thoughts of that one, and every dream besought, your fate descends upon you, and you are swept away in the arms of a great, fat, ugly beast? Is it right? It is my happiness I plead for, Padre. Surely one poor little soul cannot matter so much in this great church of ours. Cannot my sin be forgiven?"

His form straightened for a moment, and in his wrist there seemed to beat the pulse of sympathy.

She drew his arm closer to her. "It is in your power to give me the power to doom me to an age-long death in life, for I register my vow to the Holy Mother of God that I will obey your will."

She made the sign of her faith, and the aged priest's brow contracted in deep troubled lines ere he answered her.

"Your soul is in your keeping, daughter," he muttered at length. "I will say no more."

She sighed in doubt. "And you will help me if the need arise for strength?" she whispered.

"Aye. If the need arise."

He laid his hand upon her forehead, but even as she raised her eyes she beheld the figure of an Americano standing in the archway, with respectful head uncovered as he beheld the old priest and the maiden on the bench.

She rose quickly. "It grows late, and I—I must return to Donna Maria," she stammered, and left the Padre calling in bewilderment to Pedro Sais. But the gardener had gone. The good ship Pilgrim lay in the open roadstead two miles from shore, with forty thousand hides "steved" into her hold awaiting the return of Marston and the ebbing of the tide.

Roderick Marston, supercargo of the Pilgrim, was a child of wealthy and devoted parents, who, when warned by their family physician that their son's eyesight and his health hinged on a sea-voyage and the abandonment of his college course, exerted their influence to procure him a berth on the hide-drogher. The trip had made a man of him, and he had become the physical equal of many of the hands before the mast. And now, though a year and a half from home, he was loath to return, for his brain tossed with the vision of Inez Carillo. He had escaped from his companions when his business with her father was ended, and had lusted them with many toasts yet to be drunk to the health of his captain and the hospitable ranchero. A piece of silver unsealed a wide-eyed Indian's lips. Thereby he learned that Inez had gone toward the Mission, and he hastened after her.

Her heart leapt wildly when she saw him in the archway, and as she left the dim-eyed padre on the bench and ran to his side, she felt that he had but to stretch forth his arms and she would tumble into them, soul and all. But instead, he fingered his sonbrero nervously. "Will you walk with me, senorita?" he stammered.

She nodded in assent and laid her finger on her lips, touching his wrist as they tiptoed softly through the deserted corridor.

They left the Mission and turned toward the rolling foothills, forsaking the little path that the padres used and passing into the open fields, where, amidst the drying alfalfa, mustard-clover and wild pea vines bloomed; where the silver-grass shimmered; where rank tarweed streaked her skirt, and proud cyclamens bobbed regally above the fox-tails and the timid larkspur.

Dim in the distance reared the gray peaks of the Sierras. The sun mounted, and behind it complained the restless sea. The sun was nearing the horizon when they came to a creek spanned by a rustic bridge and bordered by a small grove of oaks from whose branches depended long gray streamers of Spanish moss, by fragrant bay-trees and an occasional madrone.

They crossed the bridge, a single rough-hewn plank, guarded by a rail of boughs, that swayed rottenly beneath their feet, and as they turned on the farther bank, met and turned to the girl, a light of determination in his eyes.

"Inez, I want you for my wife," he said bluntly. "I know that my speech is harsh in your ears, that I seem strange and uncouth as compared to the gray caballeros of your native land; but surely you will find happiness in my great love." He faltered, and the girl bent her head, while a happy sigh escaped her lips.

Emboldened, he seized her hand. "Tell me that you love me, queridissima," he pleaded. "Surely I have not read the message of your eyes in vain. I have loved you so long it has seemed an eternity to me. I tried to teach you my tongue, and thereby lost my heart. Will you not give me yours in return?"

Her hand nestled close in his, and she looked up shyly. "You taught me the words yourself, Señor Marston. It is your own fault. I will try to say them in English—I love you," Rodrigo mio.

With a cry of happiness he drew her to him. Her head sank obediently on his shoulder, and her bosom throbbed in unison with his beating heart as, for a worldless interval, they stood beneath the trees. Slowly he raised her head at last. Slowly he bent his own; and, as their young lips met, the spell of Paradise was cast upon the grove.

She closed her eyes, awed by the blue ones above that gleamed with a desiring fire, and dwelt in blissful silence for a space. But, at last, she shuddered and drew herself away, gently disengaging his arms as she sighed in doubt. A sudden evil memory filled her brain, and, standing dejectedly before him, she spoke lowly:

"I had forgotten my soul!"

"Your soul?" He stared in bewilderment.

"Yes, my soul, Rodrigo. We love, but we can never marry." His lips opened in fierce protest, but she silenced him with a gesture. "You are not of my faith, and it is an unforgivable sin to wed outside the church. But I will love you forever, Rodrigo; even though I shall be married to a man I hate. Your kiss is sacred, and Don Pablo can never rob me of it." Then a ray of hope struck her. "Unless you might change your religion for mine, querido," she faltered, "and stay here in California when the great ship sails."

He groaned in despair. "It would be impossible. Even though I might forsake my faith, it would not avail. Your father and de Reaga are all-powerful. The Pilgrim could scarce round the western headland before I would be spirited away on some trumped-up charge, and they would soon marry you to the man of Don Sebastian's choice. No; no. If you love me as you say you do you must sail with me to Boston, where my parents will receive you as you deserve and you will be rated an honest lady in the land."

Her eyes flashed. "You speak not of marriage, now!"

"Why, the Captain can marry us, querido." She stamped her foot in rage. "So! So! I would carry me away without the plighting of our vows! You would prison me on this ship where all are strangers to me! You pretend a great love: but you would have me forsake my people and go into an unknown land without even the blessing of a priest. Do you rate me a wanton, that you hold me in such scorn? No! No! No! No! My soul is in my keeping, and it shall be saved. Go, Señor Marston! Go, before I spit upon you and tell you that my love has changed to hate!"

He protested wildly, but she was deaf to his pleas, and at last, in hopeless agony, he turned and stumbled blindly upon the bridge, while she drew her rebozo proudly about her shoulders and prepared to follow him.

But of a sudden, as he strode heedlessly across the swaying plank, she screamed in fright, for it cracked sharply and, as she clutched futilely at the rail, broke in the middle and dropped him into the water below. He sank to his shoulders, then floundered out upon the opposite bank, dripping and miserable, as she stared at the girl across the creek, who, with hands clasped to her bosom, sobbed in fear.

But even as he looked she screamed again. "El Toro! Dios mio, Rodrigo! El Toro!" A hoarse bellow sounded from beyond the fringe of trees. He became dimly aware of a huge black body rushing toward him, and he instinctively swung himself up into the branches of a madrone just as a pair of sharp horns were thrust into the trunk a foot below his dangling limbs.

The girl called to him wildly, and the bull turned angry eyes toward her. In the creek was a saving barrier and he resumed his attack upon the tree. Rodrigo was by this time ensconced in safety on a higher limb, but the senorita's plight filled him with dismay.

"Inez," he said deliberately, "you must return before sunset to the Mission, or Don Pablo will never marry you, even though you beg him to upon your knees."

She sobbed in affright. "But I—I cannot cross the creek."

"Listen. I will drop down from my tree and draw the bull away. If I dodge from trunk to trunk until we are out of view you may creep along the bridge and easily slip down the broken rail. It will not fall with you, and the end is but a yard from the bank. You will wet your ankles, but, with Dona Maria's help, no one need ever know." He drew off his coat and prepared to descend. "Buenos noches, querida, and good-bye."

But as he grasped the limb, intending to swing himself to the ground on the other side of the tree, she cried out in protest. "No; no; Rodrigo! I forbid you. You risk your life, and I will never marry you if you leave the tree."

He laughed wildly, and his heart leapt with hope. "Then I will stay here forever, sweetheart."

"No; no; I did not mean that," she stammered. "I—I hate you!"

Without a word he threw his leg over the branch and began to scramble down the trunk, while the great beast snorted angrily beneath him.

"For the love of God, Rodrigo, listen!" she cried again, and he paused in his descent. "Listen! I do love you, and I will always love you. When I said I hated you, I lied. I will wait here all night, if need be, and when they come for us I will go to the ship with you and you may take me where you will. I will forsake my father and my country and my church," she sobbed, "all for you, Rodrigo—all for you. May God deal with you as you deal with me!"

She sank weakly down upon the bank, and through sheer happiness he flicked his coat at the bull who caught the garment upon his horns and, with a quick wrench, tore it from his grasp, boring it viciously into the earth and tearing it with angry hoofs.

"The Pilgrim will not sail to-night, querida," he said, "unless a miracle is performed."

But even as he leaned against the trunk to seek some comfort for his hours of siege a hoarse shout fell on his ear, a Mexican herder, brandishing a pitchfork, appeared at the edge of the grove, and El Toro was driven ignominiously from the field.

Half an hour later a man in wet and clinging garments, with a tattered coat slung over his shoulder, and a very humble maiden stood before a bowlered priest in the sacred garden of the Mission.

"You must marry us, Padre Gabriel, and quickly," said the man, in commanding tones.

"But you are a heretic; and the senorita is bound to another!"

"I will embrace your faith. And the girl shall be bound to no one but me."

"But the church! It is not regular. No, no; your conversion is but a trick. I will not risk her soul."

"Padre," said the girl lowly, "almost within the hour you vowed to help me should the need for strength arise. That need has arisen even now. The need for strength to leave behind all that I hold dear, my father, and my people, and—you. This man's command is my will, for I love him with all my soul, and without him my soul may burn for aught I care."

He raised his hands in feeble protest.

"Listen, Padre. If you do not marry us here I will, with him unmarried, and on your own head will be the burden of my soul's destruction."

Shocked, he mumbled in despair, then lifted his hands, and as they bent their knees before him on the sun-baked clay of the garden his gray, drawn face showed wanly in the afterglow.

A NEW DISCOVERY

What appears to be a very important discovery has been made by a chemist in San Francisco. The proximate principles of a vegetable drug have been found which seem to act as if by magic in curing catarrh in all its forms. This new compound is sold under the name of Mem-bro-tone. A number of cases have been absolutely cured by one or two applications. More malignant or chronic cases are usually cured in from one to three weeks. This new discovery for catarrh is especially recommended for chronic inflammation and thick mucus discharge from the nasal organs. By stopping this discharge it seems to cure coryza, catarrh of the head and stomach, frontal headache, and in many instances has restored the hearing and sense of smell.

The twilight had not yet fluttered into darkness when a sudden turmoil disturbed the holy tenants of the Mission, and the unbarring of its portal revealed the perturbed countenance of Don Sebastian Carillo, along with Don Pablo, Dona Maria, Tia Dolores, and a half-dozen servants of the casa.

Padre Gabriel hobbled slowly on the scene, and was besieged with eager questions. When at last the ranchero came to realize the true state of affairs he tore his beard in rage.

"I will board the ship of this pig of an Americano," he shouted, "and you will take the wayward chit to be your wife even yet, Don Pablo—if you still desire her," he added ruefully.

Padre Gabriel raised his quavering voice. "She is wedded to the man of her choice, Don Sebastian," he said, "and the holy ties of Mother Church may not be sundered."

Feebly he made the sign of the cross, and the Mexicans dropped to their knees upon the tiles, while Dona Maria wept softly, and the ranchero, with a muttered imprecation, passed out into the night.

The Emptied World.

I loved you so, no day, no hour
You did not fill! Before the flower
You went. You were the bud's pale dream;
And in the flower you bloomed supreme.
You were all times, and every place
Where beauty was—was but your face!
I loved you so, your voice I heard
If 'twas the carol of a bird,
Or waters murmuring afar,
Or whispered sweets the evening star
Draws forth from all the dreaming world
Of folded nest and bee flower furled—
I loved you so!

I love you so, that hours and days
No longer are, save as a maze
Through which, as through the solid night,
I push to find some point of light!
Nor differing seasons longer are,
Nor bud, nor flower, nor ever star,
Nor answering twilight, nor sweet sound
Of tide called waters seaward bound.
I love you so, that everywhere
Is empty of you—earth and air! * * *
And yet though you are all withdrawn—
And yet though you are dead and gone,
I love you so!

Mile Records on Land.

For convenience in comparing speeds made on land by various vehicles as well as by horses and men the following table of mile records has been prepared by a writer in the Metropolitan:

Electric locomotive, 27 seconds, 1903.
Automobile, 28½ seconds, 1906.
Steam locomotive, 32 seconds, 1893.
Motor paced cycle, 1 minute 61.5 seconds, 1904.
Bicycle, unpaced, 1 minute 49.2.5 seconds, 1904.

Running horse, 1 minute 35½ seconds, 1890.
Pacing horse, 1 minute 55 seconds, 1906.
Trotting horse, 1 minute 58½ seconds, 1905.
Man skating, 2 minutes 36 seconds, 1896.
Man running, 4 minutes 12½ seconds, 1887.
Man walking, 6 minutes 23 seconds, 1890.

It will be observed that the difference between the locomotive and the automobile is trifling. For 100 miles the record of the steam locomotive is much better than that of the auto. However, both the electric locomotive and the auto may be expected to show further improvement, as their development is incomplete, while their steam brother has attained about the limit. The horse racing and foot racing records added to the table were all made in recent years. Evidently we breed better and train better than ever before.

Personalia.

The amusing "Letters of a Japanese School-boy," appearing serially in "The Saturday Evening Post," are written by Wallace Irwin, formerly of San Francisco.

Frank A. Nankivell, whose pictures adorn the pages of most of the Eastern humorous papers, was joint-founder with Robert Davis and Alice Rix of "Chic," a paper published in San Francisco several years ago and well-descried by the world which sounds just like the title—when Frenchly pronounced.

Thomas Dixon, Jr.'s, latest novel, "Comrades," is a romance of California and a commendation of certain of the author's ideas of Socialism.

A sale of the dramatic relics of Edwin Booth took place in New York last month, and netted $20,300. David Belasco and Julia Marlowe were heavy purchasers of stage properties.

The Annie Russell is the newest theatre in New York, to be built this spring by Wagners & Kemper as the home playhouse of Miss Russell. It will adjoin the Lambs Club on West Forty-fourth Street, directly opposite Belasco's Stuyvesant Theatre, and will cost about $300,000.

John Mason, now starring in "The Witching Hour," and by many considered the best actor of contemporaneous middle-aged characters on the American stage, is a son of the founder of the famous Mason & Hamlin organ business.

The haunting sorrow in the life of J. M. Barrie, the author of "Peter Pan," is the fact that he is childless.

Mark Twain has incorporated himself and has assigned all his property rights in his pen-name to the company, in hopes of perpetuating his children's right to collect royalties from the publication of his books after the copyright expires.

The author of "Who's Who—and Why," in the "Saturday Evening Post," is Samuel G. Blythe, who resigned $12,000 a year as Washington correspondent of the New York "World" to become a staff writer for the Post.

The author of the famous Wentworth series of mathematical textbooks bequeathed a fortune of $700,000 to his son, George Wentworth, who inherited also his father's mathematical genius, and who revises the new editions of this series, besides writing new books of like kind.

Helen Keller's teacher and guardian, Miss Sullivan, is now the wife of John Albert Macy, one of the editors of "The Youth's Companion."

John Fox, Jr., is another perennial of the literary summer colony at York Harbor, Maine. He has lately wed Fritz Scheff, the comic opera singer.

Rose Cecil O'Neill Latham Wilson, the artist, is a native of the Ozark Mountains in southwestern Missouri.

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

The Constitution Makers.

The student of citizenship will read to little purpose, unless he early gets fixed in his mind that there is a government on paper and a government not on paper, and that the latter is the real government. We have constitutions and laws, provisions for holding courts and sessions of congress, but under these paper plans and specifications we may have any kind of government we will endure from the autocracy of a Russia to the anarchy of a Central American republic. All depends upon the type of manhood and the inspiring ideals of national life.

Remembering this it will be profitable to devote one lesson to a hurried review of the men who gave us our Constitution of the United States. Tradition would have us believe that they were a grave and reverend body of men, pious to a degree, working with motives of the broadest patriotism.

They had wrangled for several weeks without making headway when Benjamin Franklin rose in the dignity of his eighty-one years and spoke in part as follows: "Groping as it were in the dark to find political truth, and scarce able to distinguish it when presented to us, how has it happened, Sir, that we have not hitherto once thought of humbly applying to the Father of lights to illuminate our understanding? In the beginning of the contest with Great Britain, when we were sensible of danger, we had daily prayer in this room for divine protection. Our prayers, Sir, were heard and were graciously answered. To that Providence we owe this happy opportunity for consulting in peace on the means of establishing our future national felicity. Have we now forgotten that powerful friend? Or do we imagine that we no longer need his aid? 'Tis true, we have lived, Sir, a long time and the longer I live the more convincing proofs I see of this truth—God governs in the affairs of men. I firmly believe this and I also believe that without His concurring aid we shall succeed in this building no better than the builders of Babel. I therefore beg leave to move that henceforth prayers imploring the assistance of heaven and its blessings upon our deliberations be held in this assembly every morning before we proceed."

Objections were made for a variety of reasons, the question was never put and the deliberations of our makers of the national constitution were sanctioned by only such prayers as the delegates breathed in their individual capacities. It was not so much of a God-fearing as an interest-fearing assemblage.

And yet some of the framers of our Constitution of the United States realized that they were building for ages. They believed that the future of republican institutions on this globe was in their keeping, that if their work was successfully done the whole world would ultimately become republican, but that if their attempt to establish a free government upon this continent should fail it would prove the death knell to republicanism throughout the world. Is it not strange that men who so well realized the importance of the task committed to their charge should have allowed their deliberations to proceed without formal prayer?

Perhaps, in the light of the conduct of our present day legislatures and state conventions, our honored forebears do not suffer so badly by comparison. They neglected, it is true, to open their deliberations with prayer while every session of our congresses, legislatures and conventions are all so opened, but straightway our members and delegates quite usually fall to "doing politics," "taking orders," and making nominations and elections from the political bargain counter as though there were neither a God in heaven nor a Satan in hades. At all events our constitution makers were not hypocrites.

Nevertheless the atmosphere of that first constitutional convention is worthy the close study of every person who would lay hold of the spirit of our American institutions. Those men builded better than they knew, so much better and broader than what they said and did gave evidence of their being capable of building that we cannot lightly pass over the declaration of the good and great Dr. Franklin that, "God governs in the affairs of men."

The besetting sins of their time were a cramped range of sympathy and a fore-shortened view of the future, but we should remember that in those days there was not a railroad or a steamboat, a telegraph or a telephone and travel was slow and costly. Men knew little of each other's states and cared little. The political mind was filled with almost nameless dreads, dread of monarchy, of democracy, of aristocracy, of interference and intrigue from the nations of Europe, dread of anarchy at home. Each colony felt that if it could be left alone unhindered and unhelped 'till the end of time, just as it then was, the measure of its cup of bliss would be filled to the brim. Only now and again was there a citizen wise enough to foresee that this could not be.

Do You Hear Well?

The Stolz Electrophone—A New, Electrical, Scientific and Practical Invention for those who are Deaf or Partially Deaf.

MAY NOW BE TESTED IN YOUR OWN HOME.

Deaf or partially deaf people now may make a trial of the Stolz Electrophone at home. This personal, practical test serves to prove that the device satisfies, with ease, every requirement of a perfect hearing device.

This new invention renders unnecessary such clumsy, unsightly and frequently harmful devices, as trumpets, horns, tubes, ear drums, fans, etc. It is a tiny electric telephone that fits on the ear and which, the instant it is applied, magnifies the sound waves in such manner as to cause an astonishing increase in the clearness of all sounds. It overcomes the buzzing and roaring ear noises and, also, so constantly and electrically exercises the vital parts of the ear that, usually, the natural unaided hearing itself is gradually restored.

THE PLEDGE OF CITIZENSHIP

I, a citizen of the United States of America, realizing that a free Republic is an impossibility unless the citizen performs his civic duty, hereby pledge myself upon my sacred honor never to fail to exercise my right of citizenship by voting at every election, primary or secondary, wherever it is possible and legal for me to render that service to my country, my health permitting me so to do.

In taking this pledge it is distinctly understood that I in no way obligate myself to vote for any particular party, any definite candidate or any certain measure. I am binding myself only to my Country, and pledging myself solely to the faithful performance of the duty I owe to her as a citizen.

Those taking the foregoing pledge, signing and sending it to this office, will be enrolled upon The California Weekly's "School for Citizenship," which will be a permanent feature of this paper. It will entitle the person sending in his name to have answered, either through the columns of the paper or by letter, any rational question he may ask concerning public affairs, and, generally, by the person best equipped to afford the desired information. It will also entitle the signer to such special literature bearing upon the obligations and opportunities of good citizenship as may from time to time be issued. While this pledge is open to persons of all ages it is especially desired that it be taken and sent in by young men lately become voters or who will cast their first votes two years hence. It will take but a moment to clip out the pledge, sign, enclose in an envelope, stamp and address to "School for Citizenship," office The California Weekly, 26 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, and it opens the way for a liberal education in citizenship.

THE LEGISLATURE.

The new legislature starts out encouragingly. It is "organization," of course, where party lines are drawn, but they are not drawn on most things, and where Democrats and Republicans can combine, at least one test vote has indicated that the insurgents are numerous enough to control. This implies, of course, the support of those Democrats who are non-partisan for partisan motives, as well as of the sincere reformers, and of some Republicans who are at best near-reformers, but there will probably never be a majority without some mixture of motives, and this is at least a good beginning.

Lieutenant-Governor Porter, with the arrogance of irresponsible power, has organized the Senate in blatant defiance of the better sentiment of the State. Speaker Stanton, nearer to the people and dependent on his colleagues, has organized the Assembly with more consideration. The organization has the best of it, but the reform element has received some degree of recognition, and the committee on public morals, probably for the first time in its history, is positively and aggressively decent. If this is the sort of appointments Stanton could make, to the one important committee from which the organization kept "hands off," we can only regret that he did not get his position of speaker under conditions which left him free to exercise equal independence in other respects.

This legislature bids fair to be one of the most important California has known, since the epoch-making days of the adoption of the present constitution. There have been few legislatures with so much constructive legislation of importance pending, and none in recent years which showed so good a prospect of passing it intelligently.

MUST ANSWER.

Senator Perkins has been re-elected, as was inevitable, and the brief effort to organize an opposition to him accomplished nothing more than to demonstrate to the sceptical, by actual trial, that it was hopeless from the beginning. It was morally creditable to have made the effort, but it would probably have been Quixotic to carry it much further.

But the question which the Republican caucus refused to ask Senator Perkins is one which he must nevertheless answer to the people of California. Senator-elect Bristow, of Kansas, who made the official investigation of railroad conditions in California and probably understands them better than any one else, states in writing that one of the principal obstacles to establishing a government line of steamers, to connect with the Panama Canal on the Pacific side, as has already been done on the Atlantic side, is the fact that both senators from California are opposed to it. If this is the fact, the people of California want to know why. Probably neither senator will avow as a reason his political affiliation with the railroads which control the existing steamboat lines, but this is the motive the people will suspect, and the senators, if they acknowledge the position and avoid a public motive, will have to make their explanation strong enough to rebut this presumption.

CALHOUN'S "VINDICATION."

The legal trial of Patrick Calhoun will now demonstrate whether it is legally possible to convict Calhoun of crime in committing an act which all his friends and defenders freely avow he did commit. That is a matter in which our law and our courts, rather than Calhoun, are being tried, and for the present it is a matter to be fought out in the courts rather than in public discussion. The more immediate public concern is the defense Calhoun will make before the bar of public opinion. The law gives Calhoun the right not to make that defense at all, if he chooses. He can confine his efforts to keeping out of prison, and if he succeeds he is entitled to his reward—which is to keep out of prison. But Patrick Calhoun has been holding his head very high in this community, and professing a vast degree of moral indignation at the injustice of the charges which have been made against him. He has been "demanding a trial" (and privately consenting to its postponement) these two years, not to keep out of prison, but for "vindication." Well, the time has come for his vindication. And there are just two ways to get it. One is to prove that he did not pay Ruef that $200,000, and either that it was not paid, or that he has ever since sought diligently but vainly the criminal who stole it from him and paid it. The other way is to acknowledge that he paid Ruef the $200,000, or authorized it done, but that the payment was a legitimate and morally defensible fee, for legitimate legal services. If Patrick Calhoun can demonstrate either of these things, his vindication is assured. But the curious fact is that, with all the whisperings of defense and palliation, these two years, neither of these defenses has been so much as hinted. If Calhoun is really innocent, in either of these two only possible ways of innocence, then he has good cause of action against all his friends and apologists.

JAPANESE FOR JAPAN.

Vast indignation is professed (for political purposes) by the opposition press in Japan at the introduction of bills in the California legislature restricting the ownership of land by aliens. After the professions of "friendship for Japan" on the visit of the fleet, these proposals are described as distinctly inconsistent with those professions.

It is a curious confusion of thought. Japan is not buying farms in California, but Japanese are. California is friendly to Japan, but does not sell its soil to Japanese farmers. To admire a nation, and to want to sell our territory to its citizens, are two very different things. Japan is friendly to America, but an American cannot own land in Japan. We do not object to that, as a nation, even if some individual Americans may not like it. The policy is Japan's right, and is, moreover, very good policy.

The Japanese people, and the American people too, may as well understand that California's friendship to Japan is too great to desire the expatriation of the citizens of so friendly a power. We admire Japan, and wish its success. Also, we wish Japan to have the assistance of all its citizens, in Japan, to contribute to that success. We want Japanese to be Japanese, and we hope the Japanese will make it. But we want Californian success to be American, and we do not wish the Japanese to annex it. Any foreigner who will become an American, we welcome, and we will sell him land, to raise an American family on. But the Japanese, by the laws of this nation, and by the still more immutable laws of heredity, cannot become an American. Therefore, in friendship to Japan, we do not wish to deprive Japan of any of its population, or of the national credit of any Japanese success.

Senator Ben Tillman has enjoyed the reputation of being money-honest and as honest otherwise as a blind partisanship can permit a man to be. This reputation may have been founded upon his ruggedness of character. We are prone to regard the blunt, blustering man as honest without looking deeper. Senator Tillman will now have to make good before the American people or take his place in the Ananias Club.

GOVERNOR GILLET ON PAROLES.

Some of the most sincere portions of Governor Gillett's recent message to the legislature are to be found in the chapter on prison affairs, and he appears to be especially interested in paroles. He has been so much impressed with the advantages of the parole system that he has laid down two absolute rules. First, no prisoner eligible to parole will be pardoned until he has first been liberated on parole and has given a good account of himself. Second, all paroled prisoners who conduct themselves properly for not less than two years will be pardoned.

These rules are not original with Governor Gillett. Other California governors have done practically the same thing he is doing; but Governor Gillett is the first to make public announcement of the adoption of such rules. He goes still further in his enthusiastic confidence in the efficacy of paroles and proposes that the restriction of parole privileges to first terms be removed and that all prisoners be made eligible to parole.

In spirit the governor's zeal is excellent, and the practical operation would be ideal if we could feel full confidence that the Board of Prison Directors would always show sound judgment in the selection of prisoners to be paroled. Observation casts doubt upon the correctness of such an assumption.

The working of the California parole law has been such, in recent years, as to give liberty to a large number of life-termers. As originally enacted, the law did not permit the parole of life prisoners, but one particular prisoner, who had been convicted of murder, was able to muster influence enough to have the law amended in his interest, and since that time many other murderers and probably some highway robbers who had been given life terms, have gone out by the parole door. A reasonable liberality in the application of the parole privilege to life prisoners would not be an occasion for criticism, but it has been carried beyond reason.

This is the other side of Governor Gillett's advocacy of paroles as an ideal prison policy. The moral of it is that the Board of Prison Directors should take a broader view of the subject and realize that good conduct in prison is by no means the only thing to be considered in connection with paroles; nor is the reformation of the criminal, important as that element in penology, the sole consideration, for, if it were, hanging murderers would be entirely indefensible. There are some crimes, of which murder is the chief, which society, as a measure of self-protection, must punish with a heavy hand, and five years in San Quentin is not an adequate alternative for a death sentence.

As far as pardoning second- and third-termers, to put recidivists upon the same plane of consideration as those who have taken only the first degree in crime, would be a violation of all sound theories of penology.

SIERRA WATER.

Municipal ownership is not, of itself, an issue, to be either advocated or opposed. In Oakland, with the Contra Costa Company giving poor service at extortionate rates, that issue was of pressing public importance. With the People's Water Company in charge, giving good service at fair rates, the issue has only an academic interest, and is little discussed. Municipal ownership must depend for advocacy or opposition upon the state of facts in each case.

The bringing of Sierra water to the bay cities makes the discussion of municipal ownership almost not germane to the issue. There isn't any other way of bringing water so far at such great cost. Therefore, whether municipal ownership is a wise work well or ill for the city to do is the question. The question before the people is: Do these bay cities want "Sierra water or do they not?"

They want it, if not just now, then before very long. They want it because it is perfectly good water, while that which they now have is barely potable. They want it because the Sierras can supply plenty of water and a growing population needs an abundance—enough to waste some if they want to without moral reproach. God made lots of water.

No preferred claim to water for irrigation, or other purposes, can stand against use for domestic consumption by an urban population. That is such a "manifestly greater public use," as to make final ownership a subject of no doubt. There may be expense attendant upon the condemnation of acquired rights to water for inferior uses but not greater than the use for a superior purpose can afford to pay.

How the bay cities shall combine to work co-operatively in bearing the huge expense is matter of detail. It cannot be that, as a condition precedent, they must all be incorporated into one greater San Francisco. The impossible is never a prerequisite to any legitimate enterprise. A co-operative water district might be readily provided.

There remains, then, only the will to do the thing and a way to dispose of existing water plans. This may prove difficult but not insurmountable. Add two or three lines intelligently written to the Statute of Eminent Domain, giving cities power to acquire existing public service properties by condemnation, and a way will be opened. This statute has mainly been employed in taking private property for corporate purposes, but it cannot be wrong occasionally to take corporate property for public purposes.

This being the gist of the matter the present would be a good time for those interested in bringing Sierra water to the bay cities to take steps to have that statute amended to this effect. It should have been done long ago.

THE CRY AGAINST SUCCESS.

Ever since there came to be property there has been an unequal distribution of property, and ever since there has been an unequal distribution of property those who have had little have envied those who have had much, and those who have acquired much have entertained a contempt for those who have acquired little. This has been a matter of feeling rather than of reason, and has generally yielded to reason when there has been reason for yielding.

But it does not follow that this tendency accounts for all cases where the propertyless mass cries out against those who have property. There is unequal acquisitive adaptability among men and, so long as that inequality exists, there must exist inequality of condition. And so long as the multitude goes rickshacking down the broad path of unconcern there must be hump-backs looking to receive and hold what the heedless let go. Every person capable of sober thinking sees this and no person, on sober second thought, cries out against honest success or fails of discriminating against dishonest success. It is only where wealth is predatory that it is inveighed against.

The efforts made by predatory wealth to make it appear that financial ineptitude enervates all wealth should not be permitted to confuse the public mind. That effort is being made only that predatory wealth may hide behind the wall of respectability that honest wealth had been at great pains to build. "How did he make it?" is a legitimate inquiry in every instance.

REFORM OF TAXATION.

Attention is called to an article on another page written for The California Weekly by Prof. Carl C. Plehn, secretary and expert of the State Commission on Revenue and Taxation. Professor Plehn was the architect of the taxation amendment voted on by the people of California last November, and which failed of adoption by a comparatively narrow margin. It is due to him, however, to say that the amendment was not submitted to the people precisely as he would have had it go to them. To the recitals of facts and expressions of opinion in Professor Plehn's article few persons observant of the course of recent events where problems of taxation are being seriously considered will take exception.

Of objections raised to the amendment the two most serious were the inflexible character of the rates of tax on the gross earnings of corporations, and the excision of the corporations specifically taxed from a general property tax in the event that it should be necessary to levy such a tax for State purposes.

Changes should, if possible, be made to meet both of these objections. As originally prepared, the amendment allowed a change in the gross earnings tax rates once in six years by act of the legislature, and it seems it would be well to restore that feature in the revised draft.

Also, it ought to be provided that if the revenues set apart for the support of the State government prove insufficient, and it is necessary to levy an ad valorem tax, it shall fall on the property of the corporations paying gross earnings taxes in common with all other forms of property. With these two changes the amendment will stand a first-class chance of being ratified in 1910.

The people of California have reversed their votes on constitutional amendments often enough to justify resubmission when, as in this instance, the proposition is important and the adverse majority not overwhelming. Last November the amendment increasing salaries of State officers and changing the compensation of members of the legislature were adopted, and yet they had been voted down at the preceding election. The amendments raising judicial salaries and creating the district courts of appeals were adopted after having been once rejected. There is no reason why those interested in placing the taxation system of California on a sound basis should relax their efforts or despair of success. When the people understand the proposed system they will want it.

There is no party offense so heinous as bolting a party caucus—when "jay" reformers from the country do it. But when metropolitans of the push do it, then it is only local loyalty and independence. Witness the agreement of the San Francisco Democrats in the legislature to refuse to support, for the Senate, J. O. Davis, as clean a man and as representative a Democrat as there is in the State, and to bolt the caucus in the interest of Harry Flannery, who may be a good fellow, for all we know, but who is known to fame only as a San Francisco saloon keeper, who contributed $4,400 to the campaign fund.

Really Quite Human.

Two warring tongs in California lately signed a treaty of peace. The wars between Chinese tongs are on a parity with the feuds of Kentucky. Both take their rise from the failure of the law to establish justice and maintain order and, therefore, each person, family or clan becomes its own judge, jury and executioner. It is bad business. The reason it is bad, according to the articles of peace above referred to, is that, "The commerce of the Chinese section of San Francisco has been injured." Therefore, the document goes on to explain, "the six companies are determined that this war must cease." Chinese ingenuity has failed to devise any means whereby a vendetta may be waged and men killed without hurting business. If such a means had been devised, we are permitted to presume, the tongs would be permitted to indulge in their perfectly killing diversion without hindrance from the Six Companies. Business first, justice afterward! It is remarkable how many really human characteristics those Chinese have.

Going Out Like a Lion.

There are those who love a fight. The President is one of them. There are others who do not reciprocate that affection and wish from the bottom of their sweet hearts that the President and Congress might patch up an armistice to last until the fourth of March. The California Weekly does not sympathize with the pacificators. The President has found an opportunity to air a few skeletons that needed airing and that he could not well attend to before. It is a pity that he could not have made the issue before election. If Cannon, Tawney, Sherley and Fitzgerald had been placed in their present plight before election the voters in their several districts would have seen to them. A love feast at the end of the administration will not change the course of history. It will be remembered that the President came into office like a lamb. It will not ill behoove him to go out of it like a lion if the gray wolves make it needful. Deuce take the properties! What the public needs is to know who's who.

Eliminate the Quack.

Attention is called to the thoughtful and readable article, elsewhere in this issue, prepared for The California Weekly by Dr. Harry M. Sherman, a physician of San Francisco of unexcelled personal and professional standing. The ailing public needs to be protected from quackery and mediaeval superstition. All women and almost all men are born doctors. They are ready upon the instant to prescribe, free of charge, for any malady from cough to cancer. That can't be avoided. It flows from those springs of sympathy that well in all breasts, except those of human crabbles, but when one sets himself up as a practitioner for pay he should know as much of the mechanism of the human body as an itinerant tinker knows of a clock, and it should be the State's business to know that he does know. The State can act only through a board of examiners. Examinations under best conditions leave much untold, but will let into practice ten who are unfit where they will shut out one who is fit to saw other men's bones or douche their viscera with drugs. The undertaking industry does not need fostering.

Doctor Wiley.

At the distance of California from Washington the head of the National Bureau of Chemistry resembles a red flag of defiance and the impulse is to put him out of commission. He has hurt us, or, at least, has tried to do the thing that would inconvenience us, therefore he is not our friend. And yet to Doctor Wiley more than to any other one man the Nation owes its pure food laws. The services performed have been of incalculable value and no little injury. California fruit growers do well to hold their ground until the injurious effects of sulphur are made clear, but this should be done without trying to extinguish Wiley. The truth of the issue must eventually be established and when established it must prevail, cost what it will. Meantime, let Wiley go on experimenting upon his poison squads. He will work more benefit than injury except to the squads.

Good Things.

That certain newspapers are being paid to misrepresent facts relating to the graft cases in San Francisco is matter of common knowledge. Such papers should be prosecuted for receiving stolen money. Having been convicted of this, they should be promptly prosecuted for receiving stolen money under false pretenses from the bribers. Any pretense that they are shaping public sentiment is fraudulent, and the work is sometimes overdone with the express purpose of producing a reactionary effect and so undoing the evil they were paid to do. What good things and how gullible these predatory nabobs must be to be separated from their cash on such shallow pretenses?

Very Foolish.

Members of the House of Representatives have been very foolish in allowing their concern for the dignity of their house to be used for a shield behind which the gray wolves may skulk to escape the well deserved shots with which the President has been peppering them. The blunt facts are that the secret service bureau was designedly crippled, that the President's work of smoking the rascals out was designedly hampered, that these things were done on behalf of predatory interests and that Joe Cannon and the house committee on appropriations knew what was being done and why it was being done. These men deserve the pillory. The house made itself ridiculous and has not helped the plight of the men who were directly responsible. They have been branded, and not from a paint pot. It was done with a hot iron and they are marked men, as they should be. It is regrettable that only one member of the California delegation stood by the President in this conflict.

The First Theatre at Forty-Five.

A clergyman lately confessed to having been to the theatre for the first time at forty-five years of age and his confession was unaccompanied by contrition. This renders hope for him less buoyant. He should have run up and down the theatrical scale from nickelodeon to Shakespearean tragedy and from concert hall to grand opera. He would have found much to condemn, as all observing persons do, but his condemnations, being intelligent, might have counted for elevating the stage to the great and good educational force it should become. A great educational force it is now, but not always good, yet the homely virtues, the everyday fidelities and integrities of life, are vindicated upon nearly all stages, and these are the hits that bring out the heartiest applause. What the American stage needs is, what the German and French stages have, a discriminating audience, and this ministers of intelligence and dramatic education should be able to help supply. Satan should not be allowed to have a monopoly of so great a power for social uplift and education.

A Health to Mr. Heney.

It is as plain as day that but for Spreckels, Burns and Heney the rottenness of San Francisco civic and commercial life would neither have been exposed nor remedied. The good work must go on. A health to Mr. Heney!

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

We are all children, and we seek a wonder. So we study occultism, and look to telepathy for the door to the subliminal self; we join new religions for the cure of bodily ills, or affect strange medical cults for our soul's salvation. There is an atmosphere of faith and a worship of mystery characteristic of this day of enlightenment, and this is evidently responsive to an inward need.

But why seek so far for mystery, or, like the frothing oracles of old, see the spiritual only in the abnormal? Hypnotism and telepathy are strange things, but sleep and love are more wonderful. That mind should communicate direct with mind may be unusual, but the miracle is that body should communicate with mind—that your thought should become vibration of air or ether, and then, by chemical stimulation of nerve, become my thought. Of all the mysteries of life, that is the hardest to explain, and yet of all the happenings of life it is the most familiar. The subliminal self has become a fad, and men seek it in pathological manifestations of dubious personality or occult clairvoyance. These are interesting, and they may be useful, when they bring the subliminal into the supraliminal, where we can examine it by the light of syllogism and sensation, in whose use we are more expert. But the subliminal self is no more mysterious than the conscious self, and is much older and more universal.

Since the beginning of life in the world, its problems have been solved with the most astonishing intelligence, and this intelligence became conscious only comparatively late in the evolution of animal life, and only since yesterday it is become partly rational, in our poor brains. It was by the intelligent solving of its own life-problems that the thinker invented the thistle-down, but no one will claim that this intelligent was conscious or rational. Neither will any one deny to man the possession of precisely the same intelligence, to guide the marvelous laboratories of digestion or the intricate engineering of circulation. Most of the selfhood of things is what we call "subliminal," merely because it finds expression through other organs than the human cerebrum.

So conscious reason seems to be that small portion of the Self caught up and accessible through the organism, or the cerebral cortex. What is higher and lower than that is not another Self, but merely the more important remainder of the whole personality. Sometimes an abnormal brain develops a cortical sense of the subconscious or the supraliminal, just as an abnormal eye might see by the ultra-violet or the X-rays, but the mystery is not in what is revealed by this occult vision, but only in the abnormal manner of its apprehension. The great Mystery of life is not occult, but universal and familiar, and he who has attained some vision of the miracle of common things will not be much agape at occasional evidences of uncommon faculties of seeing those things.

This wave of occultism is no doubt only a reaction against the exaggerated rationalism of recent tendency. Truth is essentially a mystery, and the commonest truths are the most mysterious of all. Shallow thinking is deprived most of us of the common mysteries. Because we use scientific names of the forces with which we deal, we cease to figure them in terms of myth and miracle. But a just instinct refuses to be satisfied with so superficial a solution of things, and because it is easier to satisfy the instinct with mysteries that have not yet been named and classified, we wander off after occult intuitions of the supernatural. It may be worth while, since some of these phenomena are certainly actual and therefore worth studying. But may we not fairly anticipate that when the wonderful mystery of common things is again more generally realized, the abnormal and the occult will fill as small a place in religion and philosophy as they do in life?

THE WORLD AT LARGE

Civic Party in Pittsburgh.

It is comforting to San Francisco to note that Pittsburgh is going about its regeneration much as San Francisco went about hers. Affairs have not come to quite so bad a pass there as here for the reason that San Francisco is only emerging from smoke while San Francisco was forced to emerge from ashes, but party lines are being pretty effectually disarded there in favor of a civic league, as here in favor of a good government league. In both cities the regular party organizations had fallen into the hands of His Majesty, the Devil.

No Leak In Tariff Discussion.

With the purpose of making the extra session of Congress as short as possible the Ways and Means committee of the House are hard at work behind closed doors threshing out the new tariff schedules. Not a word is allowed to leak out as to what action is taken regarding any article, with the result that the protected interests scarcely know how to keep busy making the lives of the committeemen miserable with representations showing that the smallest reduction in tariff rates on their commodity will paralyze their particular industry and spread ruin broadcast. It will be remembered that the protected interests had their hearing before Congress assembled. The less outside aid afforded the committee the better the schedule likely to result.

Der Kaiser's Castles.

Kaiser Wilhelm is hard pressed for cash. He and his household have been extravagant, and it is not impossible that he may have been caught on the wrong side of the market in American speculations, as it was at one time reported that his Uncle Edward had been. Anyhow, retrenchment is the word in that family and it is seriously proposed to place some of his castles on the market to be sold for the relief of the household exchequer. The Kaiser has only fifty-two castles and imperial homes, a portion of which he never sees and only a few of which he is able to occupy at all. The cost of maintenance of them all is by no means inconsiderable.

Black Snow.

Sir Oliver Lodge is seriously grappling with the fog problem in London and is able to report progress. By discharging heavy voltages of electricity into the atmosphere at short intervals, and from many radiating points, he is able to precipitate the particles of moisture in intervening spaces, upon laundry linen out to dry, in the form of black snow, very unlovely and something less adhesive than tar. The radiating points would be difficult to establish on San Francisco Bay, but even black snow with a clear atmosphere, might be preferable to some of our fogs that leave no space for any atmosphere at all.

Convention On Criminology.

The Northwestern University School of Law, near Chicago, is to commemorate the fiftieth year of its establishment by holding a national convention for the discussion of criminality and related problems. The convention will be held in June next and arrangements are making to bring together the best equipped minds the nation affords for consideration of the subject in all its forms. There will be present those who will treat the subject from the standpoint of psychological research, from the point of view of the best practical penology and, likewise, from that of the task of apprehending and punishing crime when detected with reasonable certainty and dispatch. When Society sets itself to the solution of serious problems it generally manages to find a way out of difficulty, or so near out as to make conditions tolerable, and it is not too much to say that the problem of criminality, high and low, has stirred the American mind profoundly. This convention should prove of great service.

The Man Who Did It.

There has been no recent decision of the supreme court of the United States more important to the country than the "eighty cent gas" decision. The tendency has been to give the credit for handling this case to Judge Alton B. Parker, but William P. Burr, a rather obscure assistant corporation attorney in New York city, was the man who framed up the case and fought it to a successful termination. Judge Parker was merely of counsel. One of the features of this case that incenses the public mind against public service corporations was the attempt of the gas company to make out a capitalization of $100,000,000 upon which dividends should be paid. A searching judicial inquiry reduced this sum to $42,000,000 with a possible $12,000,000, additional, depending upon how the case should be decided. It was decided that this item of $12,000,000, for good will, which the people gave in the form of a franchise, could not be made a part of the capitalization for taxing gas consumers. Mr. Burr has conferred a great favor upon American municipalities and should be given the credit for it.

The Trouble In India.

A condition of profound unrest still pervades India, and the British government is taking steps to forestall eventualities. Many women and children of British officers and civilians in India are being sent to England or to some nearer British colony for safety, and yet the factions among the East Indians hate each other rather more cordially than either of them hates the English. At Titagur lately the Hindus attacked the Mohammedan mosque in great force, because the latter had been accused of sacrificing sacred cows therein, and the soldiery had to be called out to separate the combatants. While there are fewer Mohammedans than Hindus in India, there are 80,000,000 of them, all fighters and quite able to hold their own against the Brahmans. If England were out of the country these fanatics would be at each other's throats in a jiffy. England's mistake in India appears to have been its disinclination to push education whereas, in the Philippines, Uncle Sam is making education the corner stone of the civilization he is striving to build, a far better foundation, we may be certain, than that of playing off fanaticism against fanaticism as the English are doing in India. If the Mohammedans and Hindus in India were able to stand together for a common patriotism they would make short work of British rule in that densely peopled peninsula.

Bleaching Flour.

Our California fruit growers are not the only producers having serious trouble with the pure food department of the national government. The millers of the Northwest are also in arms. The intelligent consumer feeds his stomach with his eyes instead of with his appetite and therefore takes to red apples, white flour and bleached-out fruits. Whereas it formerly required sixty days to bleach out flour, it is now done by passing electricity through the product in process of reduction in the mills. It is complained that the office of the chief chemist at Washington at one time approved the process as not having a deleterious effect on the flour but now condemns it. Another source of trouble has arisen out of the use of durum wheat, at one time commended by the Secretary of Agriculture, but now the Pure Food Bureau treats its introduction into flour as an adulterant and has caused much trouble and loss by seizing shipments of flour found to contain durum. The point of difficulty appears to be that the official chemists have changed their minds as to the bleaching process and the admixture of durum wheat with other varieties in making flour while the millers are of the same opinion still.

Hard Bondage.

The condition of the Congo country is still a serious problem in the minds of humanists. It was hoped that the change from a mere crown appurtenance to a Belgian colony would work some amelioration in the condition of the poor blacks, but the only result appears to have been the transference of King Leopold from the foreground to the background of affairs without restraining the whip hands of his slave drivers or the extortions of corporations holding concessions in the colony. Efforts are again making to bring the whole subject to the attention of civilized Europe.

A SAFEGUARD OF THE PUBLIC HEALTH

By HARRY M. SHERMAN, M. D.

In the Outlook for the 19th of December of last year, Dr. Henry S. Pritchett of the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching, has an exceedingly valuable critical consideration of the present methods of teaching in medicine, law and theology viewed from the standpoint of the layman and not from that of the pedagogist. In general he points out that the layman, be he well or ill educated, is still somewhat looking for a specific which will cure all ills, or a short cut to knowledge which will save the tedium and expense of the schools and the result is that there are in the three professions too many men and the majority too poorly educated, so that the country at large is getting a service which is not what it should be and not what it may be made if the people wish for a betterment. Putting law and theology aside, consider a little bit what Doctor Pritchett says regarding the demand the layman should make of medicine, for medicine comes closer to us all than can either law or theology, for law deals with our rights or our possessions, theology with our hopes and expectations, but medicine deals with our persons in the most intimate manner, and so far as we really know our persons are ourselves.

Groundwork of All Practice.

"For intelligent treatment of the great number of diseases we must depend on the honesty, the intelligence, and especially on the training and experience of the medical practitioners whom we consult. For training all practitioners, whether of one school or another, are dependent upon the knowledge of certain fundamental sciences, physiology, anatomy, chemistry, and the like. In fact, the practice of medicine is nothing else but the application of these fundamental sciences, just as the practice of electrical engineering is simply applied physics, mathematics, and mechanics. The general public cannot possibly differentiate between the various medical sects. The ordinary, prudent, intelligent person who values his health as well as between allopaths, homeopaths, or eclectics, for example. The only possible protection he can secure is to insist that the medical practice should be first of all a well-educated man, and secondly, that he shall have been thoroughly grounded in the fundamental sciences upon which all medical practice depends. The only defense which he can hope to secure against the incompetent or fraudulent practitioners of medicine is to obtain such legal regulation of medical licensing and such expert scrutiny of medical education and the admission to practice as will guarantee the thorough preparation of authorized practitioners in the science of the day. The rights and the interests of the public can be conserved only by requiring all candidates for practice—whether they be allopaths, homeopaths, eclectics, osteopaths, Christian Scientists, or faith healers—to show evidence of a thorough grounding in these fundamental sciences before being permitted to practice."

How California Law Protects Public.

Let us see, now, how the California law which has been enacted through the efforts of the physicians of the State, conspires to the inhabitants of California, what we may call their right to the best, in the light of what Doctor Pritchett says. According to this law no man or woman can practice medicine in the State of California who has not, after an examination, been licensed to do so by the State Board of Medical Examiners. Without going into the details of this examination is such as to be a fair and adequate test of the applicant's knowledge of medicine and surgery. All applicants, no matter what may be their "school," are obliged to take identical examinations in all subjects. There are no examinations on therapeutics or practice, but for these are substituted diagnostics and hygiene, for it is obvious that a man who knows the nature of a disease from understanding its pathology and knows how to recognize that disease from the study of the methods of its diagnosis, cannot go far wrong from correct practice no matter what may be the erratic ideas of the founders of the school to which he has given allegiance; that is, an osteopath understanding the pathology of typhoid fever would be restrained by that very knowledge from attempting any massage of the abdomen, and a homeopath who believed in plugging the pores of malaria would be certain to know the amount of quinine necessary to control the disease. And "the man who undertakes to practice medicine under the name of osteopathy has exactly the same reasons to recognize and treat which other physicians have. He has exactly the same need for a training in the fundamental medical sciences. If, after he has taken such a training, he is called to call himself an osteopath, he has every right to use that title, and the public can have no more objection to it than it can to the fact that one trained theologian chooses to call himself a Methodist and another a Unitarian, while both undertake to teach and to practice the same religion."

Examinations Debar Incompetents.

The examination papers of applicants for a license to practice medicine and surgery in California are public documents and can be quoted and in a recent number of the California State Journal of Medicine are some reproductions of diagrams made by applicants at one of the examinations in which these applicants eventually misplaced all of the important viscera of the body, even going so far as to think that the liver was on the left side, rather than on the right side of the body. Nothing more striking than this has ever been given us of the inadequacy of the knowledge of many who dare to go out and practice medicine, for had not these individuals been refused licenses by the board for failing to be offering their services to the people and the people would have no way of knowing that they were incompetent except by trying them, and that might prove to be a fatal experiment. At the last examination which was held in Los Angeles, the board rejected thirty out of the sixty-five applicants; that is, so far as this number of applicants is concerned, nearly one-half were unable to prove that they knew enough to undertake the task of treating the sick.

It is very plain that while this law may seem to work a hardship on a few, in that they are refused licenses to practice the profession they have studied, it is saving a great many more from a still greater hardship, for an incompetent person licensed to practice will dress and an ability to manage people may easily secure considerable patronage and it may take the people a long time to find out that his education was imperfect, and his knowledge and skill inadequate. Really the law saves the law and the people thought was drawn up and its passage secured by the medical profession, a profession which has given not a few instances of its real altruism.

Public Hostile to Reforms.

It is too late to find, as Doctor Pritchett says, that "the public has been slow to appreciate the fact that its interests and its safety lay in good standards of medical education, but it has generally been hostile to those reforms which the representatives of the leading medical societies have endeavored to bring about. The sympathy of the public has gone usually to the man who dare to practice medicine by force of nature, or, at best, with a most superficial preparation in the fundamental sciences of the day. It is this attitude of the public which makes the practice of medicine the easiest field for the charlatan and the quack to enter."

There is an opportunity now, however, by which the people can show their interest in their own physical welfare by insisting that at the present session of the legislature there shall be no interference with this law, or if there be any at all it shall only consist in betterments and not in any act which would weaken the law's value. Efforts are usually made at almost every session of the legislature to emasculate this law in some particular, even to the point of arranging that graduates of California colleges of medicine shall not be subjected to it. Unfortunately there are in California about the same proportion of poor medical schools as there are in other States and there is no more reason why a citizen of the State should be ill-treated by a graduate of a California school than by a graduate of a medical school in California. Nor is there any reason why a graduate of a California school should be permitted to practice in California without an examination, where he might not be able to practice in another State because of the examination.

Again, even the best of the schools now and then are obliged to graduate a man or a woman who is known to the faculty not to be properly equipped because the accidents of examinations gave this individual subjects upon which he or she chanced to be better informed than on the others. We all of us know of men who have gotten through examinations in subjects of which they were very ignorant, on some such chance. These men, who are graduates of the poorer schools, need the presence of the State Board of Medical Examiners to weed them out and prevent their entering the ranks of the medical profession where they may do no inconsiderable amount of harm.

Many Low Grade Medical Schools.

What is true of medical men is true, too, of medical colleges—there are too many of them and not a few are of an inferior grade. This has been the case for a long time, but the fact is brought out very prominently by the contest between the State Board of Medical Examiners, owned and conducted by a group of medical men who are stockholders, and licensed by the State to issue degrees in medicine, and the medical school which is the medical department of a university. The good medical school of today cannot pay its own way on the fees of its students, and the school that is forced to do so, or that in addition tries to pay dividends to its owners, is sure to save money for this purpose at the loss of instruction to the students. The medical school that is a branch of a university, and which is backed by the parent institution which pays, out of general university funds, part of the support of the school alone can succeed.

This has been recognized by the more prominent medical educators and all over the United States independent and privately owned medical schools have merged their identities into those of universities. One notable example is the College of Physicians and Surgeons in New York, which surrendered its charter to the State and became an integral portion of Columbia University. In San Francisco the same thing has been seen, when the Cooper Medical College, a competent and strong school, with high ideals, passed over with every stone and brick and foot of ground to be an integral part of Stanford University.

Medical Examiners Necessary.

Just as long, however, as the low grade medical school exists we must expect to have as its output poorly instructed and equipped physicians—and so long as this sort of physician wishes to practice the public will need a State Board of Medical Examiners to protect it.

Just as long as it is possible for a man by a chance to pass the examination in the higher grade school—and the possibility of this may never be wholly eliminated—the public will need a State Board of Medical Examiners to re-examine all applicants for licenses. In fact, the higher grade schools prefer that their students shall be re-examined by a State board and that the responsibility of putting the men into practice be with that board, the school being responsible only for the degree of M. D. The law very plainly is to save the babies and the children and the people who bore them from incompetent practitioners of medicine and it must be preserved intact for them.

THE REFORM OF TAXATION

By PROF. CARL C. PLEHN.

"The best piece of legislation that has been offered to the people since the State was organized has, through a lack of knowledge of its beneficial qualities, been cast aside, and we are thrown back on the old system of taxation, at least for the time being."—Report of the California State Board of Equalization for 1907-8.

The above citation refers to Senate Constitutional Amendment No. 1 providing for the separation of State from local taxation and for a modern system of taxation adequate to impose a just and equitable tax burden on the various classes of corporations which have grown to such huge dimensions in recent years. This measure was defeated on submission to the people by a vote of 88,000 to 104,000.

The arguments advanced against the amendment, and which seemed to have been most influential in bringing about the defeat of this much needed reform may be grouped under three headings: (1) The change proposed was a radical one, the exact effect of which it was hard for the layman to understand. Because of its radical character, and on account of the difficulty of amending it to meet new and unforeseen contingencies it was urged that it should not be embodied in the Constitution; (2) Fear lest the proposed State revenues prove insufficient to meet the needs of the State, coupled with the fear that the entire State tax might not be removed from the property left to be subjected to local taxation. With this went the objection to having the corporations selected for State taxation exempt from any additional tax for State purposes which might be necessary; (3) Distrust of the State government. It was alleged that the legislature and the State government are subservient to the corporations, and that therefore any measure for tax reform proposed by the administration and approved by the legislature must be inimical to the interests of the people.

It is no use now to discuss these arguments, nor to show how they misrepresented the facts as to the amendment. They served their purpose and prevented the people from obtaining any relief from the inequities of the present tax system. Incidentally they saved several large groups of corporations, now escaping taxation, from any material increase in their contributions to the government. The objections made have been summarized merely to see whether they cannot be obviated in the next reform measure to be presented. For, although these identified with the reform movement are naturally disappointed at the unfortunate result of the election, they are yet encouraged to try again. The large vote in favor of the amendment is proof of the feeling that a reform of some kind is necessary, and that the main objection to this particular amendment did so because they objected to some minor feature, while they approved of the fundamental principle, namely, separation of State from local taxation.

The question, therefore, is not, whether the objections raised were valid, but whether they were of such importance as to require an amendment in drafting a new amendment without sacrificing the fundamental features of the reform.

It ought to be possible in some manner to provide more flexibility than was provided in the first amendment. Unfortunately our constitution is already almost a code of law so far as taxation is concerned. It provides an absolutely rigid system of taxation, and the difficulty we are now encountering in making a change is itself proof of the advisability of having a more flexible system. The constitution of 1849 contained but one brief paragraph relating to taxation, but the article on revenue and taxation in the constitution of 1879 as it now stands contains sixteen sections aggregating over twelve hundred words, not to mention other references to taxation in other parts of the same instrument. And as it is still not enough, the supreme court has considered these provisions in over one hundred and fifty decisions. It is on this account that the revenue system is crystallized hard and fast and no change of any importance can be made without a constitutional amendment. There is no doubt that the ideal way to introduce tax reform would be to amend the Constitution so that the legislature would have the power to modify the revenue system from time to time as changing conditions might demand. But it is extremely doubtful whether the people would pass such an amendment. In the opinion of those in a position to judge, the prevailing distrust of the legislature is not justified but so long as it does prevail, the voters will probably demand that they themselves pass upon the main features of the new system. It may, however, be possible to arrange for a revision of the revenue system from time to time by referendum which is easier than to amend the Constitution as the latter requires a two-thirds vote in each house of the legislature.

It was demonstrated, but too late in the campaign for the knowledge to reach all the voters, that the amendment which was defeated, would have provided ample revenues for the support of the State, including the usual contributions to the public school funds and all other expenditures. So there would have been no necessity for a "come back," as it was called, or in other words, no general ad valorem tax for State purposes would be necessary. This showing vindicates the tax rates proposed and demonstrates the accuracy of the commission's original estimate. But it should be provided that, in case of emergency, such as war or great public calamity, the State be empowered to levy an ad valorem tax. Such a tax should, however, fall not only on the classes of property selected for local taxation but also upon those subject in ordinary times to State taxation only.

No real objection was raised to the use of the gross receipts as the bases for determining the taxes to be paid by public service corporations. The simplicity, certainty and economy of that system have been amply demonstrated.

If a new amendment can be drafted along the lines above suggested it should meet with the approval of the people. The first campaign was one of education, which many were brought to an understanding of the necessity for this reform. A second campaign ought to bring enough new converts to carry the measure.

Ingessoll's Opinion of Woman.

"It takes a hundred men to make an encampment, but one woman can make a home. I not only admire woman as the most beautiful object ever created, but I reverence her as the redeeming glory of humanity, the sanctuary of all the virtues, the pledge of all perfect qualities of heart and head. It is not just right to lay the sins of men at the feet of women. It is because women are so much better than men that their flasks are considered greater. A man's desire is the foundation of his love, but a woman's desire is born of her love. The one thing in this world that is constant, the one peak that rises above all clouds, the one window in which the light forever burns, the one star that darkens no quench, is a woman's love. It rises to the grandest heights, it sinks to the lowest depths, it forgives the most cruel injuries. It is perennial of life, and grows in every climate. Neither coldness nor neglect, harshness nor cruelty can extinguish it. A woman's love is the perfume of the heart. This is the real love that subdues the earth; the love that has wrought all miracles of art; that gives us music all the way from the cradle song to the grand closing symphony that bears the soul away on wings of fire. A love that is greater than power, sweeter than life and stronger than death."

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE.

Two Men.

I knew a man who went his way
Through fields God-lighted for the day.
By brooks whose song was but the word
Of peace to every heart that heard,
Through valleys dappled green and brown
Where wooing winds strayed up and down,
And Nature murmured sweet and clear;
"Bow low, wee man, for God is here."
And yet he built, for all to see
An altar cold as was his heart,
And worshipped there with bended knee,
Forgetful of God's pagantry,
"For this," he cried, "this is My Art."

I knew a man who little knew
Of lines of grace the artist drew,
But well he knew the holy ground
Where angel messengers are found,
Knew how the lark sang from above,
"Dearheart, dearheart, all life is love,"
And saw in nature, great or small,
All things of God, and God in all.
He knew so little, yet he knew
God's art is ever man's above,
And so full oft his soul withdrew
To hidden places 'neath the blue,
And worshipped there the God of love.

Little Fables of the Hour.

A certain Ruralist was the possessor of a Pointer Dog, and one day he addressed the creature with great bitterness, saying:

"Come here, Legislature, golden yee!"
Whereat the Pointer Dog did not go to him.
"What makes you call him Legislature?" inquired an Interested Spectator.

"Why, he won't point, an' he won't hunt, an' sometimes it almos' seems 's if he looks on burglars es his long-lost frien's, an' he mos' eats me outen house an' home, but he cost me 'nough to be valyble, an' his pedigree was guaranteed, an' so I allers kinder keep hopin' that he's goin' to do better; an' that's why I give him his name."

"Evidently you are a man of great discernment," responded the Interested Spectator, "and you do well to continue to hope the best of a Pointer with such a pedigree. Sic 'im, Legislature!"

But whether or not Legislature sicked 'im is not yet recorded.

Moral:—Even for a dog with a bad name it is never too late to mend, nor is it ever too early to hope for such amendment.

A Poor Wight was discovered sitting alone and weeping great, scalding tears.

"Wherefore weepest thou?" inquired a Sympathetic Friend.

"Alas, since this odious law went into effect I can find but little to do in my profession."
"What is your profession?" the friend asked.
"I didn't know you had one."

"I am a—that is—boo-hoo—I was a professional attache, but now—woe is me—I fear that I will be an—alas and alas!—an un-attache."

Wherefore, as the Sympathetic Friend could say nothing to comfort him in his black sorrow, he meandered on, leaving the poor fellow to his unattached grief.

Moral:—Sifting the best of laws, fundamental or otherwise, work great hardship on the unfortunate wight whose hand is out.

A certain Criminal who had led an Evil Career at last was overtaken by Majestic Law and immured in a Dungeon. Whereupon an Intelligent Reporter interviewed him.

"Alas," the certain Criminal sighed, "I am the prey of an Iniquitous Social System, the victim of Malodorous Interference in my Affairs."

"For instance, in what manner?" the Intelligent Reporter sympathetically inquired.

"Why, had it not been for prying Detectives, inquisitive Secret Service Men and Ruthless Police Officials I still might be pursuing my Glad and Care-free Career unchecked by Calous Minions of the Law. Alas, look at me now, and then deny, if you can, that such interference in the affairs of others should be sternly suppressed!"

Moral:—Congress is not alone in feeling that way.

Opinions of Rufus.

Strikes me that the feller what said marriage is the suicide of love mus' have had a tryin' matrimonial experience. I reckon that the alleged love that wears out in marriage mus' have been trav'ling under a alias when it was first met.

All Except Stuckenbruck.

Assemblyman Stuckenbruck of San Joaquin County will introduce a bill in the legislature removing the present protection from meadow-larks and permitting California's sweetest songsters to be killed.

It sang, and 'twas as heaven's door

Some angel hand had left ajar,

And from its portals straight did pour

Rare music borne from star to star.

It sang, and every dreamy vale

Went sweeter for its liquid voice,

And echoing hills took up the tale,

While zephyrs whispered low, "Rejoice!"

And all men joyed in thee, I ween—

That is, save Stuckenbruck, I mean.

Oh, breast of gold, thy limpid note

Is still more golden than thy breast,

And from thy tiny, feathered throat

Ring melodies of life the best.

There is no fairy vale so sweet

But thou dost make it sweeter still,

And elfin sprites of music meet

Where thou art found, to do thy will;

From care thou givest men divorce—

That is, save Stuckenbruck, of course.

I dreamed that Stuckenbruck was dead,

And straight his soul to Heaven went.

Right through the narrow gate it sped,

And wandered there in calm content.

He heard the wondrous chorus ring,

Proclaiming love that wanders both fair.

It leaves with me a bitter sting

To tell the rest of this brief tale:

Poor Stuckenbruck they had to fire—

He wished to shoot the angel choir.

Never a Winter at All.

Springtime, and Summer, and Autumn;
Then Springtime, and Summer, and Fall,
So the seasons run to the glint of the sun,
With never a Winter at all;
And Nature's the artist who tints the year,
But her somber colors she brings not here.

Song of the birds unceasing,
Lullaby of the breeze,
And flowers that nod from the dew-gemmed sod;

A world that is glad for these;
Each day like a maiden in robe imperaled
Who smiles to the smile of our Western world.

Over the hills is Winter,
For the hills is snow,
A world in the vice of the clutching ice,
With blizzards to work their woe;
But songsters and blossoms are with us yet,
And Winter's a monarch whom we forget.

Here 'neath the mighty summits,
Here by the Western gate,
Where the sunrays gleam on valley and stream,
And Autumn and Springtime mate,
Where bounteous Nature no more could give
Of peace and blessing, 'tis joy to live.

How the Saturn Being Kept Cool.

The Being from Saturn had returned from his trip to the Earth, per the Interplanetary Electric Line, and had assembled his family about him to tell them of his experiences.

"You must have had some narrow escapes," did you not, pa?" inquired his son.

"Yes, indeed; many of them," was the response.

"Tell us about them, pa."

"Well, I guess my narrowest escape was from the burning heat of the Earth. Being accustomed to our delightful climate, I found it tremendously hot so near the sun, and I should have tried had I not found a chilly place for myself."

"Where was the place?" his daughter anxiously inquired.

"Why, I hunted up a Democratic legislator who had promised to provide jobs for several attaches, and sat next to him. The atmosphere there seemed cool, even to me. Thus was I saved."

"But what happened to the legislator, pa?"

"He, too, was saved. The contemplation of ten dollars a day kept him from freezing to death."

Then the Being from Saturn went to the club, and the family meeting was adjourned until another evening.

Mistaken Credit.

If the writer of that beautiful poem, "I Should Like To-night," is living he must be filled with regret, and if he is dead his ghost must shudder, to know that this flower of his genius is floating about in the newspapers credited to Ben King. King did write a parody of this poem, a parody which bubbled over with humor, but it was no more comparable with that which it parodied than Wight is comparable with day. It is a strange and unfortunate mistake which has been made, and no excuse is to be offered for any intelligent person who is unacquainted with the name of the author of one of the gems of the English language. What is that you say? You want to know the name of its author? Well, I—where's that book of quotations? Borrowed by somebody? I regret that just at this moment I do not recall the name. Possibly it was too hasty in asserting that there is no excuse for the person who does not remember the name, but, just the same, Ben King did not write the poem. This was all I wanted to say in the first place.

MELODIES IN ::: MOODS :::

THE LAST CAMP-FIRE.

By Sharlot M. Hall.

Scar not earth's breast that I may have Somewhere above her heart a grave;
Mine was a life whose swift desire
Bent ever less to dust than fire;
Then through the swift, white path of flame
Send back my soul to whence it came;
From some great peak, storm-challenging,
My death-fire to the heavens fling;
The rocks my altar, and above
The still eyes of the stars I love;
No hymn, save as the midnight wind
Comes whispering to seek his kind.

Heap high the logs of spruce and pine,
Balsam for spices and for wine;
Brown cones and knots, a golden blur
Of hoarded pitch, more sweet than myrrh;
Cedar to stream across the dark;
Its scented embers spark on spark;
Long, shaggy boughs of juniper
And silvery, odorless sheaves of fir;
Spicewood to die in incense smoke
Against the stubborn roots of oak,
Red to the last, for hate or love,
As that red, stubborn heart above.

Watch till the last pale ember dies;
Till wan and low the dead pyre lies;
Then leath the thin white ashes blow
To all earth's winds a finer snow.
There is no wind of hers but I
Have loved it as it whistled by;
No leaf whose life I would not share;
No weed that is not some way fair.
Hedge not my dust in one close urn;
It is to these I would return.
The wild, free winds, the things that know
No master's rule, no ordered row.

To be, if nature will, at length
Part of some great tree's noble strength;
Growth of the grass; to live anew
In many a wild flower's richer hue;
Find immortality indeed
In ripened heart of fruit and seed.
Time grants not any man redress
Of his broad law, forgetfulness—
I partay not with shaft and stone,
Content that in the perfume blown
From next year's hillsides something sweet,
And mine, shall make earth more complete.

THE WORK OF

Allen's Press Clipping Bureau FOR PUBLIC MEN

Allen's Press Clipping Bureau has now had experience in six National and five State Campaigns. In this time it has had the honor of serving hundreds of public men, including members of the Cabinet, U. S. Senators, Congressmen, Governors, State Senators and Assemblymen, Mayors, and State and County Central Committees.

It has aided these men by bringing them quickly, easily, and cheaply, what the entire press has to say of them or the measures in which they are interested.

A thorough clipping service discloses the state and trend of public opinion, brings to attention false charges that should be denied, true charges that should be corrected, shows what editors need argument, and what editors need encouragement.

Short, aids in handling the most powerful and important of political engines, the Press. Having three offices, a staff of thirty people, and handling 2,000,000 clippings per week, we have no unsurpassed facilities for very high-grade and thorough work.

We can cover counties, districts, the State, or the Pacific States.

Other Stories of Emerson.

Ralph Waldo Emerson would sometimes resist introductions to lion hunters who did not interest him. "Oh, Elizabeth," he said to Miss Hoar, when she told him of some one who desired to meet him, "whom God hath put asunder why should man join to gether?"

Emerson preferred his poems to his prose, saying it was not he who wrote them, because he could not write verses at will. He could say at any time, "I will write an essay," but he had to wait for the call to write poetry. As he expressed it, "I can breathe at any time, but I can only whistle when the right pucker comes."

A pushing and vain young lecturer who came to Concord asked Emerson, who had been one of his hearers, for a letter of recommendation. "My young friend," said the philosopher, "do you not know there is but one person who can recommend you?" "Why, who is that, sir?" "Yourself."

Edward Emerson relates that one evening after a conversation where zealous radicals had explained that the death of Jesus had been simulated, not real, and planned beforehand by him and his disciples for its effect on the people, while he thereafter kept in hiding. Mrs. Emerson asked the sage, "Should you like to have the children hear that?" He said: "No, it's odious to have lilies pulled up and skunk-cabbages planted in their places."

Emerson was on his way to the town meeting and saw his next neighbor, George Minot, at work. He asked him if he was not going to cast his vote with all honest men for freedom. "No," said the honest Rip Van Winkle, "I ain't goin'." "It's no use a-ballotin', for it won't stay. What you do with a gun will stay so."

Motor Car Advance in Ten Years.

The automobile Show just closed at the Grand Central Palace, New York, called attention to the facts that motor cars have passed the experimental stage, that the newest cars are light, powerful, beautiful in lines and finish, nearly noiseless, and cheaper.

In 1898, 239 automobiles were made in the United States. In 1908, 52,000 cars, representing the employment of $198,000,000 of capital, were manufactured. Twenty-eight million dollars' worth of foreign cars were sold here last year, besides.

A scheme for founding scholarships for American women similar to the Rhodes scholarship for American men is being successfully worked out by Mme. Thayer, formerly chairman of the education committee of the Society of American Women in London. The first scholar to be honored is Miss Clara Howard, who was chosen on the recommendation of President Butler of Columbia University. She is entered for a year's post-graduate study at Girton.

Another falls greater than Niagara is the Iguaçu falls, almost at the intersection of the three frontiers of Paraguay, Brazil, and Argentina. It is more than 200 feet high, and two and a half miles wide. Nearly 14,000,000 horsepower could be generated here by electrical plants. These falls are 1,250 miles from Buenos Ayres.

He Wanted Pie.

William J. Ryan, president of the supreme council of public hackmen of New York, said the other day, according to the New York Times, that the winter stock flurry had reduced the hackmen's receipts considerably.

"We'll have to come down to English rates—12 cents a mile, instead of 30 cents—if we have many more such affairs," Mr. Ryan said. "Everybody felt the pinch. I overheard a tramp grumbling in a public square.

"'The trade ain't like it used to be,' he said. 'Here ten times running to-day I've asked for a bit o' bread, and what do they give me? Why, durn it, just a bit o' bread.'"

What's In a Name?

Two young men walked into a restaurant recently, picked up the menu and read this:

"Bear steak, $2.
At once they lost interest in everything else and instructed the waiter to bring them each a bear steak.

The waiter did.
For a while they ate in silence. Then one looked at the other.

"Say—what do you think of it?"

"Oh, pretty good—not bad at all."

"Quite—quite interesting sort of stuff, isn't it?"

"Mighty interesting."

Then they munched in silence for a little while longer. Suddenly he who had spoken first burst into laughter.

"Look here, old man," he exclaimed, "if this was plain steak and cost 50 cents we'd think it was the limit!"

"We would," agreed his companion, pushing away his plate.

And they ordered cold roast beef.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN.

Use For a Mother-In-Law. A great trade has been made because State Senator H. S. G. McCartney put his mother in law on the pay roll at $3 per day as senate porter. Let him who would not, if he could, make a porter out of his mother-in-law first cast a stone at McCartney. McCartney is as fine a fellow and honest a gentleman as wears the Southern Pacific collar in the upper house, only he has rated himself rather cheap. Pickings are probably meagre this session.

Petty Larceny an Insurance. Of course no one of sound mind will fail to understand that whoever draws one dollar, or three, per day from the State treasury without rendering an equivalent in service therefor is a larcenist, but petty larceny of that character has so long been the custom at our State Capitol that men practice it without qualms of conscience. Let not the people mourn overmuch because of this moral obliquity. Petty larceny is an insurance against grand larceny. He who commits the less will rarely commit the greater. He can't. He isn't big enough. Unless a big man can commit petty larceny by wholesale, as by stealing two pounds of wheat out of each of a million sacks, he will rarely touch it, and no one man can have any considerable number of mothers-in-law. The McCartney incident is important chiefly as showing how McCartney rates McCartney.

Eddie Wolfe Takes Hold. The State Reformatory prospect has improved since Senator E. I. Wolfe definitely promised to take the measure under his protection and put it through. He is a capable legislator and, inasmuch as there is no apparent reason why the Southern Pacific Political Bureau should oppose the measure, it should become a law. The railroads are taxed by the criminal class for their common benefit with much greater impartiality than the railroads tax themselves for the common good. It is to be anticipated, therefore, that railroad influence will stand for a reduction in taxation for the benefit of ordinary, predatory criminality. A State Reformatory should easily save its cost in this form of retrenchment in public taxation.

The L-R League In Legislation. The Lincoln-Roosevelt Reformatory League, as such, is not taking a very active part in shaping legislation in Sacramento this year, although its prominent members are hard at work for good laws and against bad ones. They are taking a hand in whatever organization needs the most. They organized and are sustaining the People's Lobby, they are fighting the battles of the anti-race track forces and they are standing for rational regulation of transportation companies in this State. It has seemed wisest to reserve the League itself for the supreme task of emancipating California from railroad domination, and wherever that issue comes up the League leaps into the gap and strikes blows that count. It has seemed better to centralize than to scatter effort.

Two-Cent Fare Legislation. So far as the railroads are concerned, it would be retributive justice if the State Legislature were to break away from control and enact a two-cent fare law. The companies themselves have few rights against the people or the legislature. They are morally bound to respect, but inasmuch as the people of California cannot long be prosperous when their railroads are unprosperous, a wise self-interest would restrain even a free legislature from resorting to retaliation or even drastic regulation. The Sanford rate bill will not pass. The legislature could not pass it if it would and it would not if it could.

Change of Methods. Formerly the State Board of Equalization made the rounds of the counties, to confer with the county assessors, in May and June, by which time the assessors had gotten their rolls well under way if not fully made up. This year the board has arranged meetings with meetings of assessors at Los Angeles, Fresno, Sacramento, Redding and San Francisco. The purpose is to secure, if possible (which it is not), a uniformity of valuation throughout the State. As long as California maintains a taxation system that puts a premium on "knocking down" on valuations in each county that detestable practice may safely be relied on as a constant quantity. Human nature is built that way and county assessors are very human.

San Diego Is Doing Better. Sometime since The Watchman pilloried the iniquity of Senator Leroy Wright's training with the Southern Pacific political machine on the ground that there hasn't been much but "organization" politics in San Diego County all along. The Watchman is happy to retract. Data at hand shows that for the last four years there has been an active, and nearly victorious, opposition to "organization" domination in San Diego County. In 1905 San Diego elected an anti-organization mayor. In August, 1906, at the Republican primaries, the Lincoln-Roosevelt ticket was beaten by only 400 votes out of 1,900 cast. In 1907 a non-partisan league, containing the same reform forces, was beaten in the San Diego municipal election by only about 300 out of 4,000 votes cast. In 1908 the Lincoln-Roosevelt League was beaten at the May primaries of San Diego County by about 100 out of 2,000 votes cast, and in the August State primaries the League was beaten by only about 200 out of 3,300 cast. In San Diego city the vote is so close that a change of less than ten votes properly distributed, would have given the free men control of the county convention. Therefore it is plain that Leroy Wright has trained with the organization because he is an organization man and not because he must otherwise have herded by himself. Glad to be corrected.

Gillis Wants County Libraries. State Librarian Gillis has proven a surprise. Having climbed into his official position by the patronage ladder he is accused of having pulled the ladder up after him and gone to work to make a real librarian of himself. Any dissatisfaction among politicians will be compensated by satisfaction among the public. Mr. Gillis holds that reading books is as much a source of education as studying books and that library systems in California should be as widely accessible as school systems. To this end he wants to give boards of supervisors power to establish county libraries with branches throughout the county. His plan is intelligently worked out and will be pressed upon the attention of the legislature.

Tinkering the Ballot Law. About the first thing the first settlers on this continent did after they got their "plunder" ashore and piled up under the spreading branches of an oak was to cast ballots and, although their descendants have been voting ever since, they have not found a perfectly satisfactory method of taking the consensus of opinion of the people. At least they seem to think so at Sacramento and a movement is under way to legislate out of the ballot law itself a provision for throwing straight party tickets that were voted into the law only a few years ago, for the reason that applying the little rubber cross to a selected ticket proved too much for bunglesome fingers and fat with the right to stand up and be counted through thick and thin for the sake of a grandfather should not be infringed without reflection. Holding the balance should be confided to those capable of selecting their ticket with intelligent discrimination, otherwise that balance will be held by the mischance of blind stains.

Equalization of Salaries. The boosting of the salaries of State officers by constitutional amendment, not within itself an untimely or improper thing to do, is to be followed by an all-around boost of the salaries of office attaches and attendants. If the omnibus measure providing for this increase of salaries could be accompanied by a strict civil service examination system, with promotion by merit alone, a moderate increase in the salaries of subordinate officers would not be unreasonable. There are over-worked and under-paid men in the State Capitol, as there are many over-paid and under-worked, and will be as long as the patronage system continues.

Committees on Public Morals. Lieutenant-Governor Porter is not to be blamed for committee on public morals as he did. It exactly represents his conception of public morals. At the head of it he put Abner Weed who was so far from being "nasty nice" in procuring alien Greeks to vote at Republican primaries as to steal his county from the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League by that method. Then there is Leavitt, who founds his fortune on the pool-selling infamy, and Eddie Wolfe, an out-and-out race track advocate. Savage is objectionable and Kennedy to The Watchman unknown. Stanton, in the Assembly, did better, but then Stanton is a better man. He is able to differentiate public morals from private snaps.

Fortunate Mr. Perkins. Mr. George C. Perkins will pass into history as California's first long-term United States Senator. He has been selected by a legislature that would have preferred some other man, and by the influence of a corporation political bureau that would have preferred another; and yet he has been returned to office, with practically unanimous approval, to represent a State that, while it likes him as a citizen, is not proud of him as a statesman. Fortunate Mr. Perkins! The favoring winds that filled his sails have kept them filled ever since, as a boy, he went before the mast. The Watchman is not, politically speaking, an admirer of Senator Perkins, but he ventures the hope that our senior Senator will disappoint those who have supported his candidacy in the expectation that he will not live out half his term. May he have the good fortune to fool 'em!

The bitterest taunt that Edwin Booth ever endured was given him in his later years one night on the stage when an actor in his support, whom he had offended, changed an exclamation in his part to "sic semper tyrannis," speaking it to Booth. These words were associated with Booth's life tragedy, for they were the words of his brother, John Wilkes, when he shot Lincoln. Booth was so overcome by the fling that he could not continue his performance.

"In these days a charitable shilling doesn't go so far as it used to and doesn't buy nearly so many God bless you's," says Dr. Samuel M. Crothers in his new book, "By the Christ-mas Fire." "You complain of the rise in the price of the necessities of life. It isn't a circumstance to the increase in the cost of luxuries like benevolence. Almost every one looks forward to the time when he can afford to be generous."

UP AND DOWN : : THE STATE : :

During the year just ended California farms produced 72,460 carloads of fruits and nuts, ranging from 32,700 carloads of oranges and lemons, and 15,500 carloads of other green fruits, down to 260 carloads of almonds. This was a daily average of 232 carloads.

Judging from articles contained in the Santa Cruz papers, the question of prohibition versus license of some sort will be left to the decision of the voters in that city this spring.

ROOSEVELT ON THE GRIDIRON

The Gridiron Club, of Washington, D. C., is composed of the Washington correspondents of the leading newspapers of the United States. Once a year the club gives a banquet, attended by the President, the cabinet officers, and most of the other highest conspicuous members of the government. At the banquet the foibles of the great are mercilessly burlesqued in their own presence.

The last banquet was held on December 12th, last, in the ballroom of the New Willard hotel. President Roosevelt was the most liberally joked guest. The New York Sun printed the following amusing account of the affair:

When President Roosevelt arrived, at about 10:30 o'clock, the principal skit of the evening was performed. This was devoted to Mr. Roosevelt's prospective African hunting trip. The lights were switched off and from the gloom came the voice of President Henry, announcing:

"We are now in darkest Africa," while roars and growls of wild animals were heard on every side. Then the lights came up with the announcement, "Sudden sunrise in Southern Senegambia," and the guests found before them a tent on which was the sign "The Look-out." The tent stood in a tropical jungle. In front there were discovered an orderly in khaki and pith helmet, a Zulu chief who stood guard with a spear and a mysterious person who wore a label "Auditor" and carried a bell punch.

The rattle of a typewriter was heard within the tent and then, a voice saying, "Here, secretary, take this." Then followed "Scribner's Magazine, New York. Victoria Nyanza, April first. The Lion is a wild and ferocious animal." At this moment it was discovered why the auditor was in the party. He registered each word with his bell punch and totted the amount, at a dollar a word, after each sentence. Thus the dictation, which was going on furiously in the tent, sounded about like this:

"The Lion is a wild and ferocious animal." "Eight dollars!" shouted the Auditor. "It has a soft body and a hard face." "Seventeen dollars." "It is the king of beasts and its daughter is a princess." "Twenty-nine dollars." "The lion roars like distant thunder." "Thirty-five dollars." "But it is nobody's business, what its religion is." "Forty-four dollars."

This dictation by the man in the tent of a story for a magazine and the thrifty spirit which prompted the placing of an auditor to keep track of all the words used, at a dollar a word, caused tremendous laughter.

Dictation of the story was stopped by the shout from within, "Wait a minute! I will kill something!" followed by a shout in the tent. The Zulu chief, who had been standing rigidly outside the tent, came suddenly to life and dashed away, returning almost instantly with a small skin which he held up and which was photographed with elaborate ceremony. It was identified as a "bongo" by the man in the tent, and immediately a story about the "bongo" was dictated for the magazine while the auditor kept accurate track of all words used. Another shot brought in a whifflebuff, which was described for the magazine after a new typewriter had been secured, the strenuous dictation about the "bongo" having broken the other. Two shots were fired after the story of the whifflebuff was completed, and the Zulu brought in a large elephant and a large donkey. These strange animals shot in the jungle were described in an illuminating manner by the man in the tent after they had been photographed and mounted.

Meantime the auditor had kept accurate account of the words used. Later a despatch to the Lookout was begun, and the auditor started to count the words in that at a dollar a word, but was told to stop.

"Keep out!" said the man in the tent. "You have nothing to do with this. This is my salary."

The despatch to the Lookout was much enjoyed. Its tenor was that while the writer had gone to Africa to avoid any semblance of interfering in the Taft administration, still he had a few ideas he desired to express, and perhaps it would be well for Mr. Taft to heed them. The despatch followed President Roosevelt's style and bristled with phrases he uses. The second typewriter broke down with a loud whirr in the middle of this despatch. "Get me another typewriter!" shouted the man in the tent.

"There are no more typewriters, sir," the auditor announced.

"Then," announced the man in the tent "then I am going home."

METCALF OF CALIFORNIA

By THE WATCHMAN.

California's most distinguished national character has returned to Oakland, to retire, he declares, from public life. Victor H. Metcalf is the only Californian who has held a cabinet office at Washington, except Judge McKenna, who was attorney-general under President McKinley for a short time, and he is the only Californian who has ever held two cabinet positions.

Has Mr. Metcalf really retired for good? Can he retire? There are those who point out that he is so nearly ideal as an "organization" candidate for the United States Senate or for Governor of California that it will be hard to pass him by or for him to refuse to serve. He is a man of personally clean record and he has the prestige of his national career. On the other hand, these prophets say that he is temperamentally and by association in sympathy with the organization.

The men who prophesy Mr. Metcalf's return to public life are politically weather-wise, and, in view of their prediction, it is worth while to consider his career and character. They may soon become of great public importance. They are less known than those of almost any man of equal importance in public life.

Victor H. Metcalf was born in Utica, N. Y., in 1853. Part of his education was received at an academy in Utica, and his preparation for college was completed in a military school at New Haven, Conn. In 1872 he entered Yale, and received his degree of Bachelor of Laws in 1876. The same year he was admitted to the bar in Connecticut, and the following year in New York.

For a short time he practiced law in Utica, but in 1879 he came to California, settling in Oakland, where he has made his home ever since. Three years after his arrival here he married Miss Emily Corbin Hildorn.

It was as one of the members of the law firm of Metcalf & Metcalf that Victor H. Metcalf was long known to the people of Oakland. The partner was George D. Metcalf, who was not a relative. It appeared that nobody in town knew which Metcalf was the head of the firm and which was the other end of it. Both partners were quiet, industrious men, and no attorneys stuck to business better or succeeded better. They were not in evidence in any spectacular way, in court or elsewhere, but they enjoyed the name, the good lawyers and built up a good office business. Victor Metcalf became a director in several local corporations and was making money at the time when the call came for him to go into politics.

Before that call came he was often talked of for nomination to the city offices, but he did not seek them, and they did not come hunting him in the manner in which honors did later on. There used to be people in Oakland in the old days who, on several occasions, wanted to put Metcalf up to run for mayor for the reason that he was not mixed up with any of the contending factions in the Republican party; but people of a different point of view said that was just the reason why he should not be nominated—that a man who did not take interest in the street, who had no say in any side or policy in local affairs was not the man to be chosen as head of the city government. He was not aggressive in any way. He devoted himself to his law business, alternated between his office, the Athletic Club home, and his home, and was very well content to mind his own affairs. He was the essence of dignified, courteous conservatism. His white necktie matched his gentlemanly manners. A weakness of the eyes caused him to recognize few people on the street, from which arose a popular idea that he was snobbish—an idea, however, that seems to be unjustified by the facts. He was simply not a "mixer." He had his warm friends, whose company he enjoyed, and he was contented in his social pleasures largely to their society.

These friendships explain much of Mr. Metcalf's political bent. His most intimate personal friends were the Henshaw brothers, so intimate that when Mrs. Metcalf was out of town Mr. Metcalf carried a latch-key to the Henshaw home and was treated as a member of the family, and the Henshaws the same. The Henshaws were, and are, "organization" politicians, with all that the phrase implies. Through their activities Mr. Metcalf was brought out into political life. It is only fair to him to say that he never personally employed organization methods in his political campaigns. But he was elected to public office by the work of organization men using the most offensive organization methods, and he could hardly, in the nature of things, have been ignorant of what others did in his behalf. Here, however, as in most of the phases of his career, his attitude was negative.

Membership of Congress was the first office Victor H. Metcalf held, and he obtained it by displacing S. G. Hilborn, who had held it for some years. Those were the days of the long contest over C. P. Huntington's railroad refunding bills, and Hilborn was one of the California members who voted consistently against the interests and desires of the big chief of the Southern Pacific. In 1896 Judge A. M. Frick was picked out to defeat Hilborn for the Republican nomination, but it was a very one-sided primary fight, and Hilborn was returned.

In 1898 the fight on Hilborn was renewed, and this time Victor Metcalf was chosen to make the contest against him. The anti-railroad sentiment was on Hilborn's side, but Metcalf was more personally popular, all the politicians supported him to a man, and the Huntington people left no stone unturned. It was a memorable primary contest and long left disagreeable memories, by reason of some of the things which were done; but when it was over Metcalf had won the nomination.

He was elected as a matter of course, for in the third district a nomination is the whole battle. At Washington fortune favored him, because by this time the refunding contest had settled itself, and Congressmen Metcalf was not put in the embarrassing position of having to vote either for or against the powerful interests which had done so much to put him in office. He was fortunate also in impressing favorably the Eastern members of Congress and in getting good committee assignments. His quiet ways and gentlemanly manners stood him in good stead then and afterwards. Eastern men, whether members of Congress or Presidents, like best Californians who are not too Californian.

Fortune was again kind to Metcalf when he came to make his fight for re-election. The person who came out against him was the redoubtable Henry P. Dalton, so long the county assessor of Alameda County. Mr. Dalton, in many campaigns, has proved that he is an excellent assessor, no matter what ticket he runs on, or whether he has a ticket or not. But as an aspirant for Congress Mr. Dalton was not taken seriously by the voters of Oakland and other Alameda County towns. Later on when it came to his third race, Mr. Metcalf had no competitor.

In July, 1904, he resigned his seat in Congress to go into the cabinet as Secretary of Commerce and Labor. President Roosevelt seems to have selected Mr. Metcalf for this post on the same ground on which President McKinley selected Judge McKenna for attorney general. Both Presidents believed it would be good policy to recognize the Pacific Coast; California was the great State of the Pacific Coast; what was desired was to find a Californian who had not aggressive and self-seeking views in regard to oriental immigration and other things—in other words, a Californian who was a pretty good Eastern man; McKenna filled the bill in one instance and Metcalf in the other.

His service as Secretary of Commerce and Labor ended on July 1, 1904, to December 10, 1906, and his service as Secretary of the Navy from December 17, 1906, to his resignation last fall. The naval post was the one which Metcalf really desired from the first.

He had become interested in naval matters at an early day in his congressional life, because the navy yard at Mare Island was the principal Federal establishment in his district. He was probably not specially attracted to the work in the other department, important as it was, and when the opportunity came to be transferred to the other post he grasped it. Nevertheless, his work as Secretary of Commerce and Labor appeared to command the respect of subordinates in that department.

Into the Navy Department he carried the same methods and habits of conscientious work that he had shown in the other department and which he had always exhibited as a lawyer. These habits are admirable in the dispatch of routine details, but they are not the characteristics of a bold and original statesman. Here, as always, Mr. Metcalf proved himself a painstaking plodder. He originated no ideas of importance in the administration or organization of his department.

It is probable that President Roosevelt knew him well enough not to expect anything spectacular or daringly original, for that is not in Metcalf's nature. He is the temperamental opposite of Roosevelt, and it is difficult to believe that the latter ever felt that the California member of his cabinet was a very thorough believer in his policy. Especially in the prosecutions of big corporations it was unlikely that he was at heart a Roosevelt man.

Some of his friends in California, however, have recently noted what they believe to be a significant change in his mental attitude. His long association with President Roosevelt seems to have aroused within him a quickened moral consciousness that has lately come to the surface, notably in his address at the Key Route Inn when the fleet visited San Francisco last year. In this address Mr. Metcalf took a stand for civil righteousness; and in private conversations since he has declared his intention to work for the moral regeneration of public life. His friends believe this to be a sincere awakening; that to-day he would not consent to enjoy public office that was obtained by the methods of, say, his first election.

This new attitude illustrates again, in a curious way, the negative quality that seems to persist in Mr. Metcalf's character. His entry into public life was not of his seeking; he was led. His administration of his cabinet department was negative, not original. His awakening to the moral import of civic righteousness was through the powerful personal magnetism and leadership of President Roosevelt. His championship of the cause of civic righteousness in his resignation from office, extending only to a public acknowledgment that this cause is right. He has done nothing actively to advance that cause, and, judging from his temperament and his past record, he seems not likely to do anything unless under the leadership of a more dominating personality who believes in it too.

Newspaper stories appeared from time to time representing that disagreements had taken place between the President and Metcalf, but it does not seem probable that the disagreements went very far. Metcalf would not set up his own views against those of his chief very much even if he disbelieved in the latter. The explanation of Metcalf's resignation which is most plausible is that Roosevelt wanted some man in the head of the Navy Department during the closing months of his presidency who would make a better representative of the big stick. It is, furthermore, true that Mr. Metcalf's health has been bad for so long that fully a year before his resignation from the cabinet he told friends in private conversation that he intended to resign before the President's term expired.

A fair estimate of the man who may again come into public calculations seems to be this: a clean negative, a clean personal record, an unimaginative public career, an associate of undesirable political influences, but without their positive political vices—in short, a respectable, hard-working and painstaking but not forceful public official.

THE GRAFT CASES

After nearly twenty months of waiting, confessions and recantations on the part of the guilty, trials ending in acquittal and trials terminating in conviction, bribery and attempted bribery of jurors, the dynamiter's evil work, attempted murder and suicide, the San Francisco graft cases have reached their culmination in the trial of Patrick Calhoun under an indictment charging him with bribing former Supervisor Fred P. Nicholas in behalf of a franchise for the United Railroads.

The public already has been convinced, as divers jurors have been, that the former supervisors were bribed in the financial interest of the United Railroads and other corporations. What remains is to determine whether or not the law, through its judicial machinery, will decide that this bribery was accomplished without the knowledge and assistance of officials of the bribe-benefited corporations. Other graft cases in plenty will be tried, but this is the climax of them all, the one which is to determine whether the law has terrors and penalties for the bribed but none for the bribe-giver, if he be sufficiently "high up."

The trial of Patrick Calhoun began last Tuesday, and although it is believed that it will be expeditious as compared with the Ruef trial, it is probable that it will occupy Judge Lawlor and such jury as may be empaneled for a month to come at least. That it will be fought with all the legal skill available is indicated by the fact that Mr. Calhoun will be represented by A. A. Moore, Stanley Moore, Lewis F. Byington, William Abbott, Alexander King, and Earl Rogers, while the prosecution will be represented by Assistant District Attorneys Francis J. Heney and John J. O'Gara. It will be seen that the attorneys for the prosecution are decidedly outnumbered by those for the defense, but Francis J. Heney is a host in himself, and Mr. O'Gara is adding to his laurels with every case he tries. The work of securing a jury will still be in progress when this issue goes to press.

Mr. Heney returned from his Eastern trip last Monday evening, and was greeted at the ferry building by a large number of sympathizers with the prosecution who assembled to bid him welcome and goodspeed. That the people, both women and men, thus turned out, notwithstanding that a heavy rain was falling, was one of those straws which show how the current of popular sympathy sets toward the prosecution in these cases. The false and iniquitous sentiment manufactured by purchased publications is at low ebb.

The defense asserts that it will interpose no technicalities in this trial, and the people who desire to see justice done could ask nothing better than adherence to this policy. It may be noted, however, that even in the earliest stage of the proceedings the taking of exceptions by the defense began, and so it is to be feared that the promise concerning technicalities is to be taken with mental reservations.

At the close of last Tuesday's proceedings in the case against A. S. Newburgh, charged with attempting to bribe a prospective juror in the Ruef trial—that is, after eight days of effort—seven jurors had been secured to try Newburgh, and Judge Murasky announced that thenceforth the jurors would be placed in the custody of the sheriff and locked up in the St. Francis Hotel. He assured the jurors that this action was taken not because anybody suspected them, but in order that they might be "removed from contact with everybody," which, in a case wherein it is alleged that jurors were not removed from contact with everybody, seems reasonable enough. The labor of securing a jury presumably will be in progress when this paper goes to press.

William W. Coffey, former supervisor, was arraigned in Judge Dunne's court last Tuesday, on three charges of accepting bribes: First, $4,000 in behalf of the United Railroads; second, $3,500 for the Home Telephone Company, and, third, $750 in the interest of the gas company. Coffey was represented by his attorney, Franklin P. Bull, and was granted until Saturday, the 16th inst., to plead. It is expected that his trial will take place soon.

The case of John J. West, an attorney, charged with corruptly attempting to influence a juror to vote for the acquittal of Abraham Ruef, has been transferred from Judge Murasky's court to that of Judge Cabaniss, and his arraignment was continued until the 14th inst.

Abraham Ruef, the arch-bodder of them all, was granted an extension of time until next Monday in which to prepare a bill of exceptions in his case. It is understood that a final decision concerning the time to be granted him for this purpose will be made on the designated date.

To Study Sociology Abroad.

Mr. Arthur J. Todd, of San Francisco, and his wife, will sail from New York on January 21st, for Marseilles, France, by way of Genoa. Mr. Todd is widely known as former Chief Probation Officer under Judge Murasky, of San Francisco, and is deeply interested in social problems. His term of office as probation officer, beginning shortly before the fire and ending by resignation last April, was marked by efficient service and wise counsel upon which the judge of the Juvenile Court leaned heavily.

Prior to the fire Mr. Todd was engaged in settlement work at South Park. He is a graduate of the University of California, and a writer of forced articles for the magazines on settlement and reformative work.

This voyage to Europe—the second or third he has made for purposes of study—will occupy a year or two. He will study charitable and social reform work in Marseilles, Lyons, Orleans, Tours, and Paris, especially charitable institutions for children and the juvenile courts. This latter subject is especially well-known in France, where nearly every issue of the magazine "L'Enfant" contains articles upon its practical workings in the French cities.

Mr. Todd will visit England and inspect the juvenile courts of London, Liverpool, and Birmingham, and the probation system in operation in twenty-five cities of the United Kingdom. Following this, he will enter for one semester at least in the sociological courses at the University of Jena, in Germany. The following winter will be spent in Italy, where children's courts are in operation in Rome and Milan.

Mr. Todd will write articles on foreign comparative phases of his specialties, for publication in the American magazines, and The California Weekly hopes in the near future to publish some of these results of his researches in European child-reform movements.

An Oversight.

"Then," said the teller of the thrilling war story, "the intrepid general swung himself on his trusty steed," says the New York Times.

The listeners leaned forward.

"And plunged through fire and smoke onward where duty called him."

The suspense began to grow breathless.

"About him scores of men dropped dead or wounded."

The suspense finished growing breathless.

"But still he galloped onward erect and fearless. At last he reached the front ranks. He waved his sword. With a wild cheer the shattered ranks closed up. Led by that intrepid man, they advanced. Everywhere the enemy gave way before him. The day was won. He had snatched victory from defeat."

"I beg your pardon," remarked one of the audience.

"How's that?"

"You mean from 'the jaws of defeat,' don't you?"

The story teller bowed gracefully.

"I do. You are quite right. I thank you for the correction."

And the stickler for correctness in metaphor leaned back in his chair, well satisfied with himself.

"Out of Sorts."

When a printer buys an outfit of type he gets, besides his filled cases, a reserve supply of each character that has not yet been sorted into the cases. From time to time, as he has much type standing so that it is unavailable for new composition, he draws on this reserve supply of "sorts," as they are called. If, in an emergency, this reserve supply is exhausted, he is naturally much put out. He is "out of sorts" in two senses. Hence the expression that has passed into common usage.

A CABIN of rough logs decorated with skins of animals tacked up outside to dry, a chimney fashioned clumsily from stones, sticks and mud, a quarter of a mile of pretty, green mountain meadow stretching down to the river rushing roaringly by the base of a lofty domed mountain rising nearly half a mile almost sheer from the river's bank, mountains all around and, but for the river, silence everywhere—that is Runkles.

A man who had always been thin and had once been tall, but whose height had been lessened at least half a foot by a symmetrical curve of the spine from termination to medulla oblongata, making him neither stoop-shouldered nor hunch-back, but forever wearing that long crouch supposed to be indicative of rascality, sharp face and thin chin whiskers, eyes twisted and visage askew, grim, taciturn, uneasy, ramshackle—that is, or was, for he is now dead, Richard Runkles.

Persons who in the old days visited Kern River Canyon and lakes, did not fail to come in contact, and generally in conflict, with "Old Dick." He had spied out, pre-empted, settled upon, fenced and guarded two beautiful meadows above Kern lakes, and so controlled about all the pasturage above the lakes, the mecca of all their hunters, fishers and mountain-climbers of the Upper San Joaquin Valley. He had a good thing, imposed all the traffic would bear (and the traffic will bear a good deal fifty miles in the mountains from the nearest base of the Sierras), and he was, finally, adversely, continuously and under a claim of right, until long after the statute of limitations had run; until, in fact, death had tardily claimed him. His funeral was not attended by people from the west-side of the range, but it met with the approval of the valley.

There probably exists no portrait of Old Dick. To have taken a snap shot at him with a camera might have been to risk a snap-shot in return, but not from a camera. It was uncharitably said of him that he owed the twisted condition of his eyes to the constant introspection which comes of living all sole alone and finding nothing inside more worthy of contemplation than a disordered stomach.

Winter after winter Old Dick had spent alone in the midst of that vast, solitary wilderness, half a hundred miles from any other living human being, walled in by impenetrable avalanches of snow, the solemn stillness unbroken save by the roar of the river, the crashing of avalanches, the cries of famishing beasts, the barking of his dogs or the hoarse snarl of his own querulous tones. Some winters he spent over about Lone Pine, others he spent by the lakes, but wherever he was he enjoyed his own society best.

There runs a story that Old Dick's winter solitude was broken in upon just once. The narrative is not clear, for it passed from hunter to sheep-herder and from sheep-herder to tourist, but, anyhow, this is the way it reached the valley.

A hunter on the western slopes of the Sierras in search of deer and belated bears in early winter got confused among the snow-covered peaks, the timber and the thick chaparral, took down the wrong water course in the dusk and ended in the trackless mountains. All night he picked his way down that stream, never doubting that it would bring him out upon the foothills of the Western Sierra and that he would be able to see the great valley of the San Joaquin when morning broke, but in this he was disappointed. In the gray dawn he saw only snowy summits and ridges, a sky leaden and dull, stunted pines and tamaracs, but no sign of civilization. He ate sparingly of the meager lunch in his hunting bag, took his course by the shapes of the mountains and plunged forward as nearly westward as he could determine and traveled all day—due east. He was a vigorous man, and despite the fatigue of travel of the preceding day, made good progress, and that night, after having eaten a venturesome gray squirrel he had shot, burrowed into the snow at the base of a castellated crag and slept. Up at dawn he scaled the crag and looked eagerly for signs of the termination of the wilderness, but the wilderness was interminable. Everywhere the sky and the mountains came together and shut out hope.

RUNKLES OF RUNKLES'

By TOBIAS BLACK

Written for The California Weekly.

Only this there was to catch at. The parting of the mountains far away disclosed the probable location of a more considerable stream, and the hunter rightly concluded that Kern River Canyon must be there. He knew enough of geography to know of the lakes 2500 feet below, and buoyed by the hope that he might there find stray cattle, or sheep and so prolong life he marked his course and struggled forward.

By midday he had reached the brink of Kern River's great and picturesque canyon, and far down in the bottom of it, locked in ice and snow, were the river and the lakes, but no vestige of any green or living thing save the pines and the firs drooping with snow. Death from hunger or cold or a pistol ball seemed the only alternative, when out of the solemn stillness of the wintry wilderness there came to the astonished ears of the lost hunter the deep-chested barking of dogs. There could be no mistake. No mountain wolf could make such a sound, and quickly after there was the clear report of a rifle shot. Deliverance was at hand.

Half running, half sliding, our hunter plunged down the friendly slope of a contributing water course and was soon plodding wearily up the floor of the narrow canyon, a mere rift in the mountains a half mile in depth, and in vain at nightfall (for night falls early into the depths of that gorge) came in full view of Runkles'.

And what a welcome! "Halt there! Drop that gun," Old Dick, clad in furs and with rifle at his shoulder, his crooked eyes straightened out along its gleaming barrel, had stepped from the open door (while two Great Danes leaped out of the door beside him), and had drawn a bead upon the half-famished and all but exhausted supplicant at his door. "Got any pistol about you?" Drop it, then. Any knife? Drop that. Now walk this way. Halt! Who are you and how did you get here? A hunter, hey? Lost, hey? Blamed likely. Hunters know better than to venture this side of the range in winter. There are a hundred chances of getting covered with fifty feet of snow to getting this far alive. I take it that you are a train-robber or murderer or both, and have taken the chance of getting over the range rather than face the certainty of hanging out in the valley.

In vain the hunter protested his innocence of crime, and almost so that he implored mercy to a perishing man, but after a long parley he was told to come into the cabin, was given a seat in the chimney corner and warned not to leave it on pain of instant death at the hands of Old Dick, who stood over him with a double-barreled shotgun.

A pot of pork and beans was heating on the crane, and soon the half-famished man was devouring the savory dish, together with hot coffee and warm bread out of the Dutch oven on the hearth.

Old Dick was lowering and taciturn, but ever watchful, and repelled every advance his visitor made toward conversation, and by and by ordered his guest to "trust in" the corner, at his own bed in the corner, but all night Old Dick sat by the fire in his roughly fashioned easy-chair, keeping guard, while his big dogs, equally watchful, sprawled at his feet.

With the first peep of day the stranger was roughly awakened and ordered to eat his breakfast, and when he had eaten Old Dick delivered himself as follows: "Stranger, it is just this way. Your story is mighty improbable, and yet may be true, but angel or devil, you can't winter here. There isn't more than enough grub in the shanty to last me and the dogs until we can get out of here in the spring, and no human has ever stood by me like those dogs have. If supplies run low again, I'd kill you or you'd kill me, or we'd have to kill the dogs, and those dogs shan't be killed. You might as well perish in the snow as here, but you have come tolerable straight so far, and maybe your blizzard sickness will carry you over the rest of the range to Owens River Valley, when you will probably be caught, taken back to Visalia and hanged, but that is none of my business. There is a knapsack there with a ham and some bread, a bottle of whiskey and some matches. Your shooting-irons will be left here for fear of your slipping back and plugging me when I am not looking. I'll start you, and if you mosey right along and the good weather lasts you'll get to the valley in two or three days. If a storm comes on you are a dead man anyhow, and I shall make short work of it with that knife. It is a hardyallop, but there is no other way, so get a move on."

With a heavy heart but well-rested legs the hunter strapped on a pair of snowshoes, took up his pack and with a sharpened pole for a staff started out. Old Dick hard behind him with shotgun in hand to show the way. Minute directions were given as to how to get out of the canyon, where to turn and how to get down the eastern slope, and with a parting warning not to turn back on pain of being shot on sight and his body buried in the bottom of the lake the stranger toiled up the mountain, while Old Dick and his dogs watched him. "It was him," "It was him or me or the dogs, and I'd be blamed sight rather it would be him," the inhospitable Runkles muttered to himself as he turned toward the cabin.

That night Old Dick was awakened by the roaring of a mountain storm. The wind came howling down the canyon and the flying snow so filled the air that, looking out of the door, it was impossible to see through the moonlight, the great dome across the valley, yet almost overhead, and the cold was intense. "It was him," "It was him or me or the dogs, and I'd be blamed sight rather it would be him," the old fellow muttered as he crawled under his blankets and robes and composed himself for sleep, which came only fitfully all the night through. "Time and again he was awakened through the night by the howling roar of crashing avalanches sliding from the beetling cliffs and falling into the narrow canyon, and each time took a stout pull at his ever-convenient flask and dozed off again.

Old Dick was up before light in the morning, and looking out found that the storm had partially abated, but the air was ever so cold and still filled with cutting particles of blowing snow. He aroused and fed his dogs, ate his own breakfast, put a light, broadly shod and stanchly built sled over his shoulders, strapped some robes and blankets and food upon it, likewise his rifle, and taking their harness from a peg on the wall spoke to the dogs: "Come, Monache; come, Tiger. We'll go where there's no more snow. There's no snow of earth, or snow, rather, or if he is coming back this way to be shot. It's him or me or you fellows, and I'd be blamed sight rather it would be him," and the two great dogs stepped to their places like trained horses, bent to the burden and led the way.

By daylight they were toiling round and round, back and forth, but ever up and up the mountain side over which the heavy hunter had struggled the day before, and after three hours of hard work were making good progress along the comparatively level valley of Whitney Creek. For another three hours they saw no trace of the hunter, the drifting snow having obliterated all tracks, but an hour before noon Old Dick gave vent to a curse more than usual, a ferocious expletive with, "The fool has gone to the left side of the valley instead of the right, and if we don't find him he's a goner sure." There in the snow were the hunter's thrushholes from the long pike he carried. Further on there were places where he had fallen, and he had crooked and turned round and round and back again on his former path, showing that he had become

The Harpers announce a new edition of Mark Twain's "The Prince and the Pauper."

Arnold Genthe has just published by Moffat, Yard & Co., "Pictures of Old China town."

The Zangwill of America is Ezra Brudno, whose novels of Jewish life in America are widely read.

"Charles Egbert Craddock" (Miss Murre) is still writing successful fiction. Her latest is "The Fair Mississippian."

Lily Langtry, "the Jersey Lily," has turned from the footlights to the press, and has written a novel to be published shortly.

The first book to be illustrated by color-photography will be "The Motor Maid," by the Williamsons, published next month.

Charles Battell Loomis, author of "Cheerful Americans" and other humorous books, looks like a walking advertisement of a tombstone factory.

Dr. David Starr Jordan was elected president of the American Association for the Advancement of Science at its recent session at Baltimore.

Rudyard Kipling's newest book, soon to be published, deals with the period when aeroplanes will be common. It is called "With the Night Mail."

Paul Elder & Co. next month will return their publishing department from New York to San Francisco, from which it was moved after the fire.

John Uri Lloyd, the novelist, has made enough money as a manufacturing chemist in Cincinnati to be able to afford to write even poetry if he likes.

Henry Wallace Phillips, who set the world a-laughing with "Red Saunders," has re-emerged from obscurity with a new one—"The Mascot of Sweet Briar Gulch."

Dr. Dudley Fulton, of the University of Southern California, is the translator of Cohnheim's "Diseases of the Digestive Canal," just published by the Lippincotts.

Mrs. Humphrey Ward recently visited America, and the result is a novel of American life, "Marriage à la Mode," beginning serial publication in this month's McClure's Magazine.

Mrs. Willson Woodrow, whose appealing stories in McClure's have given her a wide audience, got her literary "color" from some years' residence in a mining camp near Leadville, Colo.

James Hopper has collaborated with Fred Reholdt in writing a sequel to Hopper's "9009," the sequel purporting to be the true story of a reformed convict with whom the authors lived in a cabin to get their data.

George Sylvester Viereck, whose "Nineveh, and Other Poems" electrified the critics with the promise of a new great poet—and rather shocked the reading public—claims to be a member of the Hohenzollern family that rules Germany, by a morganatic marriage of a former Kaiser.

Psychical research, or "spook lore" as the irreverent call it, is getting a considerable boost in the recent publication of books on the subject here and abroad. H. Carrington's "The Coming Science" and "The Psychic Phenomena of Spiritualism," Camille Flammarion's "Mysterious Psychic Forces," and J. H. Hyslop's "Psychical Research and the Resurrection," are all recent contributions to this much discussed subject.

"Runkles of Runkles" (Concluded).

hopelessly confused. Such places were encountered more frequently during the next hour, and by and by turned off abruptly toward a clump of tamaracks under the brow of a craggy hill.

Faster now Old Dick and the dogs made their way over the crusted snow and soon came to the clump of timber, and there, against a fallen log, half reclining, half lying, hazy conscious, but still breathing, was the hunter, rapidly succumbing to that treacherous but blissful drowsiness which precedes death by freezing, and which, in this instance, was traceable to a too frequent reference to the flask with which Old Dick had provided him. He was not a drinking man, but, like many others, had an exaggerated idea of the strength and added endurance contributed by use of alcoholic stimulants, and had taken so much as to stupefy him at a time when his life depended upon the preservation of his best faculties.

Quickly now Old Dick snatched the robes and blankets from the sled, and bidding the dogs lie down on either side, wrapped hunter and dogs up snugly and warm, the animal heat from the dogs doing much to restore the animal heat to the hunter's body. Then he set about building a roaring fire, making some coffee and warming some of the food brought, so that by the time the hunter began to revive he had hot coffee to pour down his throat and food to give him. The coffee sobered him and the food revived him, so that he was soon partially himself again, though his feet were touched with frost and his joints were stiff and sore. All night he had struggled against the terrible storm, knowing that it would be death to falter, and daylight had not only found him lost once more and quite exhausted but partly inebriated, a condition all the more easily attained in that high altitude, where liquor quickly affects both heart and brain.

The way back to Runkles' was all down hill, and with the light sled and the dogs to haul the luggage, and sometimes the hunter too, when the snow was hard and the slopes gentle, the distance was quickly covered, but all the way Old Dick said nothing, plodded doggedly along, and finally came to the cabin door. Bidding the hunter go in, and stir up the embers and put on more wood, Old Dick unharnessed his dogs, and snatching up his rifle instantly sent a ball crashing into the brains of each of them. Two shots, two seconds and all was over. "It was you or me or them," he said. "There wasn't enough for all, and if you turn out to be the criminal I suspect you are, though you don't exactly look it, I shall wish to my dying day it had been you, but you were human and they were only most human."

But the hunter was neither a robber nor a murderer, and when Old Dick and he went out in the spring as early as it was safe to venture forth he was welcomed as one risen from the dead.

Runkles is dead, and "Tennessee" now quarrels with campers who come to the lakes to hunt and fish, and they do say that the tanned skins of Monache and Tiger are still stretched on the floor of the old cabin at Runkles'. And they say, too, that in a little cemetery over at Lone Pine a simple marble slab marks the last resting-place of Old Dick, and that it bears this inscription: "He sacrificed the two best friends he ever had that a stranger might live, and in him God found good."

NEW REMEDY GUARANTEED TO CURE CATARRH

So confident are the makers of its certain curative properties that they will let you try it free.

Remedial properties in vegetable life have recently been discovered by a local experimental chemist which have proven extraordinarily successful in curing refractory cases of catarrh. The remedy is in liquid form, easily applied or taken, and is at once efficacious, simple, not distasteful, and above all absolutely free from any deleterious substances. It is Nature's remedy, as many cases of catarrh of various kinds and intensities have proven. It is especially recommended to those afflicted with frequent coughing spells in vain efforts to expel clinging phlegm. Not only is this discharge stopped in a short time, but the remedy unflinchingly seeks the seat of the disorder and eradicates it, thereby thoroughly clearing the system of insidious catarrhal attacks that may threaten the ears, eyes, stomach and other organs. As a remedy for curing distressful headaches from the same cause it has no equal. So confident are the makers of the curative properties of this new vegetable compound that they will not only guarantee its efficacy and refund the cash on any purchase if no cure is made, but they will send free samples for trial. "It's Morgan's."

I came to a mill by the river side,
A half mile long and nearly as wide,
With a forest of stacks and an army of men
Toiling at furnace and shovel and pen.
"What a most magnificent plant!" I cried,
And a man with a smudge on his face replied,
"It's Morgan's."

I entered a train and rode all day
On a regal coach and a right of way
Which reached its arms all over the land
In a system too large to understand.
"A splendid property this!" I cried,
And the man with a plate on his hat replied,
"It's Morgan's."

I sailed on a great ship, trim and true,
From pennant to keel and cabin to crew,
And the ship was one of a monster fleet;
A first-class navy could scarce compete.
"What a beautiful craft she is!" I cried,
And a man with akimbo legs replied,
"It's Morgan's."

I dwelt in a nation filled with pride,
Her people were many, her lands were wide,
Her record in war and science and art
Proved greatness of muscle and mind and heart.
"What a grand old country it is!" I cried,
And a man with his chest in the air replied,
"It's Morgan's."

I went to heaven. The jasper walls
Towered high and wide, and the golden halls
Shone bright beyond. But a strange new mark
Over the gate, viz., "Private park."
"Why, what is the meaning of this?" I cried,
And a saint with a livery on replied,
"It's Morgan's."

I went to the only place left. "I'll take
A chance in the loot on this brimstone lake.
Or perhaps I may be allowed to sit
On the griddled floor of the bottomless pit."
But a leering lout with horns on his face
Cried out, as he forked me off the place,

"Times to be Real" is a volume of Mr. Cooke's characteristic verse. Price, $1.00.

A "Poem" By Bill Nye.

Bill Nye was a great satirist. One of his best and characteristic efforts was the poem which he wrote as a satire, not on "the strong pool," but on the fallacy that Mr. Nye used to read these lines, wearing white gloves with fingers lengthened by padding, holding a large bunch of book-ends tied with blue ribbon, and with a face absurdly serene. "And a few awkward gestures and an occasional spasmodic effort to swallow something in the throat and have a picture of Mr. Nye as he read."

The Autumn Leaves.

The autumn leaves are falling,
They are falling here and there,
They are falling through the atmosphere,
And likewise through the air.

They are falling o'er the graves of kings,
And o'er the parent's tomb,
They are falling in the morning-tide,
Also in the afternoon.

They are falling o'er the bridegroom
That dwells in beauty's bower,
And also on the bride herself,
And statesman in his power.

They are falling o'er the widow's heart
That beats so sad and low;
Oh! The autumn leaves are falling,
They are falling to and fro!

Times of change are times of trouble, but if the end of change be just, the mind should be steadfast to endure it. Regrets, discouragements, uncertainties: these are inevitable, but remember that the worst pains of travail precede deliverance.

SHEAR WIT

Little Mary was being spanked as her brother entered the room. "Eddie, go out!" she cried. "Can't you see we are busy?"

"Enter that item of soothing syrup under the head of hush money," absent-mindedly ordered the Tammany boss to his clerk.

"Tell you what 'epitome' means, children? Certainly," said the Sunday school teacher. "Epitome" is in its signification synonymous with synopsis.

"This watch will last you a lifetime," remarked the jeweler. "Nonsense!" retorted the customer. "Can't I see for myself that its hours are numbered?"

Mrs. Jones does not know yet the guile of her husband who persuaded her to name their first-born girl "Tetanus" because he said it meant "quiet," or "reserved."

Mlle. Petit, the dainty French teacher just over, was asked to regale a social gathering with a song. She bowed, "I will do my—ch, what you call—my dumbest, yes."

Stranger—"Can you direct me to the Blank hotel?"

Policeman—"I can, sorr; but I've no grudge agin ye, an' I won't"—Chicago Tribune.

"Lady," answered Plodding Pete, "you means well, but you can't make work sound any more invitin' by usin' words of three syllables."—Washington Star.

"Convert that cannibal!" exclaimed the manager of the side show to the benevolent minister. "Holy smoke! Do you suppose the public would pay a dime to see a Christian?"

The theatre filled with smoke. The comedian, "there is no danger if you don't reassure. "Confound it, ladies and gentlemen," he shouted, "do you think I'd be here if there was any danger?" The panic collapsed.

"Where you going?" "To the hospital; I heard that Cholly was taken there suffering with brain fever." "I'd like to bet with you." "What?" "Either that it isn't Cholly or it isn't brain fever."—Houston Post.

"Ah! proud beauty!" exclaimed little Sniffkins, "you spurn my love now, but, let me tell you, I will not always be a clerk. I—
"That's so," interrupted the heartless girl, "you may lose your job."—Philadelphia Press.

As the huge cloud of dust followed an auto, the German said: "There goes our emperor."
"How do you know?" inquired an Englishman.

"Who else could raise such a dust?" was the reply.

The railroad conductor sadly chided an old acquaintance whose fare he had frequently "knocked down" by one-half. The friend presented a half-rate excursion ticket: the conductor said, "Don't you know that I can afford to haul you much cheaper than this company can?"

"What are you doing with that red lantern?" inquired the policeman suspiciously.

"Taking it home for a souvenir," replied the late pedestrian. "Just been to a church shishib and had to be in a tableau. Yes, I represented temperance, shir, and stood up on the track with this lantern tryin' to flash demon run as she come down the track. Demon run fixed up like train—big headlight. But I flagged her."

New York Lodge, No. 1, of the Elks, will dedicate, next Christmas, 1909, a new twelve-story building at Nos. 108 to 116 West Fourth Street, which will contain a lodgeroom with seating capacity of 1,000, a theatre with capacity of 575, billiard rooms, bowling alley, restaurant, and 125 guest rooms. Grounds and building will cost $1,000,000.

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

The Foundation for Government.

Let it never escape the mind of the student of citizenship that the written documents of government are not the government, but only the instruments through which government works. The Constitution of the United States has no more relation to the government of the United States than the musical score of a symphony in front of the performers bears to a symphony rendered by a great orchestra. The sheets of written music are necessary to the rendering of the symphony, and the Constitution of the United States is necessary to the government of the United States, but only as a vehicle for expressing the purposes of the people of the United States.

The real constitution of the nation is to be found in the constitution of American character and American ideals. This character and these ideals were inherited from a long line of liberty-loving, self-reliant and resourceful ancestors and developed in an environment that made every man the architect of his own fortune. If these facts are often reaffirmed it will be because no progress in citizenship can be made without weaving them into the warp and woof of our civic philosophy.

The men who made our Constitution were strange admixtures of materialists and dreamers. They had experience with practical politics, but nearly all of them had drunk of the intoxicating sophtistics of Rousseau and Montesquieu. As soon as they left beaten paths they were in the air. They were, almost to the last man of them, aristocrats. They had little real faith in the common people and had it not been that, whatever form of government they turned out, had to be submitted to the people for adoption, our constitution would have provided almost a pure aristocracy. What part of popular power is left in our constitution is due to this negative, or veto, power of the people which could not be taken away from them.

In the discussions in the convention one accepted axiom of government was often asserted and seldom disputed. That governments must either rest upon force or upon influence. Government by force alone led to tyranny and oppression. Government by influence alone led to corruption, chicanery and cabal. Love of power and human selfishness were regarded as the only constant factors to be relied on and, therefore, it remained to the framers of our constitution to play the ambitions and covetousness of men off against each other in such a systematic way, and so adroitly as to prevent any one department of government overreaching another.

Little was said during the debates of the power of a sustained public conscience, of the value of an informed public sentiment, of an innate love of justice among the people, of an unselfish devotion of many to the common good. It was Rutledge of South Carolina who declared that, "Interest alone is the governing principle among nations and if the northern States consult their interests they will not oppose an increase of slaves which will increase the commodities of the South of which the ships of the North will become the carriers." No one seems to have joined issue with him. On the contrary the carriers of the North and planters of the South side-stepped the slavery issue in the Constitution in obedience to the declaration that "interest alone is the governing principle" in governments.

The makers of our Constitution were by no means sanguine of the success of their enterprise, notwithstanding the declaration of Doctor Franklin that the sun painted upon the walls of the hall back of the president's chair was a rising and not a setting sun. Eldridge Gerry described the situation in Massachusetts by affirming that there were two political parties in that State. One of these was violently "devoted to democracy, the worst of all political evils, and the other as violent in the opposite direction." He saw no prospect in his State except for civil war and believed other States to be in a similar situation. The constitution as adopted by the convention afforded him so little hope that he refused to put his name to it, as also did Edmund Randolph and Colonel Mason of Virginia.

These facts are stated to show that the golden era of free government was not that of the constitution builders. With all its faults and limitations our own time is more golden than any time preceding ours. We have an incorporated phylarchy to confront and it is dangerous, but we have it on the run and the American people know their power and are not likely permanently to surrender government into the hands of the Standard Oil corporation and its far reaching ramifications.

Do You Hear Well?

The Stolz Electrophone—A New, Electrical, Scientific and Practical Invention for those who are Deaf or Partially Deaf.

MAY NOW BE TESTED IN YOUR OWN HOME.

Deaf or partially deaf people now may make a trial of the Stolz Electrophone at home. This personal, practical test serves to prove that the device satisfies, with ease, every requirement of a perfect hearing device.

This new invention renders unnecessary such clumsy, unsightly and frequently harmful devices as trumpets, horns, tubes, ear drums, fans, etc. It is a tiny electric telephone that fits on the ear and which, the instant it is applied, magnifies the sound waves in such manner as to cause an astonishing increase in the clearness of all sounds. It overcomes the buzzing and roaring ear noises and, also, so comfortably and electrically exercises the vital parts of the ear that, usually, the natural unaided hearing itself is gradually restored.

THE PLEDGE OF CITIZENSHIP

I, a citizen of the United States of America, realizing that a free Republic is an impossibility unless the citizen performs his civic duty, hereby pledge myself upon my sacred honor never to fail to exercise my right of citizenship by voting at every election, primary or secondary, wherever it is possible and legal for me to render that service to my country, my health permitting me so to do.

In taking this pledge it is distinctly understood that I in no way obligate myself to vote for any particular party, any definite candidate or any certain measure. I am binding myself only to my Country, and pledging myself solely to the faithful performance of the duty I owe to her as a citizen.

WHY TAKE THE FOREGOING PLEDGE?

Those taking the foregoing pledge, signing and sending it to this office, will be enrolled upon The California Weekly's "School for Citizenship," which will be a permanent feature of this paper. It will entitle the person sending in his name to have answered, either through the columns of the paper or by letter, any rational question he may ask concerning public affairs, and, generally, by the person best equipped to afford the desired information. It will also entitle the signer to such special literature bearing upon the obligations and opportunities of good citizenship as may from time to time be issued. While this pledge is open to persons of all ages it is especially desired that it be taken and sent in by young men lately become voters or who will cast their first votes two years hence. It will take but a moment to clip out the pledge, sign, enclose in an envelope, stamp and address to "School for Citizenship," office, The California Weekly, 26 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, and it opens the way for a liberal education in citizenship.

THE STATE AND THE JAPANESE.

President Roosevelt has once more intervened between Japan and the State of California. Doubtless, if the intervening has to be done, the president is the man to do it. And doubtless, also, if California is about to indulge in any wantonly offensive or demagogic legislation somebody ought to call a halt. But nevertheless, California can never consent permanently to subject the regulation of its domestic affairs to the caprice of Japanese sensitiveness. If there are to be Japanese in this country at all, their presence will raise problems which we must be free to deal with, and even to deal mistakenly with. There is a limit to the exploitability of material which we can afford to have around us, and if this Japanese question is liable to go off at the slightest touch, then the only possible policy is not to have any Japanese question. President Roosevelt is right in saying that a state which has no power to make war ought to refrain from acts which might provoke war. But it is also true that a nation which is powerless to regulate our domestic institutions ought not to impose on us an institution which it will not permit us to regulate. A Japanese exclusion law ought not to be necessary. But it will be made necessary if the condition of Japanese admission is an inflexible punctiliousness such as no free people can guarantee, and such as we are not compelled to exercise toward any other question. If the Japanese want to get on in good nature with us, the first step should be the reform of some of their hair-trigger ways.

As to the actual bills proposed, there is no question that some of them have gone too far. There is no need to exclude Japanese from the schools. The only ones of them who are objectionable can be as well excluded by local school-board regulations putting an age limit on attendants in the primary schools. Also there is no occasion to restrict the places where Japanese may live—though Japan, until recently, restricted the places where Americans might live. But we can see no objection in principle to a bill restricting the right of aliens to own land. Japan has such a law, and so have several American states and the District of Columbia. When Illinois passed such a law, for the avowed purpose of breaking up the Scully land holdings, there was no howl of protest from England, and no intervention by the president. The principle is a well-established one, in national and international law, and for Japan to object to it seems like an acute case of megaloccephalic hyperaesthesia.

This is not a case of hysteria; still less for petty demagoguery. It is a matter to be treated with dignity and self-restrained firmness. It is a matter even to be temporized with, if that is the practical thing to do. But this Japanese question is going to be with us permanently, and it is going to have permanently some Californian aspects. And California must not surrender the right to deal with this question, in its domestic aspects, just as it does with all other questions. If the Japanese question is dynamite, then it must somehow be isolated, like dynamite. If it is to take its place among other questions, then it must lose its dynamite quality.

Assurances received from the President are such as to make it clear that there is no pressing need for anti-Asiatic legislation at this session of the legislature. A little more time may well be given for our national policy to work out anticipated results. That policy may even remove from us the whole Japanese issue. Therefore, without surrendering any of its rights or prerogatives, California may safely rest on its oars, watch the course of events attentively and be prepared to act intelligently and decisively when the time for such action comes, if it does come.

THE GOOD ROADS ISSUE.

There are those who seem to feel that a state out of debt is like a farm without a mortgage, lacking in interest and incentive. It was Frank Short of Fresno who, at the extra session of 1906, insisted that California could not recuperate from the losses entailed by earthquake and fire unless the state took on $10,000,000 in bonded debt, and his insistence carried the measure through the senate, but California is $10,000,000 better off to-day than it would have been had Mr. Short gotten his panacea through the assembly and by Governor Pardee. A big state debt is not in itself a public good.

It would be well if California had a state system of highways for automobiles and their tourist occupants to trundle over. That is the essential purpose of the Governor's eighteen million dollar measure unless it have an ulterior purpose more political than material.

There are two principal, pressing places of need for good road building: From the farm to the nearest shipping station, and through the mountain districts where there is not sufficient taxable property either to afford to build needed roads or to keep them in repair after they are built.

The counties and communities can, if they are taught how (and teaching them how should be a function of the roads department of the state engineer's office), build and maintain good roads from farm to shipping point, and will have it to do even after the eighteen million dollars have been expended.

As to the second sort of road for the building of which there is a pressing need, the proposed new road from Sierra Valley to Marysville is a case in point. The Sierra Valley is shut off from the outside world during a good portion of winter. State aid is required for laying out and building a good highway to the Sacramento Valley. No such road can be built without the state building it and maintaining it when built. Hundreds of miles of such roads are needed in different portions of the state. Another instance is through Trinity county and into Humboldt, connecting the Sacramento valley with the Coast.

Then there is the need for opening up to travel the interior of the Sierra mountain system, the Switzerland of America. If tourist travel is wanted, here is the place to invite it to come, not to trundle through our valleys where railroads are abundant and electric lines multiplying. A reasonable bond issue for building good highways where they cannot be built unless the state builds them might not be amiss, but it is not certain that such roads cannot be built as fast as needed, or as fast as a roads department can build them, without a bond issue. A few cents of state road tax might meet such requirements.

Moreover road building has not become a science in California. It is all experimental. Scarcely two consecutive miles of valley road can successfully be built in the same way. It will be time enough to take hold of great road-building enterprises when small ones have been successfully handled.

It will be well for the legislature of California to go slowly with the Governor's pet scheme for bonding the state to the gunwales. Let the system of taxation for the state first be rectified to the end that the people may know where the road bond burden is likely heaviest to fall. And there should be some hesitation, at least, about placing the expenditure of $18,000,000 of public money in the hands of a political administration dominated from New York and in a special rather than a public interest.

THE EXTRA-EXTRAORDINARY.

Time was when the Sacramento and San Joaquin systems of rivers could pour their united floods into the great interior valley of California and work little injury. Their waters spread out over unobstructed plains and into capacious basins to deposit their burden of mountainine fertility and then drain off into the bay as clear water.

Then came the enterprising, pushing, home-hunting American! Singly or collectively, white men leveled the spreading waters off onto other white men, singly or collectively; built fences, embanked roadways, constructed railroads, bridges and filled the river beds with sickens from the mines. They did all the things that could be done to render destructive and terrible, floods that before were innocent of harm.

In the work of flood defense at first only the ordinary was provided for, then the extraordinary in inadequate measure, but the extra-extraordinary was left out of consideration as "never likely to occur again," and yet there is nothing more certain than that what has occurred once will occur more than once. Generations may come and go between recurring meteorological events, but they will recur.

There is nothing more important to California than the regulation of these interior river systems. The task is gigantic, but it must be accomplished. It can be. The world is waiting to be shown how such problems may be wrought out. It is a man's job.

But the regulation of these interior river systems cannot be accomplished until the whole system, including every considerable branch of every considerable river, is treated as one system from origin to debouchment into the bay. It must be treated as a canal system in charge of a single superintendent, with telephone stations at every strategic point and some watcher in charge at every head-gate to the end that every channel shall be prepared to handle its maximum flow when the extra-extraordinary emergency arises.

As a first step toward a successful administration of this pressing internal improvement individual, and even associated, initiative and effort must sink themselves in a self-forgetting concern for the common good. It will be just as indispensable to the success of this work as the sinking of local concerns was indispensable to the building of this nation.

Meantime no bridge should be built across any stream without first having secured the approval of the engineering department having the river rectification work in charge. The bridges at and near Sacramento are a menace to the capital city and they are splendid evidences of the penny wisdom and pound folly of the builders. They are low and their piers offer a maximum of obstruction to the stream with a minimum of safety to the capital invested. There are three times as many of them as there should be and it is heedlessly proposed to build more to further retard the flow of the waters and obstruct navigation. If a single bridge across the Mississippi at St. Louis can accommodate the travel that comes to it how self-evident it must be that a single bridge across the American, and another across the Sacramento, at Sacramento, can be made to meet all requirements.

GENELEMEN OF THE JURY.

Whatever there may be, in other departments of our judicial system to justify the claim that we are governed by law and not by men, that theory is shaken when it comes to the practical work of our jury system. What governing the juries do is done by men and not by law. It is beneficial that it is so. It ties to the fact of everyday living a judicial system that, otherwise, must inevitably go ballooning after impractical subtleties of ratiocination.

The theory is that juries shall be so selected from the commonality as fairly to represent the sentiments of the commonality, that the verdict of a jury shall be such as public sentiment would render if it were as well informed as the jury becomes after hearing the case at bar. If juries were so selected there would be small reason to complain of jury verdicts, even though not in harmony with the conclusions which cold law, uninfluenced by warm-blooded humanity, might reach.

But the selection of a jury has now become a struggle to "stock" the cards, load the dice, predetermine the verdict, and so render all the other proceedings farcical. The more certain the guilt of the accused the longer will it take to secure a jury and the more desperate will be the effort to prevent the selection of a jury representative of the citizenry.

Society owes no obligation to the accused that entitles him to this advantage. If public sentiment is divided, after being fully informed, the jury trying the issue will be divided and result in a disagreement, not in a conviction.

Efforts to fix a jury are nearly always made in the interests of the defense, rarely if ever by the prosecution. This wrong more certainly needs righting than any other connected with our judicial system. In comparison with it the strained interpretations of technical courts are unimportant, and intricate procedures become mere hindrances. A packed jury is such an overthrow of justice as leaves it prostrate in the mire.

With a jury taken from the commonality, and fairly representative of it, justice will often enough miscarry because public sentiment will often enough temporize with wrong-doing and condone it because sanctioned by a too prevalent custom. This is not seriously to be complained of. It only emphasizes the truism that the quality of justice meted out in any community can never rise above the standard of conscience and manhood in that community, but there is ground for demanding that it shall rise to that standard. Bearing these facts in mind the observer will be able to judge righteously regarding any case by noting how long it takes to empanel a jury to try that case.

MURDER AT AGNEW.

Report has it that a contractor engaged in reconstructing the State hospital at Agnew is scamping his job. That this report comes from a representative of organized labor, complaining of open shop methods, does not discredit it. It only suggests a possible bias that should prompt a more than usually careful scrutiny into the facts.

Nathaniel Ellery, State Engineer, will be found competent to get at the facts and resolute to expose them. His one failing is that he permits the political powers that be to select subordinates for him instead of insisting upon selecting them himself, and nothing but harm can come of that, but he will not permit the State to be cheated, or the lives of the wards of the State to be jeopardized, if he can avoid it, for he knows as well as any man can know that jerry building of public institutions means murder.

On the morning of April 18, 1906, one hundred and twelve persons met their deaths at Agnew Hospital. It is safe to say that one hundred of these were murdered by the contractors and workmen who built that institution. Nothing made of bricks and mortar could have stood uninjured on that ground through that earthquake, but had the floors remained in, and the walls been properly constructed, few fatalities would have resulted even though the institution might have had to be rebuilt. It would have been entirely possible to take the walls of the main building down from roof to foundation course without using an implement more strong than a ten-cent screwdriver.

The architects of that institution were at fault, but the builders robbed. They did worse than to rob. They murdered hapless beings by the score that they might illicitly gain an added profit. Particeps criminis were the men who threw bricks into the walls anyhow to get them in rather than take the time to embed them even in the faulty mortar that was provided. Not until the Day of Judgment will the authors of this iniquity stand as nakedly exposed as they stood after that disaster and, unfortunately, not until the Day of Judgment will they receive the punishment that is their due.

It is not yet time to condemn one charged with seeking to repent this offense against God, humanity and the State of California, but if that time shall come as a result of careful investigation, then may the dogs of wrath be let loose upon him and no mercy be shown. To allow a repetition of the same monstrous offense to be committed upon the same ground would make the State of California party to the infamy. That must not be. It is one of the disadvantages of concrete construction that the owner may be cheated almost under his own eyes, or while his back is turned. Therefore the greater vigilance! Governor Gillett owes it to the State to suffer no guilty man to escape, as well as no innocent man to be falsely accused of so heinous an offense as a sham construction of hospital buildings.

THE ISLAIS CREEK ISSUE.

Elsewhere in this paper will be found a carefully prepared setting-forth of the proposed Islais Creek extension of the harbor facilities of San Francisco. It may be doubted if the people of California so little understood any other amendment to the constitution submitted to them at the last election. It is within the province of The California Weekly to investigate such issues and place the matter before the public, pro and con, as fairly as possible. There are some personal and corporate interests selfishly involved in the determination of this issue that will bear watching, but in the main such disagreements as there are to be attributed to differences of opinion as to what is best. Sound judgment is required in the premises. That San Francisco will soon need additional wharfage facilities is obvious. If not supplied on the San Francisco side of the bay they will be supplied on the Alameda County side. This may not make a great difference to the State, or to the commerce of the Nation, for ship and car are going to be brought together somewhere, but the difference to San Francisco will prove important. A clear statement in relation to the matter is due the public in advance of legislative action upon it.

Better Would Hide than Pride.

The rumor that H. C. Frick has been pricked in a sore spot, because the swains of Pittsburgh did not turn out to dance by the light of the moon when his daughter Helen held her coming-out festivity, is not to be discredited even though denied. Ever since wealth began to be possessed unequally in the world those who have had it have desired one thing more—social recognition by the smart set for the female members of the household. It has generally been sought for at the tips of the fingers of royalty, and there is a likelihood that Frick will look for it there. Piqued at Pittsburgh he will marry his Helen to some titled nobody from Europe if he has to give ten million dollars to boot. See if he doesn't.

A Much Needed Concession.

Oscar Hammerstein may not do all that he is advertised to do, but if he reduces the price of grand opera tickets during a portion of the year, so that persons of moderate means can afford to attend, he will set an example that other cities should follow. It is on the artistic side of life that Americans appear to least advantage and this will continue to be so until persons in moderate circumstances can afford to hear something better than rag time melodies.

Foreign Commerce Lighter.

Uncle Sam's balance sheet shows a falling off in foreign trade during the last half of the calendar year recently closed. That was to be anticipated. The slump of securities in October, 1907, put a bounty on exports and, for half a year, the increase of exports and decrease of imports were tremendous. That could not long endure. It is impossible always to sell unless we sometimes buy. Normal trade is reciprocal trade. As we begin to buy more largely we shall begin to sell more largely. There is no occasion for alarm.

Why Not Bryan?

The American Federation of Labor retained Judge Alton B. Parker to take leading charge of the case of Gompers, Mitchell and Morrison on appeal from the decision of Judge Wright. Why Alton B. Parker? He is a higher-up by instinct and tradition, whereas William J. Bryan would be able to pour out his latest heart throbs in the cause of freedom of speech and liberty of the press. Perhaps, however, it may have been determined that this is an issue of law and not of polemics!

To Impress Foreign Born Citizens.

Over the country preparations are making for a proper celebration of the hundredth birthday of Abraham Lincoln. Three main reasons are offered for putting forth this effort, a desire on the part of those who remember Lincoln to do honor to a well-loved hero, a wish to impress the importance of that colossal character upon the generation that came into being since the passing of Lincoln, and a desire to impress upon our foreign fellow citizens the importance of the man and his life to the home of their adoption. These reasons are so good that the cities of California should bestir themselves fitly to celebrate the centennial of Lincoln's birth. There is no better safeguard for American institutions than an indwelling love of Lincoln, and unless those born under alien skies love him, too, that safeguard will not become the reliance it ought.

Football Not the Worst.

There were more than twice as many killed while playing baseball last year as in football, the exact figures being 39 to 18. This should give the strictly American game of baseball renewed popularity in our great universities and a distinct preference over the milk-sop importation from England. How are the relative merits of these diversions to be judged if not by their casualties?

Pure Buncombe.

It was President Stickney who declared that he could believe anything a railroad manager might say about anything except railroad management. It has seemed prudent in the eyes of transportation managers never to tell the truth, about transportation management, when a falsehood can be made to answer the purpose. The statement of Commissioner Franklin K. Lane, to the effect that the rulings of the Interstate Commerce Commission requiring railroads to publish the railroad portion of the rate to the Orient has not and need not, cost the railroads or the ships the loss of a ton of freight, goes far to confirm the statement of President Stickney. When any public interest manifests a preference for darkness rather than light, and for prevarication rather than the truth, it is time to turn on the light and lay buncombe bare to the bone. It may be needful to subsidize our merchant marine, but a policy of falsehood on the part of shipping interests will do little to make the word "subsidy," already taboo, sound sweet in the American ear.

Racing to Mexico.

The word has gone out that if California closes down on the racetrack fraternity it will pack its baggage and betake itself to Mexico. Good riddance. California can stand it if Mexico can. Once over the border it will only be needful for Congress to shut off its use of the telegraph, to outlaw that form of robbery as effectually as the lottery has been outlawed. The United States needs a more convenient dumping ground than Honduras. If Mexico wants the moral sewage of America let her have it. California does not.

Little Willie Willett.

Lambasting the President has become so popular in certain quarters just outside the gates of Hades that Little Willie Willett thought he would try it. No doubt the gray wolves of both houses patted him on the back and said: "Good boy, Willie," but suppose the President should take notice of the incident, suppose the great mastiff should deign to take a nip at the yelping poodle, where would he skurry to get out of harm's way?

How Much May They Make?

Considerable discussion is going on as to how much net profit public service corporations may legitimately make. Mr. Harriman says, "All they can." That is simple, direct, intelligible and suggests the equally intelligible retort, "As little as possible." The general manager of the Pullman Car Company says, "Fifteen or twenty per cent." The Supreme Court of the United States has just said, in the eighty-cent gas case, "Six per cent. where there is a monopoly." The financial understanding is clearing.

As They Do In Texas.

Texas undertook to legislate monopolies out of the Lone Star State. Prophets of evil declared that Texas would ruin itself, that the great corporations would withdraw from Texas and leave nothing behind but the shuck. Texas is still on the map. Bailey of Texas, who obliged the Standard Oil, is a has-been. He is going to New York where the atmosphere is more conducive to the health of one of his susceptibility to catching coughs, colds, snubs, brickbats and other things. And now the Waters-Pierce Standard Oil Company has been irrevocably mulcted in the sum of $1,600,000 for violating the anti-trust laws of Texas. Texas is on top, and California may well profit by her pugnacious example.

The Deeper Significance of Living

Two men once found themselves occupants of a compartment in a railway car in England. One, an intelligent man, sought to engage the other in conversation. He sounded him upon about everything in his own repertory of interests, but to no purpose until, exasperated, he exclaimed: "My good friend, I have done my best to find your field of interest, but without success. Will you not therefore tell me what you are interested in?"

"Well," his companion drawled, "if you know anything about belt leather I can talk with you about that." So they talked about belt leather the rest of the journey.

More hurtful than poverty, more harmful than illiteracy, is a narrow range of human interest. The second man in the car compartment was prosperous. He had given his life to the business of dealing in belt leather and had been successful, but outside of that interest he was an ox.

From babyhood to senility there is scarcely a waking moment when something does not appeal to our brains with the purpose of stimulating, first, interest, and then thought. Baby talk is the hope of the world. When our fond mothers (foolishly as many think, but more wisely than sages know) chattered to us, made grimaces at us and sought to throw into their own faces all the powers of feeling they possessed, and so finally taught us to distinguish papa from the bedpost or towel rack, they were laying the foundation for our future intelligence and usefulness. They were trying to induce us to "take notice," and whoever goes through life without taking notice is a clam, and there is no health in him.

In the causes which lead to insanity hereditary tendency comes first. Next comes the excesses of the licentious life, and next to this comes that narrow range of interest which leaves nine-tenths of the brain unused and wears the rest like the path that a horse makes tethered to the end of a power sweep, deeply grooved, narrow and in a circle. It is killing.

A broad range of interest is a powerful aid in moral uplifting. Wanting such a range the tendency is to live a purely animal life, satiate the passions and glut the propensities; but if the days of life can be filled to the brim with varied and wholesome interests character has an anchor to windward that temptations will seldom drag, no matter how blows the storm. As a motherly matron of a reform school declared, "If you get the badness out of a boy you have got to put goodness into him in place of it. 'Taint natural for no boy to stay empty."

The embittered life is the narrow life, as it is the undrained pool that stagnates. It is a principal source of dependency among the aged. Homes for the aged are filled with persons whose kith cannot endure them because of the flavor of wormwood that communicates whatever they know. Therefore they are hustled off to some "home" where attendants are hired to tolerate them. There are thousands of human gall-bladders in hospitals for the insane throughout the United States who are not insane, but only so embittered that there are no other places to put them, and they became embittered through a narrow range of interest. The sky and earth came together too close and hedged them in. They were Prisoners of Chillon without knowing it. A broadened and sympathetic range of interest is as essential to the mental and moral health as a varied dietary is to the health and pleasure of the physical being. The one is to be as much reached out for as the other, and is as much to be sought by the head of a family, for the family, as housing, clothing and wholesome food. It has not been valued at its true worth.

Much is said of fads in teaching, of burdening courses of study with frills, the insistence being that less should be taught so pupils may be drilled in elements—a fine road to the narrow range of interest that kills. Our faddists build better than they know. Teach the elements, then open wide the windows upon God's wide world.

THE WORLD AT LARGE

Another Ocean Bridge.

The success of W. H. Flagler in spanning the distance between the southern extremity of Florida and Key West, or at least his fair prospect of success, has prompted the British East Indian government to plan for connecting the island of Ceylon with the tip end of Hindustan. Aside from a number of channels winded will need to be so bridged that ocean traffic may pass through, there will be one stretch of thirty-eight miles of disconnected coral reefs to be joined together. It is estimated that the work will cost $8,300,000 where labor is cheap and abundant. The purpose of the expenditure is the development of Ceylon and especially of Colombo, the fourth or fifth port of the world in point of ocean tonnage passing in and out of the harbor, by hitching island and city to the hinterland.

Boneless Chucks.

Secret Service agents of the Government have unearthed a well-concealed but far extended system of rebates by railroads paid to the beef trust in the form of under-billing of goods. It is said that, under the guise of shipping "boneless chucks," "cheek meats" and "shank meats," the highest grades of meats have been shipped from the packing houses to Atlantic coast cities in open violation of law, and to the detriment of honest competitors. Until such evasions of law are punished as smuggling, their equivalent, would be punished, rebates will continue to be given and received. A few terms in prison will stop it.

Locating the Capital of Australia.

Although the Australian federation has been striving for several years to agree upon a location for the capital of the federation it is only recently that even an approximate location has been determined upon. This much, however, is settled, it will be located in the Yass-Banberran country between 2,000 and 3,000 feet above sea level, nearly 200 miles southwest of Sydney and about 400 miles from Melbourne. The district is attractive and healthful, but better suited for grazing than for agriculture, except as irrigation may be employed.

From 'Scapegoat to Hero.

It is not impossible that the death of Admiral Rojestvensky may transform him, historically speaking, from a national 'scapegoat for the Russian navy to a national hero very near to the hearts of Russians. It would appear that he had sought to take upon himself the burden of blame for the loss of his fleet and to hold as free as possible his subordinates. The nation knows well enough that the responsibility lay with the Russian higher-ups, the middle-some grand dukes of the empire, although they might reasonably concede that a share of it at least lay with Admiral Togo and his little brood of fanatics whose country taught them how to fight instead of how to graft. The real fault was that the Russians failed to make good.

Honest With Each Other.

The governors of the Stock Exchange in Wall street are facing Governor Hughes' probing into their methods, by special commission, with unflinching courage, even gloating in the fact that bargains covering millions are made and carried out by the wink of an eye, the nod of a head, the speaking of a word, even when the result of it may prove disastrous indeed. It is not so much how those men deal with each other as how they deal with the public that interests the public. No amount of honor among thieves makes the general effect of thievery bearable, and the issue is as to whether or not the denizens of Wall street are thieves and robbers or only gamblers staking their individual alls upon chance.

A Measure of Poverty.

Some idea of the depth of poverty in the United Kingdom may be formed from the fact that 700,000 persons lately applied for old age pensions under the new pension law. Those applying had to show that they are seventy years old or over, that their total annual income is $105 or less and that they have not been in receipt of any applied for old age pension that the pension budget will eat up $35,000,000 a year from the start. It is a gentle form of out-of-door poor relief but based upon the theory that the worker, having toiled long, still has that much coming to him from organized society—not a bad theory, provided he has toiled long.

Almost An Apple Famine.

Had it not been for a good crop of apples on the Pacific Coast last year there would have been an apple famine in some of the eastern states. In nothing else have the farmers of the East been so neglectful as in the planting and caring for apple orchards. In New England, the home of the apple of song and story, it requires fifteen to twenty years for a new apple orchard to come into profitable bearing and that seems too long to wait. Farther west the wait is not so long, but stock growing has proven more profitable and orchards have been allowed to die of neglect. The United States can furnish a market for a barrel of apples per capita of population, but the supply last year was barely 62,500,000 barrels.

Motor Cars and Roads.

Massachusetts and New York are the two most enlightened states in the Union, measured by their efficiency in dealing with public affairs. The governors of these states and their highway advisers are now studying the relation of automobiles to the public highways and the result seems likely to be an interstate commission to make further investigation and report. This much has been determined. Automobiles require the best of roads but are the hardest upon roads, and a way is sought for taxing them in proportion to benefits enjoyed and injuries inflicted, the resulting tax fund to be used for repairing roadways.

Two-Foot Pistols.

Alabama is striving with honest zeal to break up the practice of settling differences between gentlemen by holding impromptu street duels to the great danger of innocent passers and to the depletion of the state's assortment of gentlemen of the first families. Inasmuch as the Constitution of the United States guarantees the right to bear arms the state cannot altogether prohibit pistol carrying, but it has undertaken to regulate the carrying of weapons so that hip pocket pistols will either go out of fashion or long and loose hanging cloaks, such as were worn in the days of Hamlet and Othello, must come into fashion to conceal the blunderbusses which the law will allow to be carried. The proposal is that no pistol less than two feet in length shall be purchased, sold or carried.

Freedom of Contract and Sharks.

The Supreme Court of Illinois has rendered a decision which declares unconstitutional a law designed to stand between loan sharks and their victims. It is held that a law requiring the signature of the employer to a contract of assignment of wages in advance would prevent freedom of contract. That it would prevent freedom of extortion by loan sharks would come much nearer the truth. There is scarcely a civilized country on the globe that has not been called upon somehow to trench upon freedom of contract in order to stand between loan sharks and their victims. The Supreme Court of Illinois appears to be a survivor from the dark ages.

Beecher's Bright Sayings.

"There is only one thing I can think of," said Henry Ward Beecher, "which is not dangerous, and that is dying."

The grave is God's bankrupt court, which clears a man of his property and his debts at the same time.

There is only one place in which a man can bear a boil, and that is on his neighbor.

Whether Ireland will ever be quiet depends on how many Irishmen emigrate. They are likely not to be taken straight, but in mixture.

He is considered a blunderer nowadays who tells a lie. The artist will tell the truth so that it shall tell the lie.

You can never do anything with an excited man or an excited crowd, taking them on the rising tide; but if you can only get them to howl for two hours, until they are tired, then there is some chance for you.

"We have in our midst," said Beecher in an after-dinner speech, "that exceedingly high mountain to which Satan took Christ and showed him the smiling world beneath. It is the daily newspaper."

At the close of a pew-renting in Plymouth church one of the members said to Beecher: "Mr. Beecher, I have been trying all the evening to get a seat, and haven't succeeded." "Well, then," he answered, "you must obey the Apostolic injunction,—having done all, to stand."

WILLIAM KEITH—A SKETCH

By CHARLES KEELER.

On that never-to-be-forgotten morning of the eighteenth of April, 1906, William Keith crossed the bridge from his Berkeley home in a vain effort to reach his studio, already doomed by the fires that were raging through the business districts of San Francisco. Having tried without avail to find a way up town through the cordons of police and soldiers, and realizing that the building containing the pictures which represented his life work must certainly burn, he joined the procession of refugees fleeing from the stricken city and returned on the ferry to Berkeley. He called that morning upon my wife, who had long pursued her art studies under his sympathetic eye, and asked her to lend him paint and brushes and canvas. Now, at the age of sixty-seven, his life work burning in the city over yonder, he resolved to paint a new and better collection of pictures than the one which was being destroyed. The craft which comes from years of experience was his, and his mind was stored with impressions of nature gained from a life of unwearied study. He would forget his losses in increased activity, inspired by the thought that the work of his life was still before him.

No one will ever know how many canvases, large and small, finished and unfinished, were destroyed in that old Pine Street studio which had for years been the real art center of the West. Mr. Keith estimated the number at probably two thousand. He is a prolific painter, and nearly everything he had ever done which remained unsold was stored there. Some of his friends went to the studio that fateful morning to save what few pictures they could carry off, but the bulk of his work was left to burn. A collection of pictures of the California missions, painted in the early days and of great historic interest, portraits of notable men, sketches of Sierra scenery, and landscapes without number, were up in flames. There were mystical scenes whose motives were inspired by the rich tones of two Chinese temple bells, by fanciful poems, and by his own dreams; others were expressions of the characters of his friends as he imagined them worked out in mountain, grove and meadow.

There were many of his notable works had been purchased and sent away from the doomed city. There were fine examples of his landscapes in many private homes of the East. The Corcoran Gallery in Washington owns one, and Mr. Jacob Schiff had presented a notable picture of his to the Hamburg Gallery where a room has been set apart for this one painting. But the mass of his work, including much of his most mature, most successful and most powerful expression, was burned in the San Francisco fire.

So it seems to me one of the thrilling episodes in the history of art, when, on the very day of the historic disaster, William Keith, already approaching his three score and ten years, went to work amid all the confusion and excitement about him, to begin anew the cherished work of his life, that he might leave a collection of pictures worthy of his genius. When days and weeks afterwards, men paralyzed and stunned by their losses were thinking of returning to the normal routine of their lives, this intrepid painter had already a goodly array of canvases completed. He had the very thought of the task before him was rejuvenating, and he labored with almost unnatural youth and enthusiasm. Among the many enterprising merchants to be speedily rehabilitated in the new business district on or near Van Ness Avenue was the firm of Vickery, Atkins & Torrey, and no sooner was their artistic temporary building ready for occupancy than Mr. Keith was prepared to fill their spacious gallery with an exhibition of the landscapes he had done since the fire. It was a most incredible achievement, considering the number of pictures displayed, the beauty of workmanship, the poetic fancy and the great variety in subject and treatment. It was difficult for some people to comprehend how so many pictures could be painted in so short a time and still represent the high standard of workmanship which Mr. Keith had maintained before the fire. To understand this it is necessary to look back upon the painter's life and training.

Coming from Scotland to New York while still in his teens, Mr. Keith early learned the art of wood engraving, and in his young manhood made many of the striking blocks for Harper's Weekly. But, fortunately for the cause of art, the close application injured his eyesight and he came to California to engage in wood engraving more independently. Having some leisure here he took to painting in water colors, and when a commission to make a set of oil landscapes for one of the northern railroads was offered him, he gladly seized the opportunity to escape the confinement of engraving and get out of doors amid the mountains and forests. With the experience and start thus gained he opened a studio in San Francisco in company with a portrait painter. Pictures were scarce in California in those days, so despite the immaturity of his work, he sold enough in a twelve-month to take him to Europe for study. After a year in Dusseldorf with Professor Achenbach and Professor Flamm, working at landscape painting, he returned to his adopted home to enter upon the serious labor of his life.

Now followed years of unremitting study of nature—summer outings in the high Sierras, often with his life-long friend John Muir, excursions north and south in the Coast Ranges, trips through the valleys, with paints and canvas ever in readiness, and unceasing industry wherewith to make good use of them. From every outing he brought home numberless studies in oil and water color made directly from nature. But the great field of his life study was the vicinity of his own home in Berkeley. Daily he observed the effects of sunlight and shadow, of the procession of the seasons, the sky and the clouds and fog, the waxing and waning of day, moonlight and starlight. He studied the hills in winter green and summer brown, the vistas from the heights over the plain to the bay, the planted groves of eucalyptus, and above all the sun-baked rocks with their gracefully spreading trunks and the play of light and shadow under their branches. He was an indefatigable student. Upon his daily walks he always carried a note-book in which he jotted down pencil sketches with notes on effects of color written upon the drawings. He was ever looking for the subtleties of color in nature, striving to gain a deeper insight into the details of light effects and a greater mastery of the elusive splendors of nature's pageant. At one time he wore a Claude Lorraine glass, and wandered over the hills getting ideas in the beautiful images on the darkened mirror. At another time he carried bits of colored glass and studied the effect of the landscapes under various artificial lights. Even during the later years of his life when he was weary and over the hills with him he has been studying nature with the enthusiasm of a schoolboy. A lesser man would have long since settled into a routine, satisfied with what he had learned in youth.

This training in the great out-of-doors has been the only influence that has shaped his work. He early painted pictures with ease enough, with every detail elaborately studied out. His first great advance came in his grasp of the principle of unification—in making his picture tell one idea with all detail subordinated. From George Inness who worked with him while visiting California and who warmly appreciated his work, he gained much of the inspiration that comes from the contact of kindred spirits. Upon one of his European trips he devoted himself to portrait painting and came home with many notable studies of heads. The work of Corot, of Rembrandt and of Velasquez has been most suggestive to him, but many of the other painters, especially the Dutch and French masters of landscape, have influenced his style and thought to a greater or less degree.

Mr. Keith has been a tireless student of technical processes, and the mastery he has achieved in the craft of hand is the result of intense and enthusiastic application. Great looseness and lightness of touch, boldness of stroke, certainty of effect, have characterized his technique. And while he has known just how to produce results, he has also been alert to seize upon accidental effects, to emphasize and make significant the chance arrangements of form or color. He has ever been experimenting in manipulation, trying new devices to produce novel textures and tones. Sometimes the whole picture will be painted upon a prepared surface of brilliant color, in transparent oils, wiped out with a rag, and showing the fundamental tone throughout. More characteristically he will paint over an old canvas, piling on the colors with bold strokes that give depth, solidity, and massiveness to his work. At one time he experimented upon surfaces covered with gold or silver leaf, painting in light transparent colors and producing the most luminous effects. At another time he worked much with bits of glass, scraping the thickly painted surfaces, bringing out brilliant under colors in sparkling broken lights. He has produced some striking results in combining pastel with water color. At one time he laid in pictures in brown, forming his composition and then building it up in color upon this foundation. At another time he worked in color first and then harmonized his composition with successive glazings of transparent brown or yellow.

But Mr. Keith has never depended upon tricks of craftsmanship, although he has known how to make use of these. By far the largest part of his work is done in a straightforward manner, swiftly, directly, with that sense of effect which comes only from years of self training. He works with large brushes, and many of his light loose splashes of foliage and grass are produced by a strong pressure and a toss of a big soft brush. He usually paints standing, giving him greater freedom of motion, and the ability to see his work much at a distance as it grows under his deft strokes.

Few painters have had so great a diversity in style as Mr. Keith, despite an unmistakable mode of handling common to most of his work. He will paint a series of pictures in one manner and then turn to a mode in complete antithesis. From paintings of Alaskan waters with mountain peaks snow mantled and imaged in the sea, all white and opalescent with delicate tones to moonlit trees, dark and mysterious and elusive as such scenes are, he changes in easy transition. Again, sunsets with all nature suffused with golden brown light claim his fancy. After an excursion to the mountains he will essay large canvases of Shasta, of Kings Canyon, of the Sierras, with the snow mantled crest of the Sierras, painted with the utmost fidelity to nature. Inspired by the season, whole series of light tender green spring pictures will appear, full of fresh verdure, a proudding hillsides. But in general his work falls into two main groups—paintings which portray nature in a literal matter-of-fact manner, and those in which he allows his poetic fancy to glorify the scene and leave it in haunting mystery. It is almost needless to say that Mr. Keith himself knows that these latter are his finer and more distinctively creative work.

A great painter must be more than a student of nature and a successful technician, indispensable as these elements are. He must have a great soul, a spiritual life, and impart, and this, the most essential element in genius, is the last for the world to perceive. It is because of his vital, intense nature, his deep, broad religious undercurrent of thought, his childlike reverence and reverence that William Keith will one day be acclaimed a genius of the first magnitude among land-

MADAME REMIER

By E. FRENCH STROTHER.

Madame Remier was a Communist. Two times she was condemned to be shot. I saw her only once, and that was between the day when she escaped the first sentence through a soldier's jest and the day when she was led the second time to public execution. I heard her story from one who knew what was before and after.

M. Remier, her husband, lost his mind a few years after she was married, through conduct that gave his wife no cause to pity him, and left her with three children to raise, and the bills for his care at the Hospital St. Anne, which was a home for the feeble-minded. Sometimes M. Remier escaped from his lax guards, and there were more bills for returning him to the hospital.

Then came Napoleon the Third.

Madame Remier taught school in the daytime, and conspired against the monarchy at night. She was intelligent enough and radical enough to be a leader among the Republicans. She was also clever enough not to be caught for some time. But when the first fury came against the Republicans, she was one of those arrested and sentenced to be shot at once.

There was little ceremony about the executions. Only one formality was observed, when the condemned were huddled at the all-day slaughters on the sand-shelves beside the Seine. They were told off in squads of thirty, who were all tied along one rope to be shot together. When Madame Remier's turn came, her lot fell to be tied at the end of the rope with twenty-nine men. Thus they stood bareheaded in the sun, almost before the dead bodies of the score and ten who had preceded them were tumbled into a barge to be towed away for burial.

It was too late to think of herself—she was lost—but what of Remier, the imbecile, and of Victor, Paul and Victor and Jean? Would the soldiers shoot before she could think how they might be cared for? Why doesn't the sergeant leave that pestiferous little priest and command the men to fire? "One! Two! What's the matter? What are they waiting for?"

The sergeant stopped his count and stepped forward.

"What is this? Only one woman? For shame! It is almost night, and one woman must not lie in the same bed with so many men."

They untied her and put a man in her place. The rifles quickly sang the thirty to sleep. It was too dark to kill more that night—the others must wait until morning. On the return to the prison, Madame Remier escaped into the darkness.

It was a few weeks later when I met her. Victor and Paul had been put to bed in the corner, and Jean was sitting by her in the one unlovely room she occupied. We talked hours of her youth, her youth in America, to which I was about to return. I asked her if she should not try to escape with the children to go on my vessel. No, there was Remier; and, more, France. The Republic must be restored, and she must do her part. She wished me safe passage, and I wished her deliverance, and left. I never saw her again. I have the rest from M. Passaud, who lived to receive many honors from the Republic.

The Commune began. Madame Remier left the children with a weaker friend, and helped build the barricades in the streets. She fought with the men, slept on the cobble-stones, and prayed God that her breast might give milk for the thirsty when the water gave out. She was in the fiercest struggle, heaving stones from a barricade at the gen darmes, and she was captured while her fingers were throttling the last breath of a soldier of Napoleon.

Again her name was inscribed on the death-roll. The day after her mock trial she was among the thousands of condemned waiting for their names called for them to step out before the Cathedral doors and be shot down. From six in the morning until noon, and from noon until four o'clock she stood and watched the monotonous succession of names called, men and women taking their positions before the guns, the sergeant's count, the flash and the report, and blood running into the gutter from the steps.

Now they were down to the R's Rabutin! Racine! Ragon! Rambaud! Ram-bouillet! Rameau! Ramee! Ramillies! Rance!
Ravillac!

"Ready! One! Two! Three! Fire!"
And more little rivulets of blood.
Now they are ready for the R-e's.
Recamier! Recife! Recolet! Regnier!
Renard! Rene! Remier!"

"Ah! At last!"
"Remier! Remier! Where is Remier?"
"Here," Madame Remier heard someone answer.

"Step lively, Remier!"
Shambling from the press, the body and the vacant face of M. Remier appeared. With a child's obedience he stepped to the place a soldier pointed him.

Madame Remier screamed. Her cry was unnoticed—it was like many that had been heard that day. She could not move. This was her husband. He the father of her children. God! Save him! A mistake! Not he! I! I!—Save him! But Paul! Jean! Victor! And—France! He for these duties, or I? Is there no alternative? My God! Quick! Selfish? Terrible! No! No! Not selfish! France and the children! My God! My God!

"All right, sergeant."
"Ready! One! Two! Three! Fire!"
And M. Remier slipped to the pavement, falling with his face in a little pool of blood.
"Romain! Rovant! Rovand!"
The R-e's were past.

Madame Remier lives still, with Victor, who is an architect in Paris. Paul is a physician, and Jean died young.

THE CAPTAIN THAT THEY BROKE.

Now I remember days gone by
That never again shall be
When I trod the bridge of a battleship
And held her might in fee.

Now I remember the gathered fleets,
And the craftsman's pride I knew
When the great ship circled and turned again
As the far flags bade her do;

When the great gaunt bows swung dripping round
As my word let her go,
And my finger checked ten thousand horse
At a touch, from fast to slow.

My mates must work the ringing guns,
My mates must police the sea:
From North Cape south to Sydney-side
There's never a place for me.

So I must forget the hopes I had,
And the dreams I dreamt of yore,
Of the reeling swing of a deep-sea fight,
Where the long black sea-guns roar.

For this is the law without excuse
For all the Lords of the Sea,
That each must hold his ship from harm,
Whatever the odds may be;

And sin and error are all as one,
No pardon may he gain
For any struggle of warning needs
Or stress of body and brain.

For the Deep-Sea Empire has its price:
It is bought by blood and flame,
By the risk of the guns and the risk of the sea,
And the risk of ruin and shame.

I may not hope to give my life,
But a higher price I pay—
The skill and toil of twenty years
For the fault of half a day.

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE.

Hands.

Great, brawny hands which do the work
That men must do, not ever shrink;
Brown, mighty hands so strong to bear;
The world's dead weight of toil and care;
To forge its iron, set a-whirr
The wheels, that senseless monsters stir,
To delve within the sombre hill
Make Nature vassal to man's will,
Shape vast machines the earth to jar—
Oh, great, brown hands, how strong you are!

And yet—the wonder of it all—
Somewhere are hands all white and small,
Or rosebud hands which one might hold
And lose within one's fingers' fold;
Wee, tiny hands which one might kiss
And deem them fit for naught but this,
And yet they hold the strong, brown hands
And guide them as by silken bands,
Held bound—who would such bondage break?
—By we, white hands for sweet love's sake.

How the Earth People Govern Themselves.

"It is too bad about the Earth people," said the Being from Saturn to his family.

"You are so tender-hearted, pa," his daughter Arabella murmured. "Tell us why you pity them."

"I could cite a thousand instances to illustrate what I mean," her pa responded, "but one will suffice. Down there the people proudly contend that they govern themselves, and, by the way, their melancholy condition is in no manner better indicated than by some of the lollaploosies they choose to represent them in an official way."

"Their transportation still is accomplished by means of steam, although they are progressing into the electric age. Of course such transportation is, and must be, a public service. Well, when I was there the corporations were about to increase the tax on the public for their service by ten per cent, without consulting the people, although they were declaring excellent dividends, apparently acting upon the principle formerly enunciated by one of their representatives, 'The public be damned!'"

"It would have been laughable if it had not been pathetic to witness the public excitement. It was much like that which you have seen among ants when they have stepped upon their nest. There were mass meetings of protest, petitions, gatherings of public bodies, outcries of defiance—the ants were extremely agitated."

"This frightened the transportation companies, did it not, pa?" said Augustus, who was in the university.

"Not that anybody noticed."

"What did they do?" Arabella inquired.

"Went right ahead and socked on the additional ten per cent."

"And what did the people who govern themselves do?"

"Not a darn thing, my children, except take their medicine. They didn't like the taste of it, but they took it."

"And you say they govern themselves, pa?"

"Never! I saw many more that they claim to do so. Alas, poor, benighted Man!"

And, being good-hearted, they all wept together.

The Test of It.

I saw a safe warranted to be fire-proof, and I never looked upon anything nearer in that line. But there came a great fire and the valuable contents of the safe were destroyed.

Someway, Ephraim, that safe made me think of a variety of man-warranted virtue I have seen in this world, and it is pretty to look at, its guarantee of being the genuine article is posted where everyone may read it, and, under ordinary circumstances, it passes muster as being all it is warranted to be. So we believe in it until, some day, it is subjected to the hot fire of grievous temptation. Then it fails. Man's credentials, without a higher guarantee behind them, prove insufficient.

There is a good deal of this kind of virtue in the world, my boy; sunshine virtue which becomes draggled in bad weather. You carry some of it, so do I, so do all of us, and so it has occurred to me that it shows wisdom on our part not to advertise our alleged perfection very much until the safe wherein we keep it has been "tried as by fire," not once, but many times. How does it strike you, Ephraim?

Patrytism's More in Doin'.

To the grocery store of evenin's village statesmen used to come

For to save their State an' Nation when the prospect's threatened some

For they saw with dark forebodin', as they frequently expressed,

How things went to wrack an' ruin when they orto ben the best.

"Dunno 'em all," says old Bill Siphers, "it is painful unto me

W'en I think how it is changin' frum the way it used ter be.

Now, the time w'en patrytism orto rise up in its might,

Speakin' truths for men to hear 'em—don't you reckon I am right?"

"Praps you are," my grandpa'd ans'er, "but so fer es I have saw Patrytism's more in doin' than in workin' of the jaw."

"W'en I think erbout my country," Hiram Fowler used to say

"I kin scarcely keep frum weepin' in a melancholy way;

I rellee' of our forefathers, how they struggled an' they fit

For the freedom of their children, an' I am with sorrow hit—

Poke the fire up, Silas Wilkins—we're approachin' ruin's brink,

An', though others may be speechless, I shall say jest w'at I think.

"Tis a duty we are owin' to our country in its plight.

Don't you reckon 'Squire," he'd finish, "that they ain't no doubt I'm right?"

"Praps you are," my grandpa'd ans'er, "but so fer es I have saw Patrytism's more in doin' than in workin' of the jaw."

So they sat at that there grocery, while the Southland ran with blood, Savin' of their blessed country by their lingual torrent's flood.

An' since that I've noticed ever as I make my earthly trips

Some folks serves their land by actions, some by waggin' of the lips.

Here and now our country calls us, for the rascal's scheme and plot—

Some of 'em us are doing something, more are talking quite a lot.

Do you deem you're heeding duty when, within some corner store,

You have wailed, "We go to ruin," only that and nothing more?

"Praps you are," my grandpa'd ans'er, "but so fer es I have saw Patrytism's more in doin' than in workin' of the jaw."

"As Jesus Would."

With profound respect for the good people of Los Angeles and other cities, who have banded themselves together with the high purpose of living "as Jesus would" during one week, their experiment must terminate in failure. They may live better lives than they otherwise would, and may give selfishness, bad temper, pride, and that ill brood, a temporary burial, but, on the whole, they will fail. Why? Because the first element in the perfect life of Christ, Jesus of Nazareth was its steadfastness of purpose.

He did not say, "I am going to be remarkably good this week, although next Monday I may experience a moral relapse." No, the characteristic wherein his divinity made itself most manifest was his undeviating adherence to the right in all times and seasons, whether the Tempter whispered or did not. Through care and sorrow he went his weary, all-loving way to that final tragedy of Calvary which wrote the word, "Salvation," against a lightning-riven sky, that all men might read and understand. "The foxes have holes and the birds of the air have nests, but the Son of Man hath not where to lay his head." So he wearily spoke as he traveled for humanity, and yet not once between the manger of Bethlehem and rock-shaken Calvary did he falter in his high purpose or his perfect living. It was unchangeableness in that purpose that made him the Christ.

And so when the good people have done with their week of effort, and when they relapse to that condition of blended good and evil in which we exist in this queer world, they will then and there demonstrate that they did not live "as Jesus would," for he lived for unchanging good, and not for the good of one week only.

A Noticeable Difference.

When a girl whose pa has hustled
Till he's worth some million plunks,
And is termed by some a magnate,
And by others just "Old Hunks,"
When she marries wealth or title,
Then enchanted papers say:
"Wedding gifts were worth a million,
Made a rare and rich display."

When a girl who owns but clothing
That protects her from the cold,
Clothing somewhat worn and shabby,
Rather frayed and looking odd;
When she marries in her "station,"
One whose burden she would lift,
Papers may say of the wedding,
But they mention not a gift.

So I've noticed on my journey
Those who have are those who get,
And I'd like to change the system
To a better method yet.
See the tide of wealth outflowing
For the needy it might bless,
Bearing gifts for those who need them—
Well, I've had a dream, I guess.

The Opinions of Rufus.

The good book says that charity suffers long, an' so I s'pose it does, but I'd like to bet a dollar that taint from overwork. Main trouble with livin' in Californy, es I see it, is that you git the repytshun of bein' a alfred rid jest by dwellin' lovin'ly on the truth.

When Art sees some wimmen after they've got themselves fixed up, I s'pose she looks at herself in her glass, blushes, and says, "Jest to think 'at I did it gives me that old, dull, penetratin' heartache again!"

Some fokes say, "Lord, be merciful to me, a sinner," in a way that leads to the spicion that they mentally add, "But, if you're busy you needn't be so partic'lar about other sinners."

Marriage is the medicine for love. It either removes the symptoms, or else you git the disease.

Some people remind me of my old cow. She was an orful kicker but she give good milk.

Somewhow, the Smart Set, with its external an' eternal pretence, makes me think of my collie dog. I shaved the critter once, an' there wasn't much of anything left of it.

When I see a man whose hull attitude seems to say, "I am holier than thou," I can't help feelin' that I'd like to have a real condishnal talk with his wife.

If you don't learn your child to take his medicine without cryin' the world'll do it fer you, an' 'twon't be very tender 'bout it, neither.

("William Keith"—Concluded)

—scape painters. Beneath an exterior which may be either genial or stern, according to his mood, is a tenderness of heart which makes him a lover of children and of animals, and a friend to those in need. While he is glad to reap the material reward of his labors, he is also most generous in giving away his pictures whenever the occasion arises. He has been an omnivorous reader of poetry and fiction, essays, history and biography, religion and philosophy, and perhaps most of all books of mysticism. The influence of Swedenborgianism, and more especially the personal friendship of the Rev. Joseph Worcester has been a potent factor in his life.

And with all this breadth of thought it is quite a matter of course that his finest paintings do not represent nature literally, but rather landscape sublimated by his own poetic fancy. He is weaving colors into new and strange effects of light and harmony. His lovers are strolling in enchanted fairy forests, and the light that never was on land or sea is illuminating his haymakers in the gloaming. It is the light of the poet's vision, and alas for them who have eyes, yet they see not! It has been a long-cherished dream of mine that some day a small permanent gallery should be built in which a collection of his finest pictures might be preserved. What place could be more appropriate for such a tribute than Berkeley, his home for so many years and the inspiration of his noblest work?

From this resume it may be more easy to understand how it is possible for Mr. Keith to be painting to-day with such fecundity of thought and expression. It is the stored knowledge of fifty years of nature study and of fifty years of hand and eye training, roused by a great calamity to a sublime enthusiasm, which he is now giving out so lavishly in masterful work. It was a fitting recognition of this on the part of the San Francisco Art Association, when, on the occasion of his seventieth birthday this last November, they gave a notable exhibition of his paintings. Among the works hung were many that revealed his ripest, most masterful style, giving ample proof that his power has grown with the years, and that the poetic fancy so eminently present in his finest pictures can still be trusted to inspire his idyllic scenes. He is to-day paying his deepest, most loving tribute to nature and to art, with a zeal and energy commensurate with his genius.

THE WORK OF

Allen's Press Clipping Bureau

FOR PUBLIC MEN

Allen's Press Clipping Bureau has now had experience in five National and five State Campaigns. In this it has had the honor of serving hundreds of public men, including members of the Cabinet, U. S. Senators, Congressmen, Governors, State Senators and Assemblymen, Mayors, and State and County Central Committees.

It has aided these men by bringing them quickly, easily, and cheaply, what the entire press has to say of them or the measures in which they are interested.

A thorough clipping service discloses the state and trend of public opinion, brings to attention false charges that should be denied, true charges that should be parried, shows what editors need argument, and what editors need encouragement in short, aids in handling the most powerful and important of political engines, the Press.

Having three offices, a staff of thirty people, and a reading and writing room, we are able to have no unimpaired facilities for very high-grade and thorough work. We can cover counties, districts, the State, or the Pacific States.

Rates will be furnished on application.

Pasadenan Librarians.

The Pasadena Star is authority for the following stories:

Amusing mistakes are made by patrons of the Pasadena public library, and the best educated people are not exempt, although children are responsible for a large part of the blunders. Miss Nellie M. Russ, librarian, has kept a record of some of the gems perpetrated there.

Several times recently she has had demands for "the bottle of the strong." After assuring the applicant that this was a temperance town, she hands out Sir Gilbert Parker's "Battle of the Strong," which invariably fills the bill.

On another occasion a small boy who looked somewhat unsatisfied, was asked by an attendant if he wanted a book.

"Yes," he replied with a blase air, "But I've just come from New York, and have read about everything. Still, you might give me 'Tiger's Progress,' by Mark Twain."

"Tales from Shakespeare," by Charles and Mary Lamb, is sometimes interpreted by juveniles as "The Story of Shakespeare and the Lamb." "Mrs. Wiggs of the Rubbage Path" was once requested, and the "Raspberry Twins" puzzled an assistant several minutes. "From Jessie to Ernest" proved, upon dissection, not to be a volume of letters, but a copy of E. P. Roe's "From Jest to Earnest." A young woman asked very definitely, for a good book. "You might try 'The Last Days of Pompeii,'" said the assistant.

"That sounds good; what did he die of?" "Of an eruption, I think," replied the assistant, solemnly and obligingly.

None of the Pasadena patrons are so sensitive as a small boy in a near-by town, who sat in the library and cried until a librarian found that he was mourning the death of Joan of Arc, of which he had just learned. One day, however, a party came in and said, "Willie is sick, and I have brung his book in." To the librarian's anxious query, she replied, "No, it ain't catching. He has much pain, and we think he ate something that didn't become him."

Public Gifts of the Year.

Andrew Carnegie heads the list of public gifts for 1908 with $7,437,600, out of the total donations for the year of $43,559,648. Carnegie's money was distributed for libraries, colleges, the hero fund of Great Britain, which amounted to $1,250,000, and to industrial organizations.

John D. Rockefeller is next with a total of $2,934,000. Of this amount the University of Chicago received $2,191,000 and the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research, $800,000.

Mrs. Russell Sage gave a total of $1,559,635. J. P. Morgan gave a total of $192,000. Of this $100,000 was given for rebuilding Episcopal churches in San Francisco.

At a meeting of the Mendelsham (England) Sparrow Club, it was stated that during this year 4,918 old birds, 2,807 young birds and 3,914 eggs had been destroyed, a total of 11,639. The local farmers pay a voluntary rate, based on acreage, from which payments are made for birds and eggs destroyed.

On Christmas eve Alfred W. Manning, proprietor of the restaurant beneath the Consolidated Stock Exchange in New York, cut up his 460-pound plum pudding and sent 750 boxes of it to friends. The big bit of pastry was thirty-two inches high and three feet in diameter.

The New York Stock Exchange, on Christmas eve, distributed $12,000 among 425 employees; the Consolidated Exchange, $3,000 among 175 employees; and the Cotton Exchange, $3,600 among 75 employees.

Returns to the provincial game and fisheries department of the number of deer and moose carried by the different express companies in 1908 show that the Canadian Express Company carried 2,589 deer, the Dominion Express 924 deer and 57 moose, and in all it is expected that when returns are complete the number of deer shot will reach 5,000. The total shipped in 1907 was 3,886.

Dickens left an estate of $400,000, the results of his writing.

Nearly one-sixth of the railroad trackage in the United States is for electric cars. More than 40,000 miles of electric railway lines are in operation.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN.

Putting Pressure on Them

The current report is that Senator Frank Leavitt is putting pressure on members of the Alameda delegation to prevent their voting the robbing privileges out of horse racing is not inherently improbable. Leavitt has a good thing as things are. Coroner Tisdale has another good thing as things are. He is close to two members from Alameda and close to a lot more who are close to them, too. The allegation is that to get Tisdale busy the sapient senior senator from Alameda has introduced a bill cutting off Tisdale's immoderate perquisites as coroner and, in their place, leave only a moderate salary. The public good requires that Leavitt's anti-Tisdale bill shall become a law, and that the license to rob, now enjoyed by the book makers, shall come to an abrupt close. Therefore put a counter pressure upon the Alameda members to keep them in the middle of the road.

The Science of Political Pressure

Alameda County is no stranger to political pressure. The late Henry Vrooman was a past master in its employment. It is related that, upon an occasion when the Southern Pacific Oil Guard wanted to place a stanch Oaklander down the bank without hurting him, he not being in the cattle market, Vrooman was sent for and the job let out to him. He did not begin with the victim himself, nor with any member of his family within the Levitical degree, but with remote friends of the remote friends and business associates of the victim. He rounded them in, as vacueros might a herd of straggling cattle. He brought pressure upon pressure, man upon man, until he had the political influences of three hundred men focussed upon the one man whom he was thus crowding closer and closer to the brink of the bank and, when close to the bank, he finally caved down it? And yet the victim himself never saw the hand of Vrooman in it, but it was there. The hand of Leavitt is not the hand of Vrooman. There is little of subtlety in it, but plenty of force. Unless force is met with force and pressure with pressure Leavitt will win. He is not in politics for the good that he can do.

The Office of 'Scapae Goat'

There are indications that Lieutenant Governor Warren Porter is filling a more than usually important office, not so much by election as by selection. When Warden Yell was turned out of Folsom prison to make a place for a partisan paper hunter, his Excellency, the Governor, declared that he did all that he could to prevent the outrage. It was Porter who did it. When the capable assistant of the Big Basin was ousted to make a place for a functus officio Santa Cruzan it was not the Governor, but Porter who did that. Porter constituted the senate committee upon immorality. Is Porter to be the administration 'scapegoat'? If so only one detail is lacking to the fullness of the office—the driving of the goat into the wilderness in accordance with ancient custom.

Winning Victory From Defeat

The souls of political gentlemen were disturbed half a year ago through fear that the Lincoln-Roosevelt League might not be able to win the primaries in the face of the veteran forces of the Southern Pacific organization. This fear prompted concessions that should not have been made and, as a matter of fact, the League lost out in the state convention. But this it did do. It gave the Herrin Political Bureau the worst shake-up it ever had in California with the result that the present legislature now seems likely to do better work than any legislature California has had in two decades. There is in that body a double-handful of Leaguers who are standing for right things and standing so resolutely that other members, who would prefer to do right if they dared, are daunted to stand up and be counted on the side of political decency. It is wonderful what a victory can sometimes be won when the fighters are not afraid of being licked and are willing to take it if they are.

The New Zeal To Stop Lobbying

There are some so unsophisticated as to suppose that the zeal of Porter and Stanton, in driving lobbying off the floors of the two houses at Sacramento, was born of virtue. It wasn't. It was born of a purpose to shut the People's Lobby off the floor but, inasmuch as the Herrin lobby had to go with it, the state is the gainer and the friends of the People's Lobby are not complaining. They can stand it if the other fellows can and there is no question that it will expedite legislative business. It is hard to legislate with the floors covered with visitors whispering into the ears of legislators who should be watching for bugs.

Hatchet Men After Johnson

Those who know Grove L. Johnson well will not be concerned at the report that Japanese hatchet men are coming on his trail, and he won't either. If a Japanese were to start for the "father of the assembly" with a hatchet he would find it persuaded out of his hands before he reached his intended victim. Johnson would convince his assailant that it wasn't a hatchet after all but a chunk of gingerbread and, moreover, that the best friend Japan has in California is Grove L. Johnson, who is striving with might and main to save the Japanese in California from such a slaughter as would make St. Bartholomew a quilting party by comparison. Johnson is invulnerable.

Ring Down That Curtin

Senator John B. Curtin is not satisfied with Uncle Sam's management of Yosemite and threatens to have it given back to California. He "told us so," before we gave it away and is of the same opinion still. It would be fine if one could free the mind of a sense of bias in the mind of "Constitutional John," but he has so many cattle on a thousand hills adjacent to Yosemite, and which sometimes wander upon the preserves, that they obscure a vision ordinarily clear. Won't somebody ring down the Curtin till he gets out of the cattle business?

Reform Schools Are Growing

The Preston School is an applicant at the legislature for upwards of a hundred thousand dollars to be expended in new buildings and equipment. This school has nearly doubled its enrollment within the past two years and is greatly crowded for accommodations for the boys. This growth is not a hopeful symptom. It shows that control of refractory youths is taking the direction of least resistance rather than of wisdom and so long as nothing else is done for the lads the taxpayers can hardly find fault if the reform schools grow on their hands. The Preston school was badly located, except for scenic effect. The land is a vine in summer and a water in winter and a boy to every four square rods would hardly suffice to keep it in a good state of cultivation. The legislature will need to put its thinking cap on if this institution is to be wisely dealt with.

Farming at Whittier

The State School at Whittier is more fortunate in the matter of farming land than the one at Jone. While it has nowhere near as much land, what it has is good and instruction in farm work is making good progress there, the more especially because it is on that side of the work that the superintendent of the school is especially interested. It is affirmed that graduates from the agricultural side of the school seldom come back for additional training when once placed on probation at farm work. In legislating for these schools the educational possibilities of agriculture should be kept well in mind. A danger is that, in teaching the elements of agricultural life, the boy will be utilized for the farm instead of the farm for the boy. That tendency is inherent and the better the land and the faster the weeds grow the more inherent the tendency.

Monkeying With the Primary Law

It was unbelievable from the first that the "organization" at Sacramento would stand for a true-blue direct primary law and indications are that the cohorts of Herrin are already nibbling the foundation from under the measure submitted by the Direct Primary League. The League measure is not perfect, but it is a good deal nearer perfect than it will be after the "organization" is done perfecting it. It should be encouraged to let that bill alone.

Oregon All Right

There will be general satisfaction everywhere over the admirable way in which the legislature of Oregon kept faith with the people of Oregon in relation to the election of United States senators. This is not saying that Oregon's "statement No. 1," is or is not a good thing or that legislative candidates did a wise thing in taking such a pledge. The wisdom or unwisdom of such a policy is quite aside. The issue was as to whether, having pledged their faiths, political pressure could force those who had given pledges to violate them. The Men of Oregon may have done wrong in preferring a tried and true Democrat, like Governor Chamberlain, for United States Senator to a tried and untrue Republican like Fulton or an untrue Republican like Calkins. Their business, but that faith honorably pledged should be honorably maintained—that was everybody's business. Congratulations to the manhood of Oregon!

The Brewers' Man Got In

It has developed that the reason Mr. Bryan's running mate did not reach the United States senate is that the brewing interests of Indiana threw their influence into the scale for Benjamin Franklin Shirley of South Bend and against Mr. Kern. Just what interest the breweries can have in the United States Senate does not appear upon the surface. Perhaps they have none and were merely gratifying animosities more creditable to Mr. Kern than to Mr. Shirley or the brewing interests.

When Judges Disagree

It was The California Weekly that first affirmed that no new judicial positions should be created by the legislature until the judges of the court, sitting in banc if there be more than one judge, petition the legislature for additional judicial force, reinforcing the petition with good cause shown. The judges in the Superior Court of San Francisco have tried this method with the result that the judges are evenly divided. It is a rule of parliamentary usage that where there is an equal division of sentiment the decision must be in the negative. That is a good rule to apply in this instance. The legislature should take Judge Lawlor's advice and legislate against abuse of lawful privileges rather than augment the number of courts to be clogged by such abuse.

All who stand against railroad domination in the political affairs of this State should subscribe for The California Weekly. The names at the head of the paper guarantee it a welcome to the exchange table.—Oroville Mercury.

The California Weekly will be an honest paper because it is conducted by honest men.—Sacramento Bee.

UP AND DOWN : : THE STATE : :

A box of Florida oranges bearing the purple scale recently was received in Riverside. As this is one of the worst pests which afflicts citrus fruits, and as it thus far has been kept out of California, the oranges were immediately destroyed.

Fresno County's grand jury has reported that mice have broken into the burglar-proof vaults in the treasurer's office and are making nests of the county records.

Several hundred Hungarian pheasants have been turned loose at various points in California by the game and fish commission. At present the law protects them against the sportsman and his gun.

The Inyo Register has just passed its twenty-first birthday anniversary, and during its entire existence it has been published by P. A. Chalfant or P. A. Chalfant & Son.

At a depth of 200 feet, while boring for water on his ranch near Clovis, Fresno County, John Porter struck a stream of oil. It is of good quality, and the well will be developed by Potter.

California's winter hobo-flood is reported to be at high tide in many parts of the State.

The Marysville Democrat announces that an electric road to run from Marysville to the Buttes, where it is proposed to establish a summer resort, is being financed, with fair prospects of success.

A Mexican named Librado Gutierrez recently hanged himself to death in the Butte County hospital, where he was taken to be treated for the ailment.

By a ballot of 302 to 148 the residents of Porterville have voted saloons out of business in that place.

The Salinas Index says that excitement over the strike of oil by the Lonokon Company near King City, is increasing, and that possible oil land in that vicinity is rapidly going up in price.

Principal Morris C. James of the Berkeley high school in a recent address to his pupils said: "Different members of the student body—I can name them; many of them are now facing me—have admitted to me that they steal, that they lie, that they get drunk, and commit other crimes which I will not mention." He added that those guilty of these offenses belonged to "the class which is termed the upper class."

Notwithstanding the present low prices for raisins, the growers about Fresno are preparing to plant a large acreage of Muscats as soon as the weather permits.

Mrs. Mary Ann Felipe, the oldest person in Solano County, and not improbably in California, died at her home near Fairfield, on the 10th instant, at the age of 106 years.

By the action of the San Diego supervisors that county, outside of the city, will be "dry," so far as saloons are concerned, after February 1st.

Burglars broke open the safe of the Elmina postoffice last week, securing $600 in money, $50 in stamps, and valuable papers belonging to the postmaster and other persons.

The Ocean Park board of trustees has adopted an ordinance providing for the closing at midnight of all places where liquor is sold.

The San Francisco, Oakland and San Jose Railway, better known about the bay as the Key Route, has about completed ten new cars, and twenty more soon will be in process of construction.

The citizens of Berkeley will vote on their new charter for the 30th instant. It is believed that the vote will be favorable to its adoption.

The Sisters' Hospital at Chico was destroyed by fire last week Thursday. The financial loss was about $10,000, with $6,000 insurance.

The wedding of Donald R. Green, son of the late Will S. Green, president of the College of San Publishing Company, and Miss Mabel E. Prentiss, was lately solemnized at the bride's home in Berkeley.

WITH EYES AND EARS OPEN

A woman friend of mine was in a confectioner's shop, waiting her turn to be served, and her glance was attracted to a little girl, perhaps five years old, led by a servant in uniform.

The child's ingenious charm held her gaze so steadfastly that she did not notice a woman across the shop who looked first at the child and then at my friend, until, with impulsive quickness, the stranger stopped over nervously and spoke to her in a low voice:

"I noticed you looking at that child. She is mine. I never see her except like this, by chance, in a shop or on the street. Her father and I separated three years ago. I don't know why I am telling you this, but—but—" and her lips quivered—"I just had to talk to somebody about it."

And without another word she turned and hurried away into the crowd outside the door. My friend has no idea who the child or the woman are. But for a moment she had stood at the confessional of a life tragedy, where conventionality falls before the flood-tide of emotion; and then—silence.

I often wonder that Californians do not build more houses in the Mission style. Every climate has its architecture, born of the local needs of humanity for comfort within and a pleasing object of the view without. In bleak New England the chimney is the largest architectural adornment, because the fire is the chief necessity of comfort. The roof is steep, because it must shed much snow. In Louisiana the "galley," or verandah, is a work of art, as well as a protection from the sun and a sitting room for the open air.

Out of the same necessities of comfort and utility the Mission fathers built heavy walls (that protect equally against heat and cold), tiled roofs, that have only a little water to drain off—and they built for beauty and for the exigencies of climate. How absurd to see a New England farmhouse in a grove of California palms!—yet how often we do see it. It is a pity that we do not build as we live—in the spirit of our land, and climate, and traditional environment.

I observe that there are talkers and conversationalists in the world—both entertaining—and that I am neither. A good talker is such a man as John Muir, gifted with knowledge, with human charm, and with speech; who, with a friendly group about him, can discourse for hours on subjects that please his fancy, and hold his hearers enthralled. But he is not a conversationalist. He is an original monologist.

Out of the same necessities is not often learned nor profound. He or she (let us say she—it usually happens so) she has a sense of dialogue, of the graciousness of encouraging speech in others as well as of delivering speech gracefully herself. She is as good a listener as she is a ready talker. She encourages confidences, suggests themes for conversation, takes care not to run one subject long enough to wind it, catches at glancing sunbeams of ideas upon the current of thought rather than sounding thought's depths—has, in short, lightness, variety, interplay of wits, as her methods of sustaining interest. Conversation is, with her, a social art. She strives to please, not to inform. She is the life of social gatherings, and her gift adds to the solidity of facts the grace and charm of a human personality.

One of my secret sorrows is my poverty of conversation. I "make" it, but what a poor and paltry product! However, I shall take heart of hope from Madame de Staël's dictum that conversation is an art that can be learned. It is an art worthy of assiduous cultivation. What else in life so binds humanity together as the pleasing gift of speech in the informal intimacies of everyday chatter?

A Book for the Little Folks.

Judge Curtis D. Wilbur of the Los Angeles Juvenile Court has written a book for children, entitled "The Bear Family at Home, and How the Circus Came to Visit Them." In his preface he says: "The stories contained in this volume were first told my children, and in telling them I had the purpose to teach them something at the same time they were being entertained." In both purposes he has been successful, for there is instruction in the stories, and at the same time little folk are certain to find them delightfully interesting. The author says concerning his book, "I feel that if this little volume has any place worth while, it will be largely in assisting parents to invent stories for the entertainment and profit of their children," and parents who read the book will appreciate how suggestive in this way it may be. Bible stories told for childish understanding are one feature of the little volume.

THE INDIA BASIN ISSUE EXPLAINED

By E. FRENCH STROTHER.

This article is an explanation of the provisions of the so-called India Basin Act for the improvement of San Francisco harbor. It also gives, without comment, the arguments of the principal factions engaged in the controversy over the terms of a new bill to cover these improvements. The subject is timely, because, though the proposed constitutional amendment authorizing the work under twenty-year bonds was defeated at the last State election, the whole matter is up again before the legislature for authorization under seventy-five-year bonds. If the legislature passes favorably on this proposal, a new amendment will be submitted to the people at the next State election. But in the meantime there is a fight in the legislature over important details of the new proposal. In this light the people have an interest, because upon its result depends the character of the act that will be submitted to them for their votes.

The proposal that was defeated at the last election was this: that the State of California buy a tract of waterfront lands in the Mission District of San Francisco, lying at the mouth of and west of the Islais Creek Channel, to be dredged and dyked as an inner harbor, or basin, with docks and wharves to accommodate the resultant shipping. This tract comprises sixty-four city blocks, and is shaped thus:

The cost of acquiring these lands is estimated at $1,000,000, and of completing the work of dredging, walling, and building piers, wharves, and docks, at about $2,000,000 additional.

There is little active opposition being made to the broad proposal that the State shall make a basin at the mouth of Islais Creek. The controversy is mainly over the question of the time for making the basin, of the method of raising the revenue to pay for the project, and of the physical limits to which the basin shall extend. The intersecting line in the diagram above represents the dividing line of the controversy on this last point. The whole diagram represents the area desired by the proponents of the sixty-four-block plan. The quadrilateral below the intersecting line represents the area (forty blocks) desired by the opponents of the sixty-four-block plan.

All the lands in controversy are submerged under from eight to sixty feet of water. They were sold by the State to private parties many years ago, as water-lots. They have never been reclaimed, but the taxes have been paid and private ownership maintained.

By the provisions of the amendment defeated at the last State election, the State was to issue bonds to pay for the project. These bonds would, however, be paid for out of State funds, but would constitute a lien on the revenues of the harbor of San Francisco, which would have to pay the interest on the bonds and provide a sinking fund to take up the bonds then and there as they matured. These revenues of the harbor consist almost wholly of rents, dockage, tolls, and wharfage. These last three sources are defined in the "Harbor Rules, Regulations and Rates Adopted by the Board of State Harbor Commissioners" as:

"Dockage.—The charge made for vessels occupying berths at the wharves, or moored in any slip or channel."

"Tolls.—The charge made for merchandise passing over State premises."

"Wharfage.—The charge made for leaving merchandise on State premises longer than the time specified in these rules."

The rents are for the use of piers owned by the State. A considerable revenue is also derived from switching charges of the Belt Line Railroad, which is owned and operated by the State.

The amount of the regular annual revenues is indicated by the following excerpt from the report of the Board for 1907:

RECEIPTS.
From	1904 1905	1905 1906	Total
Dockage	$184,724.10	$193,502.55	$378,226.65

	$1,283,804.80	$965,990.36	$2,249,795.16

The disbursements of these funds for the same period were as follows:

DISBURSEMENTS.
	1904 1905	1905 1906	Total
Salaries—Administration and collection of revenue	$ 84,094.85	$ 84,961.20	$169,056.05

General expenses
	$1,095,571.37	$1,021,505.01	$2,117,076.38

From this report it appears that the net income from the harbor revenues is small, and that the bulk of the gross annual revenues are already anticipated by regular annual expenditures.

The basis upon which the amendment was defeated at the last election was that these net revenues were so small that they could not possibly pay out the bond issues in the twenty years specified in the act, and that, in consequence, the State would ultimately have to come to the rescue and pay them out of the State treasury, thus throwing the burden of a local improvement on the State at large. An amendment was passed at the last election authorizing the issuance of seventy-five-year bonds for such works as this.

Arguments for Sixty-four Blocks.

The arguments of those who favor the sixty-four block plan are these:

The commerce of San Francisco is expanding rapidly; the opening of the Panama Canal will greatly increase it. The city will soon require large extensions of the water front and increased dockage and wharfage. The value of water front holdings is rising, and, as the State must ultimately acquire more water front lands for these purposes, it is only economy to acquire them now before the price becomes prohibitive.

The mouth of Islais Creek is the ideal location for a new basin for the harbor of San Francisco. It is in the Mission district, which contains more than sixty per cent. of the population of the city. It is approached by level ground, and by actual teaming tests is more quickly accessible to most parts of the city than any other part of the available water front, for such heavy freights as lumber, flour, and other building and food supplies. The existing docking facilities for these kinds of freight are already inadequate, and must soon be greatly extended.

The proposal that the State acquire the entire sixty-four blocks does not imply that the upper twenty-four blocks shall be dredged, if that be found inexpedient. But if they are not dredged, they should nevertheless be acquired, for this reason: if they are left in private hands the wharves of that part of the basin fronting upon them, and the wharves of the Islais Channel fronting upon them, will be too narrow for practical use, as the street widths are only sixty feet and the private owners would monopolize that much space in unloading their own goods. The necessity of hauling through the streets intersecting this land, if in private hands, would also involve great inconvenience and delay. It would be better that the State acquire the land, fill it in, and provide adequate trucking facilities and temporary public grounds for goods, for general public use.

Arguments for Forty Blocks.

The arguments of those who object to the inclusion of the twenty-four blocks indicated in the upper part of the diagram are these:

The twenty-four blocks are so shallow (averaging about ten feet) that the cost of dredging them would be enormous—a prohibitive, in fact. If the cost objection could be overcome, this part of the basin would still be impracticable, as its shape and its narrowness would prevent the building of practical wharves, because ships would not be able to turn at the wharves.

There is no present need for this work, as the existing water frontage is adequate. What is needed is improved facilities for the existing water front. New wharves and docks are needed, and it is better that money be spent it should be for these purposes and not to build a new basin at a point remote from the present developed shipping center. There is no objection to the purchase of the forty blocks now, as a safeguard against a prohibitive rise in price, but no money should be spent to dredge them at this time.

Putting the cost on the revenues of the port is unfair, as the port charges are already high enough and cannot be raised without detriment to commerce. If such increases are made, they will become an indirect tax upon the people of the State anyhow, as the shippers will simply add them to the price they charge for the commodities paying these charges, and the public will pay them in that way.

Other Arguments Pro and Con.

What there is of active opposition to the whole proposition of making a basin at Islais Creek seems to be on the ground that the proposal is a bad one, and that it is better to spend this time to consider at all a proposal whose practical effects may be so many years in the future.

Above the Islais Creek Channel is a swamp tract that must be drained before the city building out to that district. Both sides of the controversy use this swamp as an argument; one says that it cannot be drained if the basin is made; the other that it cannot be drained until the basin is made. The city engineer's office of San Francisco informs The California Weekly that it can be drained no matter what is done or left undone.

Owners of land on Rincon Hill, adjacent to the project, are charged by one faction with fighting the dredging because they desire to level the hill and dump the waste into this basin. Another faction charges that the lumber companies who own lands west of Islais Creek are fighting for the project because it would enhance the value of their lands; and another faction charges that they are fighting against the inclusion of the twenty-four blocks because they want them for terminal facilities. It is impossible to disentangle these arguments, or to run them to their sources so that

The Graft Cases.

That it sometimes is difficult, if not impossible, to make a "good dog of a bad cur," might be considered the moral of the present proceedings in the case against Michael W. Coffey, who is on trial under indictment charging him with accepting a bribe to vote for the overhead-trolley franchise, has been set for February 1st by Judge Dunne.

When Detective Burns had so trapped the former dishonored supervisors that they were driven to confess their grafting operations, and when it was recognized that they were but the boughten implements of higher-up and bigger rascals, they were promised that they would not be prosecuted by the present District Attorney (of course, no promise could be made for others) if they would tell the complete and true story of their hoodling operations to grand and petit juries before which they might be called, and, with an unpleasant state prison possibility staring them in the face, they agreed to do so.

Generally speaking, they kept the word thus compulsorily given. Even Coffey kept it when he appeared before the grand jury, but by the time he was called as a witness against Tiley L. Ford he had met with a change of heart. The cause of that change may forever remain buried in the Coffey consciousness, but its effects were evident. That which he had remembered before the grand jury he frequently forgot before the petit body, and even that which he did remember often was remembered with noticeable variations from his former memory. The dog had not stayed good, and the consideration for his immunity not having been given, prosecution followed.

Coffey, represented by his attorney, Franklin Bull, attempted to have the indictment set aside on the ground that it was based on testimony given by himself on promise of immunity, but Foreman B. P. Oliver, Fred G. Sanborn and Jeremiah Denay, all of the jury that indicted Coffey, testified before Judge Dunne that no promise of immunity was made by that body and that Coffey would have been indicted had he not testified, as other evidence sufficed to that end. Accordingly the court refused to set aside the indictment. A demurrer to the indictment was argued and overruled, Coffey pleaded not guilty, and his trial was set for the date above given.

The arduous labor of securing a jury composed of those who "read nothin', know nothin' and think nothin'" of matters in which every intelligent citizen takes a deep interest, continues in the case of the State against Patrick Calhoun. The assertion is made without intent to reflect upon jurors who have been or may be secured in that case, but merely as an unprejudiced statement of what, to a disinterested spectator, would appear to be the fact. Although the trial has been in progress a week at this writing, the three jurors thus far have been secured, and these are subject to peremptory challenge. At this rate a month in all must pass before a jury listens to the opening address of the prosecution. With the vast majority of intelligent men barred by the rules of the game, it is a trying task that is ahead for the prosecution.

After two weeks had been consumed in the process, the jury to try Attorney A. S. Newburgh, indicted for attempting to bribe a prospective juror in the Ruel trial, was completed last Monday, and the opening statement for the prosecution was made by District Attorney Langdon.

The facts connected with this case are too fresh in the public mind to require detailed statement, but it may be recalled in a general way that E. A. S. Blake, who has been convicted of an attempt to bribe John Martin Kelly, a prospective juror, and who is now serving a four-year sentence therefor, confessed his guilt and asserted that Newburgh and Attorney Frank J. Murphy had urged him to make the attempt at bribery. Murphy was tried and acquitted. Blake testified against him, his evidence was corroborated by Kelly, and William H. Schooler testified that he had offered to act as Blake's attorney at the request of Murphy and Newburgh. It is understood that the evidence against Newburgh will be substantially the same as that against Murphy, and the evidence being worthy of serious consideration at any rate, whether Newburgh will be acquitted or convicted is likely to depend largely upon the quality of the jury.

An interesting side issue in the present trial was brought to a head by an assertion in a morning paper last Monday that the prosecution was preparing to reward Blake for his testimony by giving him a chance to secure a new trial. Bert Schlesinger, Newburgh's attorney, who was given as an authority for the assertion, repudiated it when Judge Dunne demanded an investigation.

Abraham Ruef has been given until February 7th to prepare and file a bill of exceptions.

The committee of seven appointed by Mayor Taylor to investigate the conditions leading up to the graft cases, and the circumstances attending them, has been faithfully at work during a time running into months, and it still will be four or five weeks before it will be ready to make and publish its report. The committee, as may be remembered, consists of its chairman, William Denman, formerly assistant professor of law in the University of California; Alexander Goldstein, president of the Phoenix Seeding and Packing Company, of San Francisco; Rev. W. K. Guthrie, pastor of First Presbyterian Church, San Francisco; Rev. Father D. O. Crowley, of the Youth's Directory, William J. French, editor the Labor Clarion, who is recognized as a conservative leader of labor, Dr. Henry Gibbons, dean of Cooper Medical College, and William Kent, donor of Muir woods to the government.

The committee has been tireless in its labor of investigation, holding no less than two or three meetings every week. Of course, it has no power to subpoena witnesses, but those whose testimony was obtained have been generous in response to its summons issued in the name of the public weal, and have come before it very freely. These voluntary witnesses, both to fact and to public sentiment, have come from all classes, these representing business interests perhaps slightly predominating, and have not been chary of expressing their views. Concerning the majority opinion expressed in these views, as well as the committee's conclusions, it will be necessary to wait until the report appears, which is likely to be at some time during February.

"India Basin" (Concluded)

it can be known why persons who make them do make them.

Governor Gillett and others are now investigating a claim that the title to the lots involved here legally never passed from the State, and that the State can obtain the site of the basin simply by process of law to clear title. The basis of this claim is the almost entirely unaltered character of the tide and water lands throughout California—a controversy so intricate and so far from certain settlement that it seems unlikely to affect the India Basin issue seriously.

Recapitulation.

But, to recapitulate, the following facts appear to stand out clearly:

The broad proposition that at some time a basin should be made at the mouth of Islais Creek is not actively opposed.

Everyone admits that the task of making this basin must be undertaken by the State; that the State must own the land; and that the State must operate the wharves as it does most of the other wharves of San Francisco.

At least forty blocks are necessary to make this basin; more may be desirable.

Under the seventy-five year bonds the revenue of the harbor will suffice to finance the proposition.

Some private interests are certain to profit by the work, however it is done.

The controversy hinges on the choice between forty blocks and sixty-four blocks; on buying the land now or by and by; on dredging the basin now or in the future.

THE most striking peculiarity of Mr. Watson Stubbins in his walk, it indeed can be said to walk. It would perhaps be more nearly proper to say that he forges, each particular step being a decisive forging to the fore. Erect and enveloped in an air which seems to say, "I know how to go on course in life and that is forward, never backward or to the right or left, but always forward," he moves with an eye single to a single purpose and if you think his mode of locomotion is not rapid try to keep pace with him. You will soon wonder at the tireless persistence of the man.

He is a little fellow not more than five feet four inches high, but he is broad of face and form without being encumbered with adipose tissue. In fine, as the men of Stolliker's Prairie affirm, he is a great, big, good natured fellow done up in a little, short skin, rosy as a peachblow potato, and his limbs are so knotted with muscles as to resemble the gnarled branches of an old hackberry.

Being in many ways a notable man and indy fellow his neighbors have not scrupled to take liberties with his name. Watson was early changed to "Wat" and then to "Watty," from which the transition was easy enough to "Squatty" and then, as if his name were to be made doubly indicative of his stature, the "e" was changed to "u" in the name of his inheritance and he became "Squatty Stubbins," forever.

Squatty Stubbins' introduction to the settlers on Stolliker's Prairie took place on a fine morning in April when he drove in with his prairie schooler, with his cows, his dogs and his horses, and deliberately squatted on "Big" Churchill's "covered up" quarter section of land. That individual had already possessed himself of three quarters out of the section and was striving to hold the fourth until his third son should attain a sufficient stature to enable him to pass for being twenty-one and so enter it at the land office, and until the advent of the subject of this sketch Big Churchill's efforts had been successful if not beyond criticism.

Big Churchill was rampant. He drove straight to the newcomer's tent and, in a voice that could be heard half a mile, ordered him to be off and he quick about it, too. "Now look here, neighbor," Squatty said, "I'm ever so sorry to displease ye, I am fer a fact. Ye may not suspicion it, but I am, but Cindy, she likes the claim and so do I and as we've been rent'n a long time and have got forchanded a bit, I thought as how we oughter to take up a claim. Now I call this soil uncommon good, don't you, neighbor? And as for the view I call it positive commandin'. To be sure it may be a bit breezy here at times, but what's a little wind when you can get a view like that. Seems like I'd never get tired of looking across those swells at the Blue Hills melf'n into the clouds over against the sunset. The minute I set eyes on the quarter, and found that Uncle Sam still owned it, I said to Cindy, 'Sis,' says she, 'I found to my quarter section in the county and if Uncle Sam 'll give it to us we'll just go and hold it right down until it's our'n, and here we are neighbor to ye."

After Big Churchill had blustered a little while and had given the object of his wrath twenty-four hours to "get up and dust" in and was about to drive away Squatty Stubbins called to him and said: "Better be reasonable, neighbor. Uncle Sam ain't done so bad by ye after all, letting ye keep three whole quarters when ye're entitled ter but two because yer son Jonas aint twenty-one yet and wont be until next September, but if yer reasonable 'll not disturb the boy on that quarter nor suggest it to anyone else, but we like this claim uncommon well and I kinder think we'll stay bein' as we've come so fur. We'd like powerful well to be neighborly with ye and yer family. Still, if that aint yer disposition, why, no matter. We shant grieve none 'bout it. It's the things we've got and not the things we want that do us the most good, ye know, and Cindy 'n me aint given to borin' trouble. Didn't ye never learn ter look at things that-a-way, neighbor? It's a powerful comertin' reflection sometimes when we can't have our own way," and Squatty Stubbins chuckled and winked in a way that nearby drove Big Churchill crazy.

Big Churchill was regarded as a dangerous man. He was of powerful build, though grown stout of late years, and possessed an ungovernable temper. He had beaten unmercifully more than one of the men of Stolliker's Prairie and was the pet tyrant of the neighborhood. When he found that the claim jumper paid not the slightest regard to his threatenings but went right on putting up a cabin that would do for the summer and breaking prairie he nearly went beside himself and fumed and ranted all over his neighborhood, but forbore to proceed to extremities because, as he said in explanation of his forbearance, "That chumpy little fool is adding four dollars an acre to the land by breaking up the sod and couldn't be doing a better job for me if I'd hired him myself, but just you wait until he is done breaking and then see."

But there were other reasons for biding his time. Big Churchill was haunted by a superstitious dread that the little intruder might be underwitted or crazy, with his soddling and blunking and chuckling, and bubbling good humor. Whenever the men of Stolliker's Prairie came around, as they did, one by one, to visit the squatter and, by way of making their stay agreeable, to discuss with Big Churchill's grievances and the danger of incuring his enmity, the little man only chuckled and winked or puckered up his lips and gave vent to a prolonged whistle.

A profound interest in the outcome of the affair was felt throughout the community. Little else was talked of, and strange stories concerning the intruder, some true but more of them false, began to pass current from store to shop and house to house. Some said that he had chummed with Wild Bill down at Abilene, that he had "killed his man" in a fracas with cowboys on the Solomon, but the theory that gained widest currency was that some of Big Churchill's enemies, not daring to withstand him themselves, had imported a desperado to "do him up," for how else could the little fellow know of that "covered" quarter section so that he drove right to it, and pitched his tent on it without so much as halting by the roadside to inquire the way? At all events he was a crack shot and always went armed as, indeed, many others did. Big Churchill's unrelenting abroad and many difficulties were settled suddenly and finally.

The crisis came, for come it must sometime Big Churchill very well knew or his prestige would be gone forever. Already people were intimating that he would take it out in "caving," but really hadn't any stomach for joining the issue.

It was upon a sultry summer morning when men felt ugly anyway. The stage was to come in that day and half the settlers of Stolliker's Prairie had gathered to take the stage to town. Big Churchill went early and was in the act of telling a knot of admiring listeners what he would do "if that stumpy little villain" did not get off his claim, "in just three days." By that time the breaking word had been done and he was going to "discharge the man that had done it without squabbling over the pay neither," when in walked Squatty Stubbins in time to hear it all, but he gave no sign, received his man and went out.

Big Churchill followed, followed in turn by the expectant crowd, and stood on the porch leering at the little man contemptuously, but Squatty appeared not to notice him, got into his wagon, gathered up the lines and seemed to be upon the point of driving away without opening his mouth when he laid down the reins and, turning to Big Churchill, said, "Right nice of ye, neighbor, to give Cindy and me three whole days to leave our home. I hope ye aint thinkin' I'm ungrateful, I and he chuckled, ducked his head and winked at the by-standers.

"Three days to leave MY place you'd better say," bawled Churchill in a voice of thunder, "and well it'll be for you if you're gone when the time is up."

"Purty, middin' hard case, neighbor, I'm afeared," continued Squatty. "Pears like yer'll have ter kill me ter git the claim away from me, and then you'll have ter kill the widder ter git it away from the widder. Aint yer afraid it'll be more bother'n it's worth havin' so much kill'n ter do?"

"No, I'm not," yelled Churchill with rising anger, "and if you'll get down off that wagon I'll give you a lesson in manners right now."

"If there's anything I'm weak on his manners," remarked the little man as he sprang to the ground and advanced toward the middle of the road, "besides if a man wants satisfaction for the loss of somethin' that never was his'n he oughter have it and I reckon ther'll be no livin' near ye 'till ye git it."

"A brave man you are," roared Churchill, "standing there ready to six sixooter strapped to ye when I haven't got as much as a pocket knife."

"Anything ter 'commode a neighbor," replied Squatty as he unclasped his belt and threw his revolver into the wagon.

There was a rush from the porch in front of the store and the big man bore down on the little one with the impetuosity of an avalanche and, for the first and only time in their lives, the bystanders saw a dangerous light gleam from the little man's eyes. The blow was struck, but the little man was not there to receive it. No one saw just how he got there, but there he was, riding pick-a-pack on the big fellow's back hugging his throat with the grip of a grizzly. The big fellow plunged and struggled, but the little man, clinging with his arms and legs, rode like a broncho buster and could not be shaken off. His grasp grew tighter and Big Churchill's breath grew shorter and, presently, down he went ker-chunk into the dust of the road, his eyeballs starting and tongue protruding as he face back as a storm cloud. Quickly his arms were crossed behind him, a stout cord whipped out of pocket and hands tied behind him so that, by the time his breath came again, Big Churchill lay as helpless in Squatty Stubbins' hands as a foot-tied hog ready for the shambles.

"Will some gentleman call the next class in manners?" cried Squatty with his customary chuckle, whereat the whole assemblage set up a yell and Squatty deliberately sat down upon his prostrate enemy.

"A brave man ye are, a very brave man indeed, Mr. Churchill," and the speaker left fall his hand, not gently, gathering up a handful of flesh and shaking vigorously, "but if I'd a been nine feet high and big, according to'd a thought twice afore I'd squatted down at me that-a-way, now wouldn't ye? What'd ye say to git'n into the shade?"

Springing to his feet Squatty caught up the hulking mass of mortified humanity and, half carrying, half dragging, dropped it ker-plunk on the ground on the shady side of the store and resumed his seat.

"What a fool ye was, Churchill," he said, "ter tell all over the settlement what ye were cakerlatin' to do to me. Don't ye know that would a jesterfied me in fillin' yer hide so full of holes that it wouldn't hold corn shucks? But yer! I never shot a human 'n all my born days 'nd don't want to less'n I have to ter keep what's mine. It's a heap nicer ter tie 'em up this-a-way and sit on 'em so," and Squatty jounced up and down upon his prostrate enemy.

"I shant have to miss ye up much, neighbor," he continued, "if ye'll agree to a preperisition 'll per pound ter ye directly, but if ye don't agree in the presence of these gentlemen, and of yer own free will, too-well, ye'd a mighty sight better, that's all."

PERSONALIA

Madame Melba is an ardent woman's suffragist.

Clarence H. Mackay, multimillionaire and president of the Commercial Cable and the Postal Telegraph companies, is a Socialist.

William Faversham's new play, "The Barber of New Orleans," is based on a rather obscure recent novel called "The Code of Victor Jallot."

Max Pemberton's next novel will be called "The Show Girl" and will deal largely with bohemian life in Paris. It will be published early in the spring.

Frederic Doy is the name of the man who wrote the "Nick Carter" stories. He is now in a hospital in New York suffering from a nervous breakdown caused by overwork.

Oscar Hammerstein has found the strain of managing grand opera in New York and trying to launch it in Philadelphia so great that he is on the verge of a nervous breakdown.

Dr. Arnold Genthe's book of remarkable photographic studies of "Old Chinatown," mentioned in this column last week, is illuminated by letter-press written by Will Irwin.

Blanche Bates used to teach kindergarten in Los Angeles. She is now starting under Los Angeles' management in "The Fighting Hope." She is in private life Mrs. Lieut. Milton F. Davis.

H. J. Heinz, of "57 varieties" fame, is a little apple-dumpling of a Pennsylvania Dutchman, with curly hair and twinkling eyes. He is a native of Pittsburgh, which is still the home office of his business.

Eugene Walter, whose play, "Paid in Full," made such a hit, has novelized Charles Somerville's successful drama "The Wolf," and has succeeded better than most playwrights succeed who dramatize novels.

Senator La Follette of Wisconsin made his public debut as an editor on January 9th, when the initial number of La Follette's Weekly Magazine, of which the Senator is editor in chief, made its appearance on the news stands.

C. S. Wood, lawyer and poet of San Francisco, persuaded Childe Hassam, the famous New York artist, to visit the Harney Desert, from which he recently returned to New York with fascinating studies in color of desert plains and mountains.

Mrs. Carrie Chapman Catt, president of the International Suffrage Association, celebrated her fiftieth birthday at her home in New York on January 8th. Mrs. Catt sails on February 12th for England to arrange for the international meeting to be held next April.

Judge James B. Dill, the author of the liberal corporation law of New Jersey and the man who received a $1,000,000 fee for bringing about the organization of the steel trust, is known to his boyhood friends as "Little Jimmy Dill." He is little over five feet high, and smokes cigars nearly a foot long.

President Roosevelt, President-elect Taft, and Andrew Carnegie are among the members of the Uncle Remus Memorial Association which is out for funds from the country at large to erect a memorial to the late Joel Chandler Harris. Contributions should be sent to Col. R. J. Lowry, of the Lowry National Bank, Atlanta, Ga.

Bliss Carman, the poet of the wilderness, lives in the wilds of a New York apartment house and buys his poetically savage breakfasts at a delicatessen shop around the corner. By the way, he really looks like his published photographs.

By the way again, Ambrose Bierce doesn't.

The point in the United States probably farthest from a telegraph or a railroad is in the Harney Desert. The nearest town—Ontario, Oregon—is 187 miles distant.

"Ye are ter leave me and my family in unperturbed possession of our claim, hey?"

"Ye ain't never ter strike a little" man than you be 'cep'n he strikes first, hey?"

"Ye ain't ter go home'n scold yer wife and whale yer children out'n er vengeance 'cause I'm a sitt'n on ye."

"I hear, Churchill, as how yer mean ter yer folks when they go sort o' 'gin ye, which aint accordin' ter reason, and ye've got ter quit it, hey? What'd ye say? Speak up peert like and let these gentlemen see what fine manners ye've got."

The big fellow was sulky and disinclined to reply until the little giant gave one of his captive's arms a twist that nearly wrenched it out of its socket, when he blurted out a dogged promise and was allowed to go his shamefaced way, not much injured physically, but mortified profoundly.

"I'd rather be at ins than outs with ye, neighbor," declared the little man at parting, "and the day'll come if ye will let it when ye'll like me first class. I aint savin' no, maliciousness up again ye. Life's too short."

Squatty Stubbins drove off homeward exhibiting no signs of anger and only chuckling and ducking his head when the crowd cheered.

The season wore away into fall and the fall into winter and little more than a week intervened before the coming of Christmas. There had been winter weather to speak of. The corn had been gathered and husked and what could be spared had been hauled to market and sold and most of the proceeds spent, for the crop had not been good and the times were hard and the people poor, yet there was to be a Christmas tree and festival at the school house on Stolliker's Prairie. The settlers had not lost heart and were determined to make merry in spite of slim pickings.

Ever since the memorable occasion above mentioned, Big Churchill had been in a semi-somnambulistic condition, rarely went off the farm, spoke only in monosyllables and infrequently, but was at all times deeply meditative and more industrious than theretofore, not as unkind to his wife as he had been or as harsh with his sons, but kept to himself most of the time and was not the boisterous, domineering tyrant that he had been. When at last he suggested that a few hams of venison nicely roasted would not go badly at the festival Christmas eve his wife quickly noted it as the first symptom of a reawakening of the heart and mind of her husband.

So it chanced that early next morning the horses were harnessed to the spring wagon, a supply of victuals, a roll of blankets and the guns were put in and Big Churchill and his stalwart sons set off for the Blue Hills for a deer hunt.

"Father," complained Mrs. Churchill as the men were on the point of starting, "I am afraid that we shall run short of wood while you are away if it should in the cold. There is not much chopped and the logs are so big that the children and I will not be able to do anything with them."

"Pshaw, mother," the husband replied, "you are always borrowing trouble. We'll be back in three days, or four at the most, and nicer weather than this you never saw. Don't worry."

NEW

REMEDY GUARANTEED TO CURE CATARRH

So confident are the makers of its certain curative properties that they will let you try it free.

Remedial properties in vegetable life have recently been discovered by a local experimental chemist which have proven extraordinarily successful in curing refractory cases of catarrh. The remedy is in liquid form, easily applied or taken, and is at once efficacious, simple, not distasteful, and above all absolutely free from any deleterious substances. It is Nature's remedy, as many cases of catarrh of various kinds and intensities have proven. It is specially recommended to those afflicted with frequent coughing spells in vain efforts to expel clinging phlegm. Not only is this discharge stopped in a short time, but the remedy unfailingly seeks the seat of the disorder and eradicates it, thereby thoroughly clearing the system of insidious catarrhal attacks that may threaten the ears, eyes, stomach and other organs. As a remedy for curing distressful headaches from the same cause it has no equal. So confident are the makers of the curative properties of this new vegetable compound that they will not only guarantee its efficacy and refund the cash on any purchase if no cure is made, but they will send free samples for trial. Reflections.

When a woman is merry, light-hearted or glad,
She looks at herself in the glass;
If she happens she's worried or peevish or mad,
She looks at herself in the glass;
In fact, if she's pretty or if she is plain,
If she's ever so modest or ever so vain,
If she's wearing a rainy-day skirt or a train,
She looks at herself in the glass.

If her age it is twenty or fifty or more,
She looks at herself in the glass;
If she lives on an income or works in a store,
She looks at herself in the glass;
If her hat is on crooked, don't worry or fret,
Or if by some chance on quite straight it is set,
If it's not on at all, it's a pretty safe bet,
She looks at herself in the glass.

If a maiden's expecting her sweetheart to call,
She looks at herself in the glass;
And after they've said their good-by in the hall,
She looks at herself in the glass;

Her cheeks they are crimson, her hair is a mess,
Her collar is wilted, as you may well guess,
And the print of an arm marks the waist of her dress,
When she looks at herself in the glass.

Come put your arms about my neck and say your lay me down,
The little birds are all asleep and far away in town
The lights are blinking, winking, dear, as brilliantly as stars,
No more the stilt stand and moo besides the pasture bars,
The chickens have all gone to roost, the mother chicken hides
The little bats o' fluffy chicks beneath her feathered sides,
And so it's time you hugged your dad and said,
"my soul to keep"
And kissed your dad and cuddled down and drifted off to sleep.

Yes, God knows more than papa does; no,
baby, cows can't fly,
Yes, I have known you all your life; no I can't touch the sky;
Yes, mamma's putting sister girl to sleep while
I sit here;
No, dear, there are no bogie men, there's naught for babes to fear;
Yes, dear, the moon that peeps at you is very round and bright;
No, sweet, I don't believe the man in it can say good night.
You see he cannot hear so far, he's such a ways away;
Yes, dear, of course he likes to watch you say your, "Now I lay—"

Yes, mamma used to go barefoot—yes, when I go to town
I'll bring you home a rubber ball—for goodness sake lie down!
Do you know it is ten o'clock and you are not asleep?
And sister girl is dreaming now all in a cud-dled heap?
And I am yawning—oh-heigh-oh—gee! but you're wide awake!
What's that you say— one question more—well, baby, for your sake
I'll answer that one question more, but let me tell you this—
What's that you say? Of course, I will give you another kiss!

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

The Preamble.

The Constitution of the United States can be read from beginning to end in less than half an hour, and yet tens of thousands of American citizens have lived under its protection, and died out of its jurisdiction, without ever having found time to read the document or sense what it contains. As good a thing as the reader of this can do is to read it, if not for a first time, then for the fourth, twenty-fifth or hundredth time. One's familiarity with that document can never become too intimate.

Let the reader be pressed for time let him at least make acquaintance with the preamble to the constitution. It is the best part of the document. It is the soul of it. All else are vestures, organs, members, instruments through which the soul must act, shine out, make its power felt. Let us study the preamble. There are only fifty-two words in it, an admirable specimen of condensation and clear statement.

"We, the people of the United States," is the way the preamble opens. Not the fact that it does not say, "We the States of the United States." Neither does it say, "We the people of the several States in these United States." What a world of eloquence, rhetoric, disquisition, choler, not to mention human blood, would there have been if all Americans living under the constitution had truly sensed the opening phrase of that preamble! This constitution was authorized and adopted, through accredited representatives, it is true, by the people of the United States, and between the people and their national government there stands no State government or allegiance more than there stands a city or county government. This is not in any proper sense a government of States. It is a government of people, each individual directly accountable to the central government in all respects in which the central government has a direct, palpable interest. We are, therefore, Americans before being Californians, San Franciscans, Sacramentans or what not. Suffer that concept to sink into the understanding. It will save much confusion of thinking hereafter.

"In order to form a more perfect union," the instrument goes on to say, a union as perfect as possible without altogether obliterating State lines. There were those in the constitutional convention who wished to obliterate State lines, but it was wisely determined to leave those lines unchanged for the reason that there are concerns of State interest that are not of National interest, just as there are concerns of interest to counties and towns that are of no consequence to the State. Where the central government is concerned there practically are no State lines, as where the State is concerned there are practically no county lines. The analogy is nearly complete and is steadily becoming more so.

"Establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defense, etc." The most difficult of these is to establish justice. It once required four years of war at the cost, directly and indirectly, of half a million lives, besides billions of accumulated wealth, to insure domestic tranquility, but it was insured. It costs scores of millions a year to "provide for the common defense," yet the provision has been adequately made, but the establishment of justice still lacks much fulfillment. It is a theme, at this moment, absorbing the best thought of the Nation. But more of that when we come to consider the judiciary.

"Promote the general welfare." This has played a great part in the liberalization of public policies and extensions of governmental services to the people. The incorporation of this clause in the preamble was almost providential. It has advanced the common good as nothing else could have done.

"Secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity." This, also, is an unfinished task. The blessings of liberty are such everyday matters with us that we can scarcely realize that there was a time when men did not possess them, and yet more gallons of human blood have been spilled in the name of liberty in the history of the world than the Sacramento River pours gallons of water into San Francisco Bay in twenty-four hours.

Real liberty, liberty to employ one's activities in such a direction as he would, and secure for such activities the recompense they are justly entitled to—that is about the hardest blessing to secure and to maintain after being secured. Always some man or body of men are striving to reap where they have not sown, to impose half requited tasks and enforce them with the whip of inexorable necessity. Yet it was for these high purposes that "We, the people," did "ordain and establish this constitution for the United States of America."

It may sound like raising a needless alarm to declare that the problem of the preservation of liberties essential to popular welfare is as pressing now as in the days of the constitution makers, but so it is. The greedy hands of avarice are stretching out for special privileges and not in vain. The issue is also up to us.

Do You Hear Well?

The Stolz Electrophone—A New Electrical, Scientific and Practical Invention for those who are Deaf or Partially Deaf.

MAY NOW BE TESTED IN YOUR OWN HOME

Deaf or partially deaf people now may make a trial of the Stolz Electrophone at home. This personal, practical test serves to prove that the device satisfies, with ease, every requirement of a perfect hearing device.

This new invention renders unnecessary such clumsy, unsightly and frequently harmful devices as trumpets, horns, tubes, ear drums, fans, etc. It is a tiny electric telephone that fits on the ear and which, the instant it is applied, magnifies the sound waves in such manner as to cause an astonishing increase in the clearness of all sounds.

It overcomes the buzzing and roaring ear noises and, also, so constantly and electrically exerts on the total parts of the ear that, usually, the natural unaided hearing itself is gradually restored.

THE PLEDGE OF CITIZENSHIP

I, a citizen of the United States of America, realizing that a free Republic is an impossibility unless the citizen performs his civic duty, hereby pledge myself upon my sacred honor never to fail to exercise my right of citizenship by voting at every election, primary or secondary, wherever it is possible and legal for me to render that service to my country, my health permitting me so to do.

In taking this pledge it is distinctly understood that I in no way obligate myself to vote for any particular party, any definite candidate or any certain measure. I am voting myself only my Country, and pledging myself solely to the faithful performance of the duty I owe to her as a citizen.

Address:

WHY TAKE THE FOREGOING PLEDGE?

Those taking the foregoing pledge, signing and sending it to this office, will be enrolled upon The California Weekly's "School for Citizenship," which will be a permanent feature of this paper. It will entitle the person sending in his name to have answered, either through the columns of the paper or by letter, any rational question he may ask concerning public affairs, and, generally, by the person best equipped to afford the desired information. It will also entitle the signer to such special literature as may be issued from time to time by the school. While this pledge is open to persons of all ages it is especially desired that it be taken and sent in by young men lately become voters or who will cast their first votes two years hence. It will take but a moment to clip out the pledge, sign, enclose in an envelope, stamp and address to "School for Citizenship," office The California Weekly, 26 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, and it opens the way for a liberal education in citizenship.

THE TERMS OF FRIENDSHIP.

There may have been a delicate diplomatic suggestion in Prime Minister Katsura's remark to Commissioner Loomis that Japan hoped to become an industrial nation and "supply the markets of the Orient" with manufactured goods. Was that a hint that Japanese emigration must be confined to the Orient, its commerce will go there, too?

Never mind. Commerce, in the long run, follows the lines of profit. We can get the trade of Japan whenever we make an intelligent effort for it. Probably Germany will beat us to it, as has already happened in many parts of South America, by making a more intelligent effort, more promptly, but that handicap will be made neither less nor greater by any political issues between America and Japan. It is due merely to the German habit of respecting expert opinion. If a German wants to find out anything, he sends a specialist to make a scientific investigation. If an American wants to find out the same thing, he either jumps at the conclusion himself, on the basis of his own experience and traditions, or he takes the judgment of some other business man. The Englishman sends a "gentleman" to look the ground over. Naturally, the German is the one who finds out the truth. But that advantage is not especially a Japanese situation, and we shall learn to overcome it in Japan only as we learn to overcome it elsewhere. Meantime, if the boycott is as gentle as Marquis Katsura's suggestion of it, we need not worry. Besides, the trade of China is the final grand prize, and we should in any case have to compete with Japan for that.

Paramount to all commercial considerations, the two things to be attained are exactly the ideals professed by Marquis Katsura—friendship between the two nations and separation of the two populations. Between the American nation and the Japanese nation there should be nothing but the warmest of friendship. Our national and international purposes are the same, and the destiny of the Pacific is committed jointly to us. We should co-operate, not quarrel, in that supreme historic task of the twentieth century. But a white population and a brown population, regardless of nationality or ideals, can never occupy the same soil together with advantage to either. This is not a fact of temporary prejudice, but is fixed in the eternal nature of things; it is biological, not political, and it will last forever. Japan would feel the menace as acutely as America if there were any likelihood of a large white immigration into its territory. The two races simply cannot dwell together, on any terms which either will accept, and the condition of international friendship is the avoidance of the personal friction which is inevitable from any general mingling of populations.

The social intercourse of the cultured classes of the two nations is delightful, and is more so as the personal culture of the Japanese gentleman surpasses that of the average American. The cordial relations of the nations will be best conserved by committing them to the care of gentlemen, like Mr. Loomis and Marquis Katsura, who observe the social amenities which, unfortunately, do not as uniformly mark the common industrial and personal contacts of the two races when they occupy the same soil, neither as the social guest of the other. Let us dwell apart, in peace and amity. We cannot dwell together that way. Between brown man and white man, there is no biologic symbiosis.

VICTORY IN DEFEAT.

The Lincoln-Roosevelt League undertook to elect "a free, honest and capable legislature." How far did it succeed, and what is the state of the fight?

The present legislature is apparently "honest" and reasonably "capable." Also it is more nearly "free" than any legislature that has met for a long time. If the Lincoln-Roosevelt League had been as successful at the August as at the May primaries, the legislature would have been positively free of the railroad machine domination, since there are free legislators from many interior counties which did not send free delegations to the Sacramento convention. But defeat in Los Angeles and partial defeat in San Francisco lost these strategic points at the August primaries, and with them lost the possibility of organizing the legislature. The machine controls the important Senate committees, and Speaker Stanton, though not an uncompromising machine man, had the ways made smooth before him by machine support. In return, the machine was given the advantage in committee assignments, except on the committee on public morals. The machine is still in official control, and to that extent the legislature is not yet "free."

But what an enormous stride has been made! On non-partisan matters, where reform Democrats are added to reform Republicans, the anti-machine element is in definite control of the Assembly and nearly in control of the Senate. It is organized, militant and victorious. And the machine itself is cowed into a timid virtue. The blatant defiance of elementary decency, so characteristic of previous sessions, is conspicuous by its absence, though some of the very men who once led that defiance are still on the floor, and have experienced no regeneration of heart. On as many things as it dares, the machine votes right, and on the others it has forgotten its ancient insolence. The fear of the people is present in all hearts, and by sheer force of that fear, a considerable part of what the Lincoln-Roosevelt League sought in victory has been accomplished by defeat. It is not a secure victory, nor a complete one, but it is a long beginning, and more than justifies the fight that aroused the people of California to cease mere scolding, that the legislature was bad, and to demand that it be good.

It is, of course, not enough to scare the machine into relative decency. No political power which takes its inspiration from the hired political bureau of a foreign corporation can ever truly represent the people of California. The people must not be lulled into fancied security by any temporary gentleness of the dictators' rule. It is a gentleness that lasts only while the revolution threatens. The fight must continue, until the Harriman political bureau is unconditionally deposed from the rule of California. What has been gained is victory, if it encourages the struggle to gain the rest. On the other hand, if the machine, by a mere sop, can still the people's vigilance, then the victory is on the other side.

It has been so long a custom in English courts to strengthen the obligation of an oath by having deponent kiss the bible that antiquarians quarrel as to the time of its origin. There has not been anything in the law that required it and the kissed books have become so insubstantial that a movement is on foot to eliminate that ceremony unless a witness thinks that he can't tell the truth without it, in which event bibles with renewable covers will be used to prevent infection. The sanction of an oath counts for less than it should no matter how administered, but the extreme is reached in our own courts where the clerk chatters off: "You do solemnly-ch-ch-ch-so 'elp-ye-Almightygod," which sounds as much as anything like the last expiring whirr of an alarm clock. The too frequent use of any solemnity reduces it to a farce.

WHO SHALL CHOOSE OUR JUDGES?

The attention of the reader is called to an article elsewhere in this paper, by Mr. William Denman, in which a plan for the non-partisan election of judges is thoroughly considered. Than this there is no more important issue before the manhood of California.

Let the reader of this ponder well the following literally true narration of how a member of the appellate court for the first district of California obtained his high office. Having determined that he wanted the office did this man announce his candidacy and request the suffrages of the people for his nomination and election? Not at all. He made his application to one man and was told by that one man that he could have the place if the superior judge of an adjacent county did not want it, but that the judge referred to had a preferred claim upon the position if he cared to avail himself of it. A justice of the supreme court was good enough to undertake negotiations with this superior judge with the result that the judge retired from candidacy for the appellate nomination and, obedient to promise, it was given to the applicant who now holds the office. The party vote carried him into the position he is now in, but to fill. And this is the method by which "we, the people," fill our judicial positions!

It is matter of common notoriety that the predatory interests, coalesced in California into the Southern Pacific's political bureau, regard the judiciary as the citadel of government. They prefer to possess all departments of our state government, and as often as possible, have done so, but of the judiciary they have taken especial pains to make sure, if not in fee simple absolute, then by selecting types of judicial mind unlikely to prove refractory if tactfully handled. Now and again a judge breaks away from control, forgets or ignores who it was that made him a judge and who it is that can unmake him, and now and again there occurs a popular insurrection, as on behalf of Judges Lawlor and Dunne in San Francisco, and against Judge Carroll Cook two years ago and last year, but aside from these unexpected and unusual interferences with corporate control, the citadel of popular government, in this state and many others, is under the predominating influence of interests prejudicial to the common good. These are hard things to say, but they are true things and so much a matter of course, and thought so little of that the appellate judge himself told how he came to be an appellate judge and told it in a street car.

It is this kind of judge-making that Mr. William Denman and his associates are seeking to terminate. They are seeking by the simplest and most inexpensive of methods to force judicial candidates to stand upon their own merits before voters unaided by partisan appeal or affiliation. It will be time enough to decry the selection of judges by popular choice when popular choice has had an opportunity for selecting a few judges. At all events it never entered into the plan of American government that judges should be selected by the one litigant in the state that has cases in all courts from lowest to highest, retainers to oblige and scoundrels to defend.

A PROPER AND NECESSARY INSULT.

The Legislature of California is perturbed because of the existence of the People's Lobby. So great an insult was never inflicted upon a legislative body in this state. The wrath of gentlemen suspecting themselves to be under suspicion knows no bounds. They are for taking extreme measures to wipe out the indignity. Have not the People of California placed their trust in their legislators? Then why should any self-constituted body of men presume to distrust them? Great is the to-do and great the self-assumption of legislative virtue.

The People of California have placed little trust in their legislatures and the little trust that has been placed in them has often been abused. First the people limited the legislative sessions to once in two years instead of allowing annual sessions, then to sixty day sessions. Then they limited the possible expenditures for attack grabs. Only at the last election did the people eke out an extension of confidence by increasing the pay of legislators and allowing them such length of session as the increased pay will permit. Furthermore the sphere of legislative activity has been limited by legislating directly into the constitution, every such constitutional amendment being, in effect, a vote of lack of confidence in the legislatures of this state.

Millions of dollars have, in the history of the state, passed from the coffers of corporations into the pockets of legislators whom the People have chosen to misrepresent them. Elections to the United States senate have in past times been affairs of barter and sale. Able legal gentlemen, in recent years, have accepted representation from their senatorial and assembly districts and retainer fees from corporations. It is notorious that the predominant power in this present legislature is wielded from the corner of Powell and Market streets in San Francisco.

In view of unquestioned facts whatever of insult to the legislature of California the People's Lobby may constitute is a proper and necessary insult and one that should have been inflicted forty years ago and maintained ever since.

The purpose of this People's Lobby is to let the public know what is doing at the legislature and who does it, to make sure of the record each legislator makes, whether good or bad, and advise his constituents of the fact. Many a legislator who goes wild when away from home would walk the chalk, an exemplary gentleman, if he knew that his constituents would be informed as to his conduct. This surveillance harms no upright legislator. It helps him. There have been good men in all legislatures, but their power for good has been limited by the irresponsibility of those who lost their moral bearings as soon as they reached the capitol, or who are there, not to represent their constituents, but to represent special interests whose retainers they have accepted. Long live the People's Lobby!

EXPLOIT OR CONSERVE.

We shall not know that we have had President Roosevelt's valedictory until President-elect Taft has been inaugurated, but, in default of a better, the President's recent special message to Congress in relation to the Conservation of Our Natural Resources will serve admirably well. It is a splendid state paper and should furnish the foundation for a century of splendid statesmanship.

We have been a spendthrift nation. We have so prated of "inexhaustible resources" that we had begun to believe in their existence, but there is no such thing and never was. We have exploited where we should have conserved. Barring the wealth that finds its best expression on paper the continent of North America is not intrinsically richer than when America was discovered. Its soil has been skimmed, its forests slaughtered, its rivers ruined for navigation and converted into vast engines of destruction. Its mineral wealth has been squandered. Is it not, as the President says it is, high time for the American people to take an account of what is left them in the form of resources and proceed to live within their means?

The individual man who goes through life careless of making provision for his family when he shall have passed on, merits and receives the contempt of his fellow men. Why should not the nation that is careless of consequences to befall the next generation merit and receive the contempt of more prudent nations? It will and it does. There is not a civilized nation on earth that does not look upon our nation as prodigal.

The cause of conservation of national resources is not going forward without encountering opposition. The exploiter wants his return quickly. He wants to be free to go into a forest, cut down all its merchantable timber, burn the unmerchantable and, with it, burn the soil humus so that the cut-over area cannot bear another crop of timber in two centuries, and scar the ground with logways for the rain runoff to enlarge into gulches for "May not one do what he will with his own?"

He may not. As President Roosevelt affirms in his epoch-marking message, "The ownership of forest land is a public trust." So must we regard the ownership of vast grazing areas, of water power sites, mines of coal and iron. Men whose exaggerated individualistic proclivities have made them predatory, almost anarchistic, will find themselves confronted at every step by doctrines to them new and strange. To them they will smack of Socialism, but they will not be the doctrines of the socialists. These doctrines so new and strange will be found as old as the Common Law and grounded in the customs and policies of all civilized peoples except our own. The basic principle will be that each must so use his own as not to injure another's interests, that a care shall be exercised for the rights of generations yet unborn.

Had Theodore Roosevelt done nothing else to signalize his administration save to call into being the forces that are now making for a conservation, rather than for an exploitation, of our national resources he would have made an imperishable place for himself in the histories of those who have proven benefactors of their race and country.

THE HAVOC OF THE SCIENTIFIC METHOD.

The scientific method took possession of the last half of the last century. It was inevitable that it should assail the beliefs of the fathers and put them upon honor to furnish good reason for the faith that were in them. They were driven to it, but they went at it with a will to learn, to know and to declare the results of their investigations. Every book, chapter, line, verse, phrase, word in the sacred writings were studied, analyzed, compared with the oldest manuscripts and viewed with relation to contemporaneous history. The tombs of the tri-millennial dead were ransacked, their long buried temples uncarthed, cabalistic inscriptions upon tablets of stone and clay translated into the language of to-day and the very personalities of sacred history were made as living and breathing beings as the characters of Goethe or Shakespeare. Had this work been done before the Ingersolls of America and Europe had wrought their injurious work it had been better, but it was well to have it done and well done.

The founders of the Emmanuel Movement, a good account of which is given elsewhere in this paper, started their enterprise in the belief that the church was losing its hold upon the multitude because it failed longer to answer adequately to their spiritual needs. It is to be doubted if the church is chargeable with that delinquency. But this it has done: It has imposed upon its communicants a heavy burden of thought and study in order to keep pace with the results of applying the scientific method to a testing of the old faiths, and that burden has been greater than many were willing to bear. They have wanted their spiritual needs supplied without mental effort on their part and the church, not being as able as before to hand them their faiths ready-made, they looked to someone who was.

The running after strange gods, isms, healings, wraiths and wills-o'-the-wisp that have characterized recent decades is more the result of mental shiftlessness than of any deficiency in churchly teachings or influence. It is easier to dream than to think, to build castles in air than real houses on good foundations of concrete or stone. While the world stands the multitude will take their religious convictions and spiritual needs ready-made, handed down from the shelf as convenient to put on as a garment.

There probably is and ever has been a scientific basis of fact for phases of mental healing. On this basis shallow enthusiasts have built imaginative temples, towers, battlements of faith for the credulous which the scientific method will throw down when it gets to it and, in its place, will erect a useful, every-day, homely adjunct to other forms of healing.

Let not the church blame itself over-much. Those who have remained with it and have applied their minds to the task in hand have had their essential faiths strengthened, deepened, broadened, rationalized. They see still through a glass but less darkly than before, and do not hope to see face to face until they pass beyond the vale of the narrow temple. The Emmanuel Movement may have a work to do, but furnishing an easy path wherein mental shiftlessness may walk spiritually upheld can hardly be a part of its task. There is a deal called spiritual that is of the stuff that dreams are made of.

Water Power Development.

It may be possible to develop five million horse power from the waters that come down from the Sierra. Its development is enormously important to California. Nothing must be done to prevent that development as fast as the power can be profitably employed, but whose power shall it be in perpetuity? "The waters of California are, and by right ought to be, the property of the People of California." If this be true the people of California should say under what control those waters shall be used. The problem is a big one. The President has called timely attention to it. The demand is for true statesmanship.

Only Six Hundred Years Belated.

Professor John H. Wigmore, dean of the law faculty of the Northwestern University, and said to be the best authority upon the law of evidence, has taken a fall out of our supreme court on its Schmitz-Ruef decision, and especially out of our grave and reverend Chief Justice. He declares that "Such disputations were the life of scholarship and the law six hundred years ago, but are out of place today." That they are out of place to-day few not so deeply learned in the law as to be unlearned in the affairs of everyday human living will doubt, but Professor Wigmore has conceded some thirteen centuries more to the contemporaneity of our highest court than many will be willing to allow. That court rather belongs to the time when jurists strained at gnats and cummin and omitted the weightier matters of the law such as the establishment of justice. The justices have lost the soul of things in the form and have become a burden grievous to be borne.

Not the Right Moral Attitude.

The most cutting arraignment of our supreme court by Professor Wigmore is contained in the following sentence: "All the rules in the world will not get us substantial justice if the judges have not the correct living, moral attitude toward substantial justice." This is not saying that the attitude of our justices toward justice is immoral. It has reference to the bent of mind, the atmosphere in which they live and move as not being correctly moral. How can we expect anything better?

The power that made these men supreme or appellate justices has no moral attitude toward justice. Its attitude is aggressively immoral and it has made its selections for judicial positions with reference to types of mind, to power of appreciation of favors to be conferred or withheld, that will render appellate courts serviceable to the interests of the makers of those courts when the supreme test comes. It has not been declared that such expectations have resulted in disappointment. Professor Wigmore has gone to the heart of the matter. He has cut to the quick, but he has pointed out a way to remedy the wrong. It is to be done, by educating the legal profession out of vicious habits of thought by dining more liberal ideas into their consciousness through public criticism. Another aid will be the election of a free judiciary by the people rather than its selection by the one litigant that has cases in every court.

Mr. Taft Off Wrong.

There has been no little press humor expended over Mr. Taft's assurance to normal school pupils and teachers at Athens, Georgia, that single life for woman is not an unmixt evil and that marriage should not be her first consideration. Mr. Taft is wrong. The single life is an abnormal life and the married life should be a first consideration with both men and women, but especially with women. A careful study of the records of hospitals for the insane will verify this declaration. The person in whom the connubial felicitates are allowed to dry up bears a similar relation to the normal well-married being that a dried peach bears to one freshly plucked from the bough.

Gate of a Hundred Sorrows.

An International Reform Bureau is to hold a convention at Shanghai, China, February 1st, to consider what is to be done with the opium evil the world over. Some idea of the importance of this convention may be gathered from an estimate lately made that the non-medical use of opium in its several forms costs the world half a million suicides every year and that China alone expends $200,000,000 a year for the drug. California bears no small share of the common burden. It has scarcely a community that has not from one to a hundred wrecks who have passed through the "gate of a hundred sorrows."

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

This is a time of very general looking to moral standards. We are passing through a period of searching of hearts, the hearts of others perhaps rather than our own, but no character escapes that search either from self or from others, and new and better standards of conduct are being set up as a result of the heart-searching of our time.

When we speak of new standards we use the term relatively, meaning new to our generation only. There are no new standards. Every possible standard from biggest to lowest has been set up and torn down a thousand times in the world's history. The people in their headlong heedlessness forget and their high standards go down, or they bethink themselves and set them up again. We had forgotten. We are now bethinking. That is the whole of our present heart-searching phenomenon.

We are doing better than we did. The last few years of heart-searching and character-scrutinizing have done much to better our standards of integrity, but where shall we look for the best possible standard of integrity that we may set it up and declare our allegiance to it?

It is to the folk-lore and the songs of a people that we must look for the loftiest of their conceptions of what is true, good, beautiful. What we call the Psalms were the songs, the chants, the lyrics through which a wonderful people expressed their loftiest concepts and the deepest yearnings of their souls. In these we shall find some of the finest standards of character and conduct ever set up in this world.

"Lord, who shall abide in thy tabernacle? Who shall dwell in thy holy hill?" chanted the Hebrew people in metaphors signifying the stations of greatest honor, the recompense for the sublimest virtue. Then came the answer clear and strong, "He that sweareth to his own hurt and changeth not."

There is a standard of integrity for you! There is a standard of truth! There is no paltering with half truths in that, no making a truth serve the purposes of a lie because it deceives as well as a lie, no refusing to testify because one's testimony may be used against himself.

Judged by that standard what liars are we all, what prevaricators, dissemblers and what perjurers! And the worst of it is that all these prevarications, dissemblings, perjuries, are graven into our faces, chiseled into our characters, woven into our warp and woof. Judged by this ancient and seemingly unapproachable standard of integrity, is there any danger that our present swelling wave of moral uplift will carry us too high? Is honesty likely to become too common or too severe in type? And what is "common" honesty at best? What does it consist in more than in telling the truth in a straightforward way about ordinary affairs, in refraining from lying through lust of lying; but who is expected to "swear to his own hurt and change nothing of our law."

Our law certainly does not expect anything of the kind. It expressly excuses men from going upon the witness stand to testify against themselves, even when the truth desperately needs to be told. How quickly could Mr. Calhoun, Mr. Ford, Abe Ruef, and all the other indicted gentlemen, clear up every question of fact in the whole miserable graft business if they were to take the stand and "swear to their own hurt," if need be and, "change not," no matter how much they were hurt. Is it a sound law that sets up so low a standard of integrity?

The common-sense world is coming to the conclusion that it is wrong. It had its origin in the application of torture to extort the truth. Eliminate torture, and the reason for the rule of law excusing such testimony ceases to exist. Justice demands now, in America, as high a standard of integrity as the Hebrews set up in Palestine more than 3,000 years ago.

THE WORLD AT LARGE

Reforestation in Great Britain.

The pressing nature of the problem of the unemployed is prompting Great Britain to undertake a systematic reforestation in the "right little" isle. There are 6,000,000 acres of rough land in Scotland, 2,500,000 in England and Wales and 1,000,000 in Ireland, which can be forested without trenching upon agricultural lands or lands valuable for grazing. It is proposed to expend $10,000,000 a year upon this work until these lands have been forested, furnishing employment to 9,000 to 18,000 men, during the dull season mainly. It is anticipated that the forests thus created will become self sustaining in forty years and enormously profitable in forty years more. To some of our hand-to-mouth statesmen eighty years is a long time to look ahead, but John Bull is contented to wait. Brother Jonathan may well profit by his example.

Historical Work By States.

A number of states in the Union have done splendid work in gathering and preserving historical data relative to their rise from a wilderness to American commonwealths. Wisconsin has expended $650,000 for a building to house its historical library and museum. Iowa expended $500,000 for the same purpose. Kansas has been gathering and housing in the state capitol this kind of data ever since it had a capitol, and now Minnesota is moving for a building in which to house its books, pamphlets and other articles which reach nearly 100,000 titles. California should not permit itself to be outstripped by other states in a work so important.

The Wisconsin Central.

Whatever may take place in bringing other transcontinental railroads into a community of interest the Canadian Pacific is likely to stand alone and, by standing alone, to play an important part in the transportation interests of the United States as well as of Canada. A short time since the Canadian Pacific purchased a controlling interest in the Wisconsin Central and now has well gridironed all that country lying east of a line running from Winnipeg to Chicago and, in fine, the whole Lake Superior region, affording an outlet for all this region, over Canadian Pacific lines, to both the Atlantic and Pacific oceans. Is it to be presumed that so ambitious a system as the Canadian Pacific, almost as much American as Canadian, will not someday wish to have an independent line terminate on San Francisco Bay?

Supplying the Purse For Oppression.

It is commonly believed that the Jewish financiers of Europe and America control the purses of all the nations. Russia is a tremendous borrower. It is also the most heartless oppressor of Jewish people the world has known since the middle ages. A strike on the part of the money lenders of Europe would force from the Russian autocracy equal rights for the Jews. Nevertheless we find that the Russian loan of $280,000,000, allotted to London and Paris, was greatly oversubscribed in both cities. Why so?

A School For Foremen.

Prof. A. Lawrence Lowell, lately chosen to succeed President Eliot of Harvard, has maintained for five years, at his own expense, a free school for young mechanics who have the ambition to become foremen instead of day workers. It is a night school, has courses of study running two years and fits its graduates to take instructions from mechanical engineers and execute them with squads of workmen under their charge. This is a form of industrial education that labor unions have wanted instead of trade schools, but available only to apprentices. This school has not that restriction, but it is of a type to supply a want seriously felt.

Purify the Streams.

Massachusetts and New York, Kentucky and Ohio, are trying to get together in their respective localities, for joint protection of their interstate streams from pollution by cities and towns along their banks. Dumping sewage into streams is a convenient way of killing people, where the particular person to be killed is a matter of indifference, but inasmuch as that kind of killing is seldom justifiable the practice of polluting streams should be stopped. Our own California Board of Health is taking steps in this direction. Public opinion should help it to take strides.

The Manufacturers Also Object.

Massachusetts has reduced manufacturing in its prisons to the lowest terms consistent with manufacturing at all. It has taken all the profit to the state out of it and its only value is to keep the prisoners moderately busy. So many articles are manufactured that the output cannot amount to a drop in the bucket in competition with any manufacturer, and yet manufacturers are in arms against prison competition. Their opposition is short-sighted. They do not realize that the whole trouble is that prisoners are not competing with free labor as every free man does compete and that the remedy is to get the prisoners back into society on a competing basis as soon as possible. The only reasonable requirement is that prison-made goods shall not undersell free goods, and Massachusetts sells at open market prices only.

Conservation of the Children.

A concerted movement is on foot throughout the East to force upon the national government uniform legislation in relation to child labor in support of what Senator Beveridge of Indiana has been striving for. It is declared that while our nation's resources should be conserved its children are its greatest resource and most need conserving. One in every twenty under sixteen is toiling in some factory, mine or industrial shop of some sort, stunting its body, dwarfing its mind and making it unfit to bear the burdens of citizenship. Money-madness coins the blood of children into dividends with as little compunction as the blood of sheep, hogs or cattle.

Right Relationship League.

The Interstate Conference of the Right Relationship League of America has been held at Minneapolis, Minnesota. The League has a chain of seventy-six stores in Minnesota and their aggregate profits for 1908 were about $200,000. There is another chain of seventy-four stores in other states and California is to be invaded, the success of the Rochdale stores in this state making it an inviting field. The purpose is to market products as well as to purchase commodities with reduced intermediate charges.

Indulgent Uncle Sam.

Dear old, fond and patient Uncle Sam, having set Cuba to rights again, has suffered the little politicians of the Queen of the Antilles to play once more at the game of government. As with most ill-tempered children, who fall to playing rudely, the game is likely to end in another melee. When it does Uncle Sam will be more foolish than those who love him take him to be if he does not put a stop to that game altogether. Two negro preachers were traveling on a Mississippi steamboat. Between them they had one gold-headed cane and one silk hat, one wearing the hat and the other carrying the cane. Each half hour of the trip they made an exchange of hat for cane and cane for hat and strutted accordingly. President Gomez and Vice-President Zayas have agreed to a similar arrangement with regard to their respective offices, thus proving that they bear a relation to a dignified republican government that the two negro preachers bore to the earnest and efficient ministry of our time. By this token may they be judged.

Growing Weary of Their Trust.

When, a century and a quarter ago, Maine cut itself off from Massachusetts and assumed the equal station of a state, it promised to provide for and shelter the members of certain Indian tribes that had proven loyal to the colonies during the war for Independence. There are still 750 Indians for whom the state built and maintained substantial homes and to whom a small pension has been paid, but they have let their lands go untilled and have lived on their pensions and odd jobs. A bill is now in the legislature of Maine proposing to sell out their homes and pay a pension only. This will mean semi-starvation or steady work. The fact that there is not a pure blood Indian in the group does not make them take any more kindly to work. In fact, if they were pure white, and had a home and a pension furnished them, it may be doubted if their industrial record would be any better.

THE EMMANUEL MOVEMENT IN CALIFORNIA

By E. FRENCH STROTHER.

Dr. Elwood Worcester is in California. He is the founder of the Emmanuel Movement, or the practice of mental healing by clergymen of the older religious denominations, by scientific method and the co-operation of physicians. He lectured last Monday at the St. Francis Hotel in San Francisco, before the clergymen and physicians of the city; and explained exactly his faith, his methods, and the results he has achieved.

Invitation of Bishop Nichols.

Doctor Worcester comes to California at the invitation of Bishop F. Nichols, of the Episcopal diocese of California. Last summer Dr. Albert B. Shields, of Boston, a lecturer at Tufts College and affiliated with Doctor Worcester's work, visited this coast. His visit was mainly for recreation, but, because of his known connection with the Emmanuel Movement, he was importuned to make addresses on the subject, so that he gave lectures upon it in many cities in California. His descriptions of the work aroused general interest, and resulted in much inquiry upon mental healing and its relation to religion.

Preventing Use by Charlatans.

Talk having arisen of introducing Doctor Worcester's methods into practice in this state, Bishop Nichols felt called upon to take notice of the general demand for information. He realized that the practice of mental healing is fraught with serious dangers, as well as with possibilities of great good, and he felt that, as the movement seemed certain to spread in this state, it should be introduced under auspices that would guarantee the fullest knowledge of the facts and that would prevent its practice by ignorant men or charlatans. He therefore arranged to have Doctor Worcester come in person to San Francisco, and to deliver to the most eminent men of the church and the medical profession his own statement of his work.

Clergy and Physicians Co-operate.

The distinctive character of Doctor Worcester's method is its co-operation with the established practice of medicine. In this character it differs radically from Eddysism, or Christian Science, which declares that all disease is a delusion, and that medical science is not only of no use, but is actually a hindrance to the sufficient operation of Faith to heal the mind of its delusion that the body is diseased.

Doctor Worcester, on the other hand, fully acknowledges the reality of scientific medicine's power, and advises its use for most forms of disease. But he maintains that a certain class of diseases—called by doctors "functional neuroses," or diseases of the nerves without any appreciable change of nerve structure—can best be treated without either medicine or surgery; and that such treatment rationally falls within the province of the Church.

Only Nervous Diseases Treated.

"Functional neuroses" are, generally speaking, diseases that have their origin in disorders of the mind—produced, for instance, by liquor or drug habits, by worry, or by brooding upon a great misfortune. These diseases do not affect the bodily structure, nor the vital organs. They are mental diseases, purely, and have no existence except in the mind and in the resultant action of the mind upon the nervous system. The treatment of such diseases must be mainly mental suggestion—first, by creating confidence in the patient's mind that the person treating him can cure him, and then by encouraging hope and giving him other things to think about that will lead him to forget his imaginary disease.

When we say "imaginary" disease the reader must not think that such disease is trivial. It is very real; and often amounts to long misery and sometimes ends in death. An "imaginary disease" in such cases is really a disease of the imagination—which, after all, is a large part of our vital spark of life.

Doctor Worcester treats only such diseases as these described above, and he has had genuine success. He insists, before treating any case, that the patient shall be thoroughly examined by a competent physician and if he has appendicitis, or a cancer, or a broken leg, or tuberculosis, he quite properly turns the case over completely to the physician. But if the patient be physically sound, but mentally diseased, Doctor Worcester takes charge of the case, and applies his treatment.

Method of Treatment.

The methods of this treatment have often been described. The principal element of it is inducing a deep sleep (by suggestion, or even by hypnotism) and then, while the patient's nerves are at peace and his conscious self has lapsed into unconsciousness, to speak over and over again to his subconscious self words of hope and encouragement, that will—it is claimed—continue to affect his motives and thoughts when his conscious self emerges from slumber.

Doctor Worcester's practice, so far as the church authorities of San Francisco are aware, has not yet been introduced into any Episcopal church in California. It is, therefore, interesting to know the attitude of that church in California toward the Emmanuel Movement, and the attitude of Californian doctors toward it. So far as we have been able, by investigation, to find these out, they are as follows:

Attitude of Californian Episcopacy.

The state of mind of the western Episcopal churchmen toward the Emmanuel Movement is mainly that of an open-minded interrogation. The subject has been widely advertised and widely discussed, but full and exact details are lacking. When Doctor Worcester supplies these, local opinion will probably crystallize into adoption of his methods or into open opposition to their use. There seems to be a tinge of scepticism in the Californian church attitude, which may be explained by the traditional conservatism of the Episcopal church toward any new doctrine or practice in church affairs. This scepticism may be more than usually strong because of the radical nature of Doctor Worcester's claims. But he is here practically as the guest of the Californian branch of the church, and so is received with at least open-minded tolerance.

Attitude of Physicians.

The physicians' opinion of Doctor Worcester is more positive. Their reception was as friendly and as open-minded as that of the church, and much less sceptical; but they take issue radically with him upon the advisability of clergymen treating disease. They do not doubt the reality of his cures. They agree with his methods of treatment. But they are inclined to the view that, even in the limited field of diseases to which Doctor Worcester confines himself, a physician is the better man to treat such cases.

The physicians' admission of the merit of Doctor Worcester's work is based on two facts: one, his methods are exactly the methods of medical men—in fact, Doctor Worcester would be the first to declare this to men; and, second, doctors generally agree that psychotherapy (as mental healing is called in the profession) has occupied a subordinate place in the research work of medical scientists during the last twenty-five years. The word "research" should be emphasized. In actual practice, physicians do use, and always have used, the devices of mental suggestion used by Doctor Worcester; and one physician in San Francisco informs us that a brother physician in this city—a nerve specialist—can duplicate from his practice every success that Doctor Worcester has achieved in Boston. But in "research"—the work done in laboratories by trained medical investigators for the purpose of arriving at the exact facts upon which everyday practice is based—the medical profession has somewhat slighted the study of nervous diseases. This is not a re-fection upon the medical profession, because the reason for it is clear and sufficient. In the past, physiology and electricity, and medical science has opened up all the wonderful possibilities involved in the discovery of the germ origin of many diseases, and of the specific treatment of many of these diseases by serums or anti-toxins. Hydrophobia, diphtheria, and tetanus have been practically annihilated. Yellow fever will soon be a matter of history only. Tuberculosis will follow in a few years. And, in surgery, the possibilities of abdominal surgery have opened the way to enormous advances in the methods of saving life. So science has not been neglectful through inertia, but through being so busy with revolutionary advancement along other lines.

Nor has medical science been wholly neglectful even in its researches in nervous diseases. Any doctor can name a dozen men in the profession who have advanced the knowledge of psychological phenomena amazingly in the last thirty years. The courses in the medical schools are laying increasing emphasis upon psychotherapy, and the more advanced physicians of the day are better equipped with knowledge of the subject than Doctor Worcester could conceivably be.

Objections by the Doctors.

The reasons, then, why the doctors object to clerical treatment of nervous diseases are, that they know the subject better than the clergymen, and that, though Doctor Worcester may be wholly discreet in his treatment, there is grave danger that other clergymen who take up his methods may not be so well informed nor so careful. In short, when medical treatment is practiced outside of the medical profession it easily becomes a tool of incompetents or charlatans—an assertion abundantly verified by the fact that in certain nervous diseases the very thing by people professing to practice Christian Science.

The doctors insist that psychotherapy is a medical practice, and should, therefore, be used only by the profession. They concede only this one point: that in certain nervous derangements it is conceivable that the effect on the patient's imagination of the religious tradition of hope and power, which invest the clergyman in his parishioners' eyes with more than earthly authority, may be a desirable aid to the physician's treatment. But it should be only an aid; it should not supersede it, because the physician's more exact knowledge of the general subjects involved is indispensable.

Origin of the Emmanuel Movement.

The Emmanuel Movement had its origin in Doctor Worcester's feeling that the church was losing its hold upon the people. The spiritual message of the church seemed no longer to have the same attracting power nor the old grip upon the minds of men. The "institutional" activities of the church—its reading rooms, social gatherings, and the like—attracted the people, but did not make the spiritual message any more compelling.

Cleansing a man's body of disease opened the man's mind to faith in the power that healed him. And Doctor Worcester believes that this power to heal, in certain diseases, is as much a gift of the apostles of religion today as it was in the days of Christ. He set about, therefore, to put before men to-day the authority of the church in its earliest manifestation of influence and attraction. He would make again its power to heal the body a symbol of its power to cleanse the soul.

Where the movement will end no one can forecast. It will probably spread widely. It has the power to do much good. It has equal power, if ignorantly used, to do much harm. Physicians believe it will tend to help itself, and that the church will abandon it to the medical profession. Conservative churchmen agree with this view, and believe that the church will find other means of making effective its spiritual mission among men.

THE BIG STORM

By ALEX. G. MCADIE, Official Forecaster, San Francisco.

If one could forecast the season in California and be able to say even for a month in advance the probable character of the season, it would be the work of the meteorologists, the state perhaps one fifth of the total value of their crop. Not only the agriculturist, but the stock man, the engineer and the business man would profit by such knowledge. In California, other things being equal, the dry year is a poor year; and, on the other hand, seasons in which the rainfall is generous and well distributed, are years of prosperity.

But note the term "well distributed." The present storm is an illustration of what the term stands for. As these words are written, in nearly all parts of the state, too much water has fallen within a limited period of time. We are glad to get the water and can use it all, but it must be delivered to us in less copious downpours. The present storm may be said to have had its beginning about January 11th, and in the ten days following we have had four disturbances, or barometric depressions, each accompanied by generous rains.

The first indication of such a condition is the fall in pressure along the northern coast. The forecaster, with his reports and with his knowledge gained from reports covering many years, studies the set of the winds along the entire coast. It may be that a report of the conditions of the weather at sea comes to him by wireless from some vessel on the Pacific. In this particular storm wireless reports were missing until January 13th when the S. S. Pueblo sent in the report of rainy weather and high east winds. Later during the storm, reports were received from the S. S. Hilonian, 140 miles out, and the S. S. Queen and S. S. Rose City.

As yet the Pacific is not very thickly dotted with vessels equipped with wireless, but each day brings us nearer this desired consummation. Meanwhile, reports from all of the larger cities in the United States, from Nome, Sitka, Manila, and Honolulu come in by one to the forecaster's desk. He has before him, as it were, a relief map of the lower atmosphere. In it he finds certain depressions and counter depressions. On the Pacific Coast he notes the eastern edge of the big whirl of air as it impinges on the land. Warnings of probable high southeast wind are telegraphed to all prominent points along the coast, that is, to points like Tatoosh, or the entrance to the Puget Sound, North Head, at the mouth of the Columbia river, Eureka, California, Cape Mendocino, Point Reyes, San Francisco and all the southern ports.

Sea captains know the meaning of all flags and can thus judge whether it is desirable to venture north or south. In this storm, warnings were displayed as early as 3 p. m. of January 11th, and throughout the entire period of the storm the eastern edge of the big whirl of air preceding heavy winds by periods varying from two to twelve hours. No storm condition has ever been more successfully handled. Under shipping news one may read in the daily papers of ships that anchor in the harbor aware of the approach of the new storm. So much for the warning.

Rainfall remains to be considered. No one can judge yet of the probable amount of rain in any one storm, but there are certain types of storm peculiar to this season and coast, which the forecaster recognizes as likely to cause heavy rains in the valleys, along the coast and in the foothills and heavy snows in the mountains. Beginning Monday, January 11th, the river interests of the state were warned of the river stages at various points. As the rain continued and the waters rose day by day, all interested could ascertain the rise at the particular points likely to affect their own special interests. As the water approached flood stages warnings were sent out to all communities of the probable height of water twenty-four hours after the receipt of the message.

The warnings given in this storm have saved many lives and much property. For example, it may be stated that some time on January 11th or 12th the head of one of the railway systems, acting upon the advice of the Weather Bureau officials, notified all of the general superintendents from Los Angeles to Portland to exercise unusual care and to take every precaution. This large transportation company has lost many bridges, the waters have risen above its tracks where they have never reached before, yet we have not heard of the loss of life of a passenger. Double track-patrols were ordered and, as stated before, every precaution taken, not only during, but actually in advance of the storm.

Some of the rainfalls have been phenomenally heavy. At San Francisco the succession of storms has caused a rise in the seasonal rainfall from about six inches to fourteen inches. Remember that the total rainfall of a whole season is only about twenty-three inches, and you will see that during this storm we have had nearly one-fourth of the whole year's rainfall.

The question is frequently asked: What do we mean by the "normal" referred to in the daily papers? Simply the average rainfall including all seasons up to the particular hour at which the report is published. Thus the normal up to 5 p. m., January 27th, for San Francisco is 12.06 inches. The rainfall of the present season being fourteen inches is therefore two inches greater than the normal. Some may wonder why, with so much rain, the amount is not more in excess. The explanation is simply that they have forgotten the long dry period during the fall months and the first part of our winter. Individual heavy rainfalls have been chronicled in the daily papers, but the true story will not be known of how the rain fell in this storm until all the reports at the rain gauges in California, kept by the four hundred observers of the Weather Bureau, are received after the close of the month by mail. Then it will be seen that at some points on some days as much as seven, eight or nine inches of rain have fallen in twenty-four hours, and for the storm period at some places amounts ranging from thirty to forty or fifty inches, while in the mountains the unmelted snow still remaining on the ground will amount to 100 or possibly 160 inches at the higher elevations. The tremendous amount of water brought into the state can be roughly estimated.

In a dry January month we have known of a deficiency for the whole state of something like 229,254 multiplied by 155,980 tons of water. On the other hand, a wet winter month, such as the present, brings into the state nearly twice the amount of water here given in a dry month. This means something like 100,000,000,000 tons of water represents the excess due to a rainy period similar in character to this one in the state of California.

Which is Whose?

One of the leading American magazines is edited for "the old lady from Oshkosh," and another for "the Kansas farmer's hired man's fourteen-year-old daughter." Nothing that these two people would not like or could not understand is printed in these magazines.

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE.

The Teddy Bear to Go?

It is announced that now that President Roosevelt's term of office is about to terminate, and President-elect Taft's term soon will begin, the Teddy Bear, so dear to the heart of childhood, will be displaced by the Billy Possum.

Mayhap they're right who say 'tis so—
To contradict I do not care—
But there's a little maid I know
Who'll not desert her Teddy Bear.
The woolly bear of beady eye
She drags about, wherever she goes,
Or croons a baby lullaby
When deep it growls at phantom foes

Her Teddy is a sight, I ween, Battered and frayed from feet to poll
Now in the parlor it is seen.
And now amidst the scuttled coal;
And oft it gives me quite a quail,
When she has left it in my care,
To hear her say in accents calm:
'Now, papa, kiss my Teddy Bear'

And if I hesitate, you know,
As one with self-respect must do,
She says in voice of baby woe:
'I love my Teddy—p'ease, don't oo?'
And then I kiss that Teddy Bear,
And take a stomach tonic, too;
For such a task I do not care,
But then, I ask you, wouldn't you?

And so she toddles through the day,
My baby and her woolly friend,
And when to sleep she's tucked away
Her slumber sweet doth he attend.
But first she says her "lay me down,"
And adds, "Teep mama in thy care,
And papa, too," then, all to crown,
'And, Dod, p'ease bless my Teddy Bear.'

So bring your Billy Possums on,
And sell them all as best you may;
Smiles of contempt for Teddies don;
And say they should be tossed away;
Insist such things but come and go
In this great world of toys to spare,
But there's a little maid I know
Who'll not desert her Teddy Bear

Fable of the Perturbed Legislator.

A certain Assemblyman who had gone to the Legislature from San Francisco, and consequently was Honorable with a capital letter, was discovered weeping as if he were a Noble in trousers.

"Wherefore weepst thou?" a Sympathetic Friend inquired.

"Because I—alas!—have been abused, in sulted, affronted and outraged."

"Who did the evil deed?"

"The Secretary of the People's Lobby, the wretch!"

"What did he do?"

"Asked me to explain why I did not vote on a righteous measure, claiming he wished to give me a show to demonstrate that I was decent."

"But have you not been accustomed to having your votes investigated and suggested by Burke, Parker, Hatton and those nice boys?"

"Oh, yes, yes, but they—they—ah, woe is me!"

"They what?"

"They—they—oh, this iniquitous People's Lobby—they never asked me to demonstrate that I am decent!"

Moral:—There are some things which even a People's Lobby should not ask of certain Legislators.

A Perfect Love Lyric.

"I believe," said the Poet, contemptuously, "that I have evolved from my inner consciousness the one perfect love lyric for which a yearful world has waited, the one for which the wooing heart of Cupid-hit humanity has longed, the one which sweetly sings the song of the lover at all times and under all conditions, the one—"

"And I suppose you want to read it to me?" the Editor interposed. "Well, you can't do it!"

"No, I could not read it so that you would understand all of its manifold perfections; you would miss some of them sure. Just take a look at it, and you will realize why."

The editor was about to throw the manuscript in the basket, but something about it attracted his attention, and he read the following:

To My Loved One. _____ hair
My heart for aye entangles; _____
Her _____ fingers weave a snare
When'er that hair she bangles _____ eyes,
I look within her _____ eyes,
And would not look above her _____
Her _____ form with _____ vies—
I love her, oh, I love her _____

* Insert name of girl—Lillian, Mabel, Alice, or whatever it may be—in possessive case.

 Soft brown, rich black, brick red, as circumstances may require.

 Slim white, or soft pink. Girls don't have any other kind of fingers.

* Great brown, soft black, cat's green, or whatever the case demands.

 Sylphlike, or rounded—nothing else will do.

 Naiads, or Juno's, as the girl may vary.

"Read the next verse," said the Poet, as he saw that the Editor was about to throw it away.

"Can't. I'm not feeling well to-day," was the response.

"But don't you think it's fine, a masterly production?"

"Great!"

"And the beauty of it is," said the Poet, as he prepared to back out of the office, "that an ambitious and energetic young man is not circumscribed in breathing his love to the dear girl. By making appropriate changes, he can send out several in a day, thus winning number—Ouch!"

For the Editor had acted, and so the Poet departed.

The Opinions of Rufus.

Don't ask me to 'sauge my grief. Ef you had a child that's likely to be in the Berkeley high school next year you'd know jest how I feel.

I don't know how many children Solomon had, though, jedgin' by his matrimonial bonds, I s'pose there mus' have ben a few hundred, anyway; but they certainly was a heap of experience biled down in his remark 'bout sparin' the rod an' spilin' the child.

Ef the Almighty ever hed made each birds es is worn on some feminine hats, even the women would realize that Providence ain't 'bove jokin' sometimes.

The law permits children to try to break their father's will, but one thing orto be said fer it: It has nothin' to do with makin' them meen 'nough ter want to do it.

Once I knew a man that didn't take an intelligent int'rest in anything, but he made a fine livin'. How'd he do it, you say? Why, by servin' on juries, o' course.

The Good Book mentions a unpardonable sin, an' I've 'bout concluded that it's bein' ketch'd at it.

Soon es you kin convince me that women'll show less sense in votin' than men do I'm goin' to be dead set 'gainst givin' them any suffrage.

I know some men that are honest, only they don't have time to 'tend to it much.

Sometimes I kinder doubt ef any woman kin really be as good es some of 'em look to be.

How Laws Are Made.

"How do they make their laws on the earth?" Adolphus inquired.

"The method is simple," the Being from Saturn replied. "Their legislature consists of the senate, the assembly, and Parker, Hatton and Burke."

Suppose that a law is under consideration. Some of the assemblymen go to Parker, Hatton and Burke and have a friendly talk with them. Then they depart and do their share toward making the law.

"After that some of the senators go to Parker, Hatton and Burke and have a friendly talk. They then return to the senate chamber and do their part toward passing the law and sending it on to the Governor, who may veto it if he chooses. Thus do they wisely provide against two vetoes."

"I don't understand how you mean," said Augustus.

"Why, one by the Governor, afterwards, and another by Parker, Hatton and Burke, in advance."

"Under such circumstances I should think it would be advantageous to so arrange that the Governor and Parker, Hatton and Burke would be in sympathy in their purposes."

"They usually do. At least, I found it so when I was there."

"Who elects the lawmakers?"

"Well, the people elect the Governor, the senators and assemblymen, but I never was able to ascertain who elects Parker, Hatton and Burke. I think they were just hired."

The Being had to go down town, and the conversation terminated.

The Story of the Man Who Slew His Soul.

A man said to himself: I would get rich. So he went to a friend and asked him: How may I get wealthy with honesty? His friend answered: You must strive in hard labor for many years, and give a square deal.

But he said to himself: I will not take his council; that is too much to put in. So he went to another and asked him: How may I get wealthy?

And he said: By any means you can, so you keep inside the law until you get rich enough.

But he asked: How about my principles of honor and justice?

Then the other said: There is but one principle; it is money. And I can show you how to get it.

Then the man said: Show me; for he wanted money.

And the other showed him a paper with secret writing on it. And he took the paper, and went about it to get the money.

But he was so encumbered with the weight of his love of truth, of justice and his personal honor that he could not walk well.

So he said to himself: I will go and lock these in a closet in my home until I have gained my wealth, then I will take them again and wear them.

So he went and put them in the closet and locked the door.

Then he took the paper of crooked device and went for the money.

But when he arrived there an angel was guarding the door. He looked on the angel and came near to fight. But he thought of the paper, slew the angel and took the money.

And when he went on the streets, he thought of the money and the slain angel, and was afraid.

But men hailed him on account of his riches, and he forgot his fears and bought himself evidences of wealth.

Then he said to himself: Now that I am great in the land, I will make myself loved also. I will go now and get my love of truth and of justice, and my honor, where I put them in the closet and wear them once more.

So he went and unlocked the closet door and looked in. But there was nothing there but the blood stains of the angel. E. W.

WITH EYES AND :: EARS OPEN ::

There was a funeral in our neighborhood the other day; obscure, slimly attended, and of so little social consequence that the daily papers made no note of it, but grief is grief whether its tears be shed by a mausoleum or over the plainest of pine boxes.

Eyes of man never looked upon a queerer funeral procession. Two small boys and a yet smaller girl—this was all there was of it, except the cigar-box coffin which a juvenile pall-bearer reverently bore. The wee girl was weeping as if her baby heart would break, and the rest of the procession looked sympathetically sad.

I drew nearer, so that I could look within the odd little coffin, and there, with folded paws which never would interest themselves in mice, lay a tiny white kitten.

"He was all the pet I had to love," said the wee girl to me, and her baby heart again broke.

I took off my hat in reverence as the quaint procession moved on. Why should I not? Is not grief sacred, wherever it may be found, and this grief was genuine. Childish it may seem to you and me, but don't you suppose that somewhere is One to whom even our sorest griefs seem childish? And do you not venture to trust that that One sympathizes with us in our wee woes, nevertheless? Then why not unlaughingly sympathize with the little maiden who had lost "all the pet she had to love?"

The woman on the ferry boat wore a hat which was principally aigret. Presumably there was something which served as a basis for the aigret, but it was invisible because of the feathers which reached their airy length two feet to the rear of the wearer. It was a nice aigret, but the rest of the hat should not have cost much.

The boat approached the pier. All of us who hasted to the front in an unselfish trust that somebody else will have to do the standing on the cars made our grand rush, the woman of the aigret with the rest. Then the trouble began.

The tip of a far-reaching feather landed in the eye of a young woman. She jumped, and landed on a corn a gentleman near her sequestered. He said, "Ouch!" and started to say something else, but apologized for the part of it he did say.

Possibly realizing that she was working destruction behind her, the woman of the aigret turned her head, and a feather tickled the nose of a man by her side. He said nothing, but has a remarkably forceful sneeze.

Another feather disturbed the sweet sleep of an innocent babe. It awoke and wept. I was glad that its mother did not say all she looked. The entertainment was very enjoyable.

After that—

But I don't know what happened after that. The feather that landed in my eye set the tears to flowing so that I could not see very well. I enjoy seeing a woman with an aigret in a crowd, but I have decided to stand a little farther away the next time I run across one.

Well out on Montgomery street the other day I met a straggling wreck of humanity who "struck me" for ten cents—"to get something to eat," he said.

"To get something to drink, you mean," said I.

"Well, put it that way if you would rather," he responded. I gladly would have given more dollars than he requested cents if I had thought that they could permanently have benefited him. They could not, yet when I first knew him, about two decades ago, his income was between $6,000 and $7,000 a year, every cent of it earned by the might of his brain, and he stood among honored men, a man.

The story is absolutely true.

"Dad always gives John the best of it, becu'z he's th' oldest. An' my humors Bobbly, becu'z he's th' baby." "And where do you come in?" "Nowheres. I gotta be good."—Cleveland Leader.

THE WORK OF

Allen's Press Clipping Bureau

FOR PUBLIC MEN

Allen's Press Clipping Bureau has now had experience in six National and five State Campaigns. In this time it has had the honor of serving hundreds of public men, including members of the Cabinet, U. S. Senators, Congressmen, Governors, State Senators and Assemblymen, Mayors, and State and County Central Committees.

It has aided these men by bringing them quickly, easily, and cheaply, what the entire press has to say of them or the measures in which they are interested.

A thorough clipping service discloses the state and trend of public opinion, brings to attention facts which should be denied, or charges that should be parried; shows what editors need argument, and what editors need encouragement in short, aids in handling the most powerful and important of political engines, the Press.

Having three offices, a staff of thirty people, and reading 2,000 coast papers per week, we have now unsurpassed facilities for very high-grade and thorough work.

We can cover counties, districts, the State, or the Pacific States.

Rates will be furnished on application.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN.

The Recall at Los Angeles Los Angeles seems likely to give the recall feature of its charter a real test of utility. Mayor Harper has proven unsatisfactory to many. His election should have proven unsatisfactory to everybody. The reform element in Los Angeles put up a clean candidate in the person of Lee Gates, a sterling Lincoln-Roosevelter. The "organization" Republicans nominated Dr. Walter Lindley, a capable man but with pronounced "organization" affiliations. The Democrats nominated Harper, also of the "organization" stripe. In order to make sure of beating Gates, Walter Parker and his cohorts fell down on Dr. Lindley and threw enough of the disreputable vote to the most objectionable candidate of the three to elect him. The interest that the Southern Pacific's political bureau had in the Los Angeles city election was, no doubt, intensified by the fact that Los Angeles is expending $23,000,000 in bringing water from Owens valley—a lot of good patronage, if not good graft, with which to hold the metropolis of the South in line for "organization" policies in both political parties.

Put Responsibility Where it Belongs The following is quoted from the San Francisco Star: "Those Alameda clergymen who recently denounced the Alameda Argus as a pro-graft organ should remember that the paper is controlled by a Federal official appointed to public office by President Roosevelt, who has summarily removed Federal officials for less offenses than supporting and endorsing graft. The Star should put the responsibility for this appointment where it belongs: Upon the shoulders of California's United States Senators, upon whose advice, and with whose consent, the President must make his appointments. The President has, until recently, had no one else in California to whom he could look for advice in such matters with the result that he has appointed a federal brigade, with few exceptions, opposed both to himself and his policies."

As Good As Any In discussing the value of the direct primary Everett Colby, the New Jersey reformer, lately declared that, wherever tried, there never has been a political boss who, the day after the primary election, had anything but abuse for the system and for everybody responsible for its being inflicted upon the people. That is a good test of its value.

Land Thieves Still at Work Not only did the gray wolves in Senate and House strive to hamper the administration at Washington from using the secret service for the prevention of land frauds, but the same influences have refused increase of salaries in the land office although all other departments are having their salaries raised. The reason why becomes clear in the announcement of Secretary Garfield that there are 32,000 distinct land cases that need investigation and that the probable value of land taken from the government during the last two years is $110,000,000. The secretary asks for one cent in the hundred of this sum to be used in recovering what has been fraudulently taken and for the punishment of those who took it. Not if the gray wolves know their business!

Soft Snaps, Short Hours New York City has a bureau of municipal research, a public-spirited body whose prerogative it is to insult the municipal personnel of New York about as the legislature of California is being insulted by the People's Lobby. Among other facts this bureau has dug out of the depths are these: That the city loses $2,500,000 in salaries paid for work that city employees do not perform by reason of short hours, leave of absence, etc., and that the total loss from inefficiency, waste, neglect of duty, carelessness, bad methods and lack of discipline foots up $20,000,000 a year. The political odd-jobs man is, judged by what he costs and accomplishes, the highest priced labor in the world, but what would the corporate political bureaus do without him?

Use Found For A Muck-Raker Ray Stannard Baker has proven one of the most intelligent investigators into public affairs in the country, but he has been given little chance to do things, only to say things. It will be different hereafter. The Michigan Civil Service League has made Mr. Baker its president and set him at work taking public offense out of corrupt hands that mischievous politicians and making it a public trust. That is a job fit for a Jack-the-Giant-Killer.

Reports Slow In Getting Out The law requires state officers to prepare and publish in August or September their biennial reports to the Governor. In order that he may, in his message to the legislature, call attention to such matters as require special mention, also that the Governor himself may be fully informed as to state affairs. A number of state officers have not yet gotten their reports into the hands of the Governor. Another cause for complaint is that copies of such reports as have been published are difficult of access because each officer does with them what he wishes and there is no repository for them at the state capitol. As much as this matter has been tinkered by the legislature it still needs further tinkering.

Senatorial "Senatorial courtesy" is coming to be almost as much of an opprobrious epithet in Sacramento as in Washington. It is employed to put something through that few care for merely because some member, for reasons entirely personal to himself, asks it as a favor. The mischief of padding the statutes comes of it if nothing else more serious. Eddie Wolfe's "Discovery Day" nuisance was gotten through both houses in this way. The better sense of the members of both houses would have prompted them to vote against it had not "courtesy" been asked for it by both Wolfe and Grove Johnson.

Alien Land Law Likely to Pass There is a fair likelihood that the Drew bill, or something having its essential features, prohibiting the ownership of agricultural land in California by aliens will be passed by both houses, though there is some uncertainty about its getting by the Governor. It will apply to all foreign citizens in order to include the Chinese and Japanese without making invidious discriminations against them. As such aliens can become citizens, while the Chinese and Japanese cannot, there still remains something of a discrimination but it is not believed that this will provoke serious diplomatic complications. This will be a long stride toward making California a white man's country.

The Trocha Not Popular Despite the persuasive power of Grover Cleveland, Johnson and his colleagues irreverently call his "bull pen bill" is not likely to become a law. Its apparent purpose is to enable municipalities to set apart certain portions of their corporate limits to be inhabited by persons undesirable from a moral, sanitary or peace-preserving point of view, but its real purpose is understood to be the corralling of Japanese and Chinese within certain closely defined limits. It savors of Russian methods and goes against the grain of American sentiment.

The Pool-Sellers Probably Hard Hit Indications are that Senator Lewis is bested. Forceful though he is and sympathetic as many senators are with him personally, the force of public sentiment against race-track gambling is so strong that a majority of the senate will hardly dare stand up against it. The danger now is that something too drastic, or too certainly unconstitutional, may be introduced into the measure to its hurt. Otherwise the bookies and touts of California seem likely to fold their tents and go to Tia Juana to steal.

Hard Sledding For Primary The Sacramento atmosphere is proving unsalubrious for the Direct Primary bill as it came from the hands of the League. The Italian hand of the "organization" is seen to be out against it. The organization wants a bluff at a direct primary bill enacted but not a real one. Leeds of Los Angeles is getting up one and Leeds is an "organization" man. The senate and assembly committees are hostile to "ready made" legislation. They prefer custom made, especially if the customer is so distinguished a personage as Mr. Herrin. Party pledges to the contrary notwithstanding the People of California will be given the shadow rather than the substance of a direct primary law if the "powers that be" can make the shadow serve the purpose of a pretence at keeping a party pledge whose good faith was doubtful from the start.

The First Since Seward Since Elihu Root was elected United States Senator from New York the Empire State has been hugging itself in a delirium of joy that at last it had a real statesman to represent it, the first since William H. Seward. Roscoe Conkling cut quite a figure in the public eye, but he was three parts politician to one part statesman, a "well dressed sneer," and nothing to be proud of except by comparison with Tom Platt. Root is a greater man than was Seward, broader and deeper, with less of vanity and far less of tendency to trim sails to the trend of the wind. New York has a right to be proud of her new senator and when it sends Roosevelt or Hughes to keep him company she may feel proud again with equal justification.

The President's Part In It There are those who cherish resentment toward the President and Secretary Root for their part they have taken in anti-Japanese legislation, but the administration at Washington would have been derelict in its duty to the nation if it had permitted our legislature to jeopardize the good faith of the nation by ill-considered action, or action regardless of the interests of the nation. International relations are for the nation to deal with and the time will come when no doubt as to this will be permitted to remain in the minds of the people of any state. Nevertheless, California must do all it can to educate, not affront, public sentiment throughout the East, to the idea that the Pacific coast must be a white, not a brown, man's country.

The Ethics of Agriculture.

What a New Englander cannot get cities out of or into will hardly pay hauling charges for use as a fertilizer. While other parts of the country are studying agriculture from an economic standpoint the New England institute lecturer is instructing his hearers with regard to the ethical relations of agriculture to the general public as well as to the agriculturist. One demand is for more wholesome novels written with the view of making New England farm life attractive, another for an effort to supplant spiritual and intellectual barrenness with fullness, for the extension of a more generous hospitality to foreigners who, if encouraged, will make New England farms profitable and social life healthful. There is an organized movement having all these purposes in view and it is linked up with the New England Country Church Association.

UP AND DOWN :: THE STATE ::

During 1908 the Coalinga field produced 10,996,781 barrels of crude oil.

It is estimated that since January 1st not less than 1,000 people arrived in this state daily from the East. This is the largest immigration that California has known for several years.

The Italian earthquake, having cut off the supply of Messina lemons, has largely increased the demand for the California product.

Citizens of Palo Alto adopted a new charter for their city by a vote of 355 to 226.

A seven-year-old boy in Napa "held up" and robbed another small lad of $7.10 given to the latter by his mother to pay for a bill of goods, and the authorities have been puzzled what to do with so young an offender.

One of the Salvation Army dormitories of the orphanage at Lytton's Springs was destroyed by fire recently.

Lime Kiln schoolhouse, near Grass Valley, was burned to the ground, with all its contents, last week. It is suspected that the fire may have been caused by a tramp.

On the edge of Death Valley a San Bernardino prospector recently found a stone nearly as large as a pigeon's egg, which a Tiffany expert declares to be a diamond.

An old man named Nye Buffham, and supposed to be a resident of Laton in this state, was run over and killed by a Western Pacific train at Marysville the other day.

The Californian who seeks cold might find it at Truckee, where the thermometer registered twenty-four degrees below zero recently, and he who enjoys warmth should seek Imperial, where the mercury on the same day stood at more than eighty degrees above.

Negotiations are well under way for the purchase of over 500 acres of land near Bonny Doon on which a large cement plant may be established.

An Oroville jury gave Mrs. R. Diller a verdict of $30,000 against the Northern California Power Company as damages for the life of her husband, who was killed by coming in contact with a high-voltage electric line which had fallen in the road.

During the year 1908 the Goldfield mining district produced gold of the value of $26,147,000.

The Fresno grand jury in its latest report favored the "rockpile" as a remedy for hobos.

The Marysville Appeal is forty-nine years old this month, and it is as good as it is old.

It is said that a prospective railroad between Lakeport and Pieta on the Northwestern Pacific will be so far completed as to be in condition to transport passengers by next July.

The Southern Pacific, it is said, now carries thirty men on its lines to "head off" the hoboes who are coming into California.

Eighteen Fresno dealers were arrested on the 21st instant for selling tobacco to children.

John Wasson, a pioneer editor of Southern California, died in Pomona last week. He adorned his profession and served his constituency ably and well.

William A. Blagrove, a pioneer of '49, and one of the best known citizens of Shasta county, died in French Gulch last week Thursday.

The recently incorporated San Joaquin Eucalyptus Company will plant several hundred acres in Merced county to eucalyptus trees.

Oroville's new levee, built since the flood of 1907, has proved a success, and that city has received no injury from the river which flooded it two years ago.

There are under construction in the East, for the Southern Pacific Company, the two largest locomotives ever built. Each will cost between $30,000 and $35,000, and, with its tender, will weigh 580,000 pounds.

The Story of the Man Who Built a Great House.

A man built a great house, and he said: I have fashioned this house so that all those who are cultured and love honor will come here and spend their time in richness of heart.

Look about, and you will see that I have fashioned it with great halls in simple beauty. For the scholar I have built a library, for the musician a music room, for the artist a gallery, and every sort of place for those whom I would have come.

And he lit it up with beautiful lights that it might be seen and admired.

Then the name of it went abroad, and those he had desired came; and great was their pleasure with that house.

But down below he built a basement. And in that basement he put tables and wheels of fortune, and all things loved of the evil; and he left the door unfastened. But he said: I will put no lights within, that no one may see what is here.

But after a while there came those who love these things of evil device to look at the lights in the upper house, and longed to get in.

Then they found the unlocked door in the basement and went in, and were jubilant with what was there.

They pulled the tables out from the walls, set light about them, and looked at the windows. And some went and gathered all those whom they knew, together with scarlet women. And the noise of their revels and evil games rose to the house above, together with the smell of their spilled wine so that those who were there were astounded.

Then the man of that house went below and would throw them all out. But the leader of them said: We will be quieter. There is money in it. And he took money and went back.

But the noise of their evil soon rose again, and the guests of the upper house were ashamed and departed.

Then a new reputation of that house went abroad. It was known as the house of the under story.

And those who love the under story came from distances to dwell in that house until it was filled from foundation to top with a great glitter and a show of corrupt wealth.

And the man of that house wondered why those who had been his guests came no more.

But an angel came by in the dawn, and wrote on the walls of that house: As the foundation, so is the house. E. W.

Widowed.

A little quiver of the wasted frame,

A little sighing as of one asleep:

And this is Death, they say—Ah, no!

If Death were only this I would not weep.

He is awake in God, but gone from me:

He did not even know that Death had come

For joy and wonder at infinity—

No, Death is this, in me, a cold and dumb

Withdrawing in of self, an ashen hush

Settling upon my heart, a weight as lead

That crushes all but sorrow in my breast—

His is the living spirit, mine the dead.

ADDRESS TO A MUMMY.

By Tom Gregory.

[Under a pyramid in Thebes, Egypt, an embalmed body was found and from the papyrus book of the Dead on the coffin it was learned that the man almost 3000 years ago had gone down the red way splandering his life and wealth in wild dissipation. These lines are dedicated to Mr. Sharboro, the Apostle of Sobriety.]

And so you went the pace—the same old story.

Tho' new, perhaps, three thousand years ago—

When you made Memphis howl and painted gory

Streaks on Thebes' hundred massive gates of stone;

Till bull-god Apis bellowed in his stable And every granite pile became a Babel.

It's true "there's nothing new beneath the sun," even

Our choicest, fairest frailties were caught, Perfected, and practiced over twenty-seven

Dead centuries ago. On second thought, Maybe we only sin reincarnations

Of your once wild, archaic profligations.

However, let that rest. Now tell us, mummy,

Of times and things by Old Nile's sacred stream

Before they left you spicy, dusty, gummy,

To lie through thirty hundred years of dream—

Left you laid out in asphalt and in sadness To sleep with your accumulated badness.

And did you raise the crouching sphinxes, yelling

When day was purpling o'er the Indian Sea; And set the morning song of Memnon swelling

Across the Libyan sands? Did you set free The prehistoric tongues of Egypt talking,

And all the hawk-head gods of Karnac squawking?

You lived and died too early, son. You missed Great Cleopatra's rattle-dazzle day.

You might have rivaled Caesar; might have kissed

The queen from Antony, and thrown some worlds away

Yourself—Melted pearls in acid, drank, and later

Helped Cleo mix a poison for the waiter.

And yet they thrust upon you much preferment—

Put royal beetles on your coffin lid, To hold you in your place of long interment

Piled on your grave a heavy pyramid. Its weight pressed out your life's besetting sin

And held you thirty centuries to sober in. Santa Rosa, January 14, 1909.

HOW THE PEOPLE MAY ELECT FREE JUDGES

By WILLIAM DENMAN.

There is a growing conviction among students of the government of American States, particularly of the profession of the law, that the selection of judges by popular election is a failure, and that we must return to the method of appointment which is in use in more than ninety per cent of the civilized world. It is not my intention to undertake the discussion of the relative merits of the two systems further than to point out that those attacking the elective method have offered no conclusive, or even relevant, evidence from American history to support the contention that it is a failure. The fact is that in those states where the judicial branch of government is most open to criticism there has never been an election where the selection of judges, on the basis of their judicial capacity, has been fairly left to the direct vote of the people; and such is the citizens' distrust of "special interests," control of party conventions and their nominees, who often become our governors and other elective officers, that there is small hope of any reform of our judicial system which places the nomination of judges in such hands.

Judicial Functions Not Legislative.

Our constitution has recognized three classes of governmental functions—legislative, executive and judicial—and it requires no special training in governmental science to discern that the three functions are different in kind. The functions of the legislature, exercised by both the senate and assembly and the governor, are creative in their nature; they look to shaping the future conduct of the people by the enactment of law for their guidance and control.

About the selection of new social conditions by legislative enactment, whether it be a repeal or a new law, the minds of men are bound to differ, as the constructive imagination in each differs from his neighbor's. Gradually these differences sort themselves, men become grouped in parties, and party government is evolved to make efficient the ideals for which the largest numbers are combined. Party government has a logical basis. Its machinery has reached a high state of perfection, it performs a necessary function in society, and it has come to stay. But its justification is as a piece of machinery to get at a practical solution of questions about which men's minds may differ.

Judges Must Enforce Laws As They Are.

The executive and judicial functions, however, are not all concerned with the future, nor in any proper sense are they concerned with the propriety of existing conditions as created by legislation. They enforce or interpret laws as they are, impartially and regardless of whether they do or do not fit the society on which they are imposed. Now there cannot be any difference of opinion about the method of enforcing or interpreting laws. The judge or officer who, in violation of his oath, fails to recognize a law because it is unpopular or outworn, and tries to compel its repeal by demonstrating its unfitness, properly merits the contempt of thinking men. Partisanship in a judge or in an executive officer (insofar as his functions are not legislative) is as illogical from the governmental standpoint as it is dishonorable in ethics. There is this difference, however, between the purely executive and the judicial functions: The former are within the accomplishment of most trained business men and no great preparation is required for their discharge, nor are any very deep public suffering arising from the incumbency of an incompetent. The latter demand professional knowledge acquired by long training and experience, and high spiritual and mental qualities. A stupid tax collector is made innocuous by his deputies. A stupid, or dishonest, or partisan judge destroys the people's confidence in the stability of our social order.

Californian Judges Mostly Partisan.

Despite these generally recognized truths, it is practically impossible to enter a judicial position in any American State, having California's form of ballot, unless the candidate receives a large number of votes given him for purely partisan considerations. In California, while our bar, from which our bench is chosen, is fairly evenly divided between the two great parties, fifteen out of sixteen judges on our Supreme and Appellate benches belong to the Republican party. There is not a judge in the State who was not the candidate of a party receiving a large percentage of its votes from men who were concerned solely with partisan views as to the exclusion of Orientals or the regulation of tariffs or railroads or some other matter purely legislative in its nature.

California is worse off in this regard than certain other states, for not only is the unthinking partisan voter attracted to a judicial candidate by a party designation, but he is further coaxed into neglect of the judicial offices by the device of the straight party circle, which saves him from looking down the column and noticing that there is a judicial contest.

Partisan Candidates Often Bossed.

The result has been that no man dare become a judicial candidate save through the partisan convention. If the convention be controlled by special interests, he must make terms with the boss who represents the interests. If unbossed, his office often becomes a matter of barter among the delegates, and we have such a spectacle as the Democratic State convention of 1894. The final order of business was deliberately altered, and the nominations for two Supreme judges placed before that of governor to "take the judges out of politics," and then a candidate by the name of Murphy was given one of the judicial nominations so that when Mr. Barney Murphy was placed in nomination for governor against Mr. Budd a great cry was raised that the German vote would knife the ticket if it were filled up with nothing but Murphys. (This is not a criticism of Judge Murphy's qualifications, the point being that he was chosen to "do up" Mr. Barney Murphy rather than for his qualifications.) Naturally such a system makes men of judicial qualifications hesitate to become candidates and tends to intimidate weak incumbents. Worse than this, a judge who is a known representative of vicious interests is likely to be reelected if he can add to the blind partisan vote the solid body of voters of the underworld who, while not numerous enough of themselves to elect, with the help of the straight ticket have in a sense the balance of power.

Compelling Non-Partisan Choice of Judges.

Now we cannot hope to open the eyes of the blind partisan by a mere alteration of the ballot, but to compel intelligent voters to vote rationally. But we can, by taking away their improper and mechanically directed party vote, compel them to make some kind of choice. Even if this choice be the names at the head of the judicial column we can neutralize its effect by rotating the names on consecutive ballots so that each name shall appear an equal number of times at the top, bottom and each intermediate place in the group of candidates, and has an equal chance at the lazy vote.

Remedy: Separate Column on Ballot.

The solution offered is a separate column on the ballot for all judicial candidates' names, with no party designation or rotation of the names on successive ballots as suggested, so that Zion will have the same chance as Aaron at the lazy vote, at the head of the column. The practical statesman at once raises the question: Are there enough voters interested in the judicial election to make rotation so submit the judicial candidates without some such guidance as the party designation? A study of the judicial elections of the past six years demonstrates that party lines are being ignored by intelligent voters in large numbers all over the State, and that, despite the hampering of the party designation and the straight ticket device, some judges are being elected from the minority party.

In San Francisco in the year 1908 the State Blue Book showed there was not a single Republican executive officer, and yet six of the twelve judges were Republican. In six other counties—Fresno, Humboldt, Kern, San Diego, Shasta and Sonoma—there appear one Democratic and one Republican judge in each county. The six judgeships in Sacramento and San Joaquin Counties are evenly divided between Republican and Democratic incumbents. In nineteen others—Alpine, Calaveras, Glenn, Kings, Lake, Monterey, Napa, Placer, San Bernardino, San Luis Obispo, San Mateo, Santa Cruz, Siskiyou, Stanislaus, Sutter, Trinity, Ventura, Yolo and Yuba—the majority of non-judicial elective offices are held by members of a party differing from that of the Superior Judge.

Splitting Ticket Not Effective.

This vote for the candidate of an opposing party, while demonstrating that the people want non-partisan judges, does not accomplish what the voter really desires. He merely succeeds in making a choice of partisan candidates. When a Democrat votes for a Republican judicial candidate he does it in spite of the fact that he is a Republican. What he wants is the best man he can find regardless of party, and he knows that the chances are that the Republican would be a more worthy candidate if he had not been controlled by a Republican to the convention and rely in part on the partisan vote. This destruction of intelligent choice by the partisan vote, it will be noticed, is successful in all cases save in those counties where the party vote is fairly evenly divided. All the Superior judges in Alameda and Los Angeles counties are Republican, and, as we have shown, fifteen out of sixteen of the State Supreme and District judges.

California Ready for This Reform.

A further evidence of the readiness of California for such an enactment is the attitude of the newspapers throughout the state. In the last three weeks of December the newspaper clipping bureaus returned eighty-seven clippings treating of the proposed measure. But four of the eighty-seven were adverse. Forty-eight of the clippings were editorials favoring the measure, and the balance were either reports of meetings endorsing it, or reproductions of letters advocating it, with favoring headlines.

The Chief Justices of Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Rhode Island, Illinois, Mississippi, Oregon, Nevada, Wyoming, Arizona and Montana have endorsed it. No Chief Justice has criticized the plan for such a non-partisan ballot.

It has been endorsed by Judge Gilbert, Presiding Judge of the Circuit Court of Appeals of this Circuit, United States Circuit Judge William Morrow, United States District Judge De Haven, Chief Justice Beatty and by more than sixty other judicial officers of California. No United States Judge has made any criticism of such a ballot, and but four letters criticizing the measure were received from judicial officers of this state.

The remedy suggested is merely a change in the ballot. It still permits a nomination by a partisan convention, but it gives such a nomination no advantage over a nomination by petition who runs by virtue of the request of but 3 per cent. of the voters. If any man wants to vote for a judicial candidate because he is nominated by a party he may inform himself of that as he would of any other special qualification. But the State no longer directs him

THE GRAFT CASES

After about two weeks devoted to securing a jury, and another week given to the presentation of testimony and the hearing of arguments, the trial of A. S. Newburgh, charged with attempting to bribe a prospective juror in the Ruef case, resulted in an evenly divided jury, six jurors, after five and one-half hours of consideration, favoring conviction and six favoring acquittal.

The evidence in the case varied but little from that on which another jury acquitted Attorney Frank J. Murphy of a similar charge. It consisted of the testimony of E. A. S. Blake, now serving sentence for the bribery out of which these other cases grew, that he attempted to bribe at the instigation of Newburgh and Murphy; the corroboration of this testimony by John Martin Kelly, the prospective juror who was approached; the testimony of William H. Schooler that he offered to act as Blake's attorney at the request of Newburgh and Murphy; and that of about a score of witnesses who swore that Newburgh's reputation is bad. The case will be tried again, after some necessary delay. Thus far there has been nothing in the testimony to indicate from whom the money that was to have been paid to the prospective juror was to have come.

Another week has dragged by in the Calhoun case, and but four more jurors have been secured at this writing, making eight in all, and as these are subject to peremptory challenge, the time for the presentation of evidence still seems far away. The possession of an opinion pro or con the graft cases apparently disqualifies a prospective juror for service, and as most, if not all, intelligent San Franciscans have formed an opinion, it is an uphill task that the attorneys have before them. The exceptions taken by the attorneys for the defense to the rulings of the court indicate that, unless something happens to expedite matters, the opening statement for the prosecution will not be made within another two weeks.

A feature of the Calhoun case is the repeated charges of jury-tampering which are made. Three prospective jurors already have complained of attempts to ascertain their sentiments about the case. In two of these cases the wife of a juror was approached, and in the other an employee. As yet no person thus guilty has been apprehended, but, judging from Judge Lawlor's remarks anent the offense, it will be a "sore day" for such malefactor if he is caught.

Judge Buck of San Mateo county has appointed District Attorney Langdon to act for the state in prosecuting District Attorney Bullock, Sheriff Chatham, Supervisors Blackburn and Coleman and former Supervisors Debenedetti and Eikerenkotter, who are charged with miscellaneous grafting. Mr. Langdon accepted the charge reluctantly, urging that he had no office hands full in San Francisco, but, as he has no discretion under the law, he was compelled to accept the appointment.

The case against V. K. Detwiler, who has been a fugitive from justice since he was indicted for bribery in behalf of the Home Telephone company, was called up before Judge Lawlor last Monday. Upon the statement of Assistant District Attorney O'Gara that the prosecution had not as yet been able to find the fugitive defendant, the case went over one month.

Trinity Church as a Landlord.

Trinity church, New York, has a capital of $20,000,000, a considerable part of which has been invested in tenement houses. Instead of making its tenements models of health and convenience, it has along badly kept out of the reach of the law and, lately, has fallen below what the law requires, so it is going out of tenement owning and renting and will invest in business property.

to political partisanship as the predominating qualification. It will in my opinion become a serious question to a candidate whether it will not lose him more intelligent votes to take a partisan nomination than it will gain him in blind party adherents.

Advantages of an Incumbent.

Another measure proposed is to place the incumbent on the ticket for re-election without mention of his name, with the word "Incumbent" after his name. The argument for this is that the incumbent should have all apprehension as to his re-nomination removed, and that the voter should have called to his attention the judge on the bench who has the thread of the live cases in his mind so that, other things being equal, he will be returned. Undoubtedly there is a distinct advantage to the public in returning incumbents, and litigants are seriously injured when compelled to educate a new judge to a familiarity with their cases. This plan would also encourage men to become candidates who now refuse because, at the end of the term, they must out of the contest for re-election with a good chance that a landslide for the opposing party would overbalance any credit they may have with voters who remember their good service.

It has been said in opposition that, in the absence of the party vote, incumbency gives a man a sufficient advantage; that the incumbent who, after four or six years' service, cannot get 3 per cent. of the voters on a petition carried about by a Western Union messenger is radically lacking in necessary qualifications and could not be elected, and that the state should leave the matter entirely to the voter without any suggestion. It is apparent that this measure is no essential part of a non-partisan judicial ballot, and it has therefore been cast in a separate bill.

Would Get Better Men as Candidates.

Much unjust reproach has been heaped on the Bar Association for not taking a more active part in judicial elections; and yet the best men in the organization have recognized that, with our form of ballot, the only thing for the association to do is to make a choice of partisans, and that independent nominations would be futile. With an equal chance on the ballot a ticket from the Bar Association fairly chosen (and the machinery for a convention of members of the bar would be easily devised) would undoubtedly give the best candidates available. Men at the head of the profession, who would not for a moment consider becoming candidates under present conditions, would accept as an honor such a nomination; and men who have for years served us faithfully on the bench at grossly inadequate salaries (compared with compensation for similar service at the bar) would at last find in a position attained through the recommendation of the profession the recognized dignity and esteem which in all other civilized countries is accorded the wise and upright judge.

In his "Oxford in the Eighteenth Century," A. D. Godley illustrates the freedom of its academic life with the following curious story that dates back to 1782:

Pastor Moritz, coming late at night into the Metre Tun, saw a great number of clergymen, all with their gowns and bands on sitting around a large table, each with his pot of beer before him. These reverend gentlemen sat all night over their beer, discussing theological and other topics till, when morning drew nigh, Mr. M— suddenly exclaimed, "Damn me, I must read prayers this morning at All Souls," an expression which might have been somewhat surprising to a less charitable observer than Moritz. But the good pastor, unlike the censorious Uffenbach, always tried to make allowances for the English point of view.

The borrowing of novels is declining all over England, being not more than fifteen per cent. of the work done by public libraries. The taste for history, biography and travel is on the wane; readers are all for science and sociology, and new books on socialism are always in demand.

THE whip cracked loudly in the crisp morning air and the impatient horses dashed away, leaving Mrs. Churchill with the stock and the younger children to care for.

Fairer promise for continued pleasant weather nature never held out than on that Monday morning. The sun rose bright, the air was just crisp enough to be bracing and sound traveled further and could be heard clearer than Mrs. Churchill could remember to have noticed before. She could hear the clucking of her husband's wagon long after it had disappeared over the swelling prairie, and the voices from Squatty Stubbins' barnyard sounded so near that the fowls from her own yard crossed the distance in return. Yet Squatty lived at the farther corner of the section. There had not been any winter yet and it seemed as though there would not be any winter at all that year.

As the day advanced it grew warmer. Flies buzzed about the window panes and smoke hung heavily along the horizon as though it were early autumn. There was not wind enough to rustle a leaf and everything animate dozed. Squatty Stubbins rattled by in the afternoon with a monster load of wood. "Fix'n ter give us a bit o' weather, mum," he called in passing, but Mrs. Churchill paid no attention to him (none of the Churchills ever did, though she thought afterwards that he glanced significantly toward the place where her wood pile ought to be, but it might have been her own misgivings that prompted the thought. "Anyhow," she said to herself, "Squatty Stubbins is forehanded with his wood as far as is with everything else, the impudent interloper. He's a hard worker, anyhow. There's that much to his credit if I must say it," she thought half aloud as she went about picking up scattered sticks in nervous anticipation of that "bit of weather" the family enemy had prophesied.

At four o'clock in the afternoon there was perfect Indian summer weather. Then a cold puff of wind came out of the northwest. It was dank and freighted with evil. Everything it touched expected a sudden sinking of the heart. Crimsoned leaves which clung, despite the frost, to swaying poplar branches, let go their holds and floated skurrying over the ground. Puff succeeded puff. Cattle upon the ranges became restive, knuckled their ears roughly with their horns and moved away toward the timber on the river, snatching now and then a mouthful of grass which they munched as they went along. Quail scuttled chattering under the bushes and cuddled in tempting coves among the fallen leaves. Dust rose in the air, peppering the houses inside and out. The wind became a tempest making the young trees along the ravines and wind-breaks switch and writhe and the tall prairie grass snap and rattle. The dust grew thicker, changed to mud and the rain came, steaming into blinding sleet which sivered and sifted each leaf and blade, finally enveloping all things in a coat of mail.

All that night and all the succeeding day the blizzard raged. The cold was extreme and the air so filled with flying particles of ice and snow that one could not see a dozen yards before him. Mrs. Churchill dared to venture to the barnyard only by clinging fast to the post of the iron door to keep from falling, yet the animals must be fed. Her supply of wood was running low, almost gone, yet it was not too warm in the house, which was none too warm at best. Her husband and sons were not reticent in their remarks. "The storm would turn back as soon as the storm struck them and that they did not come filled her mind with a new anxiety.

"Cindy," observed Mr. Stebbins to his wife, "I ain't no ways partial to neighbor Churchill nor his family, but I'd give forty bushels of corn ter know that him and his boys are safe ter home ter night, and give it in welcome."

"Why, Wat, you don't suppose they are out in this blizzard do you?"

"Nigh as kin as I can calculate that's jest where they be, Cindy. They must a' been well inter the hills when the storm struck 'em and if they got scattered or anything like that while out hunting it's gon' hard with 'em sure as 'em are," and again Mrs. Stebbins gave herself up to meditation.

SQUATTY STUBBINS' TRIUMPH

By A. JUDSON

(Concluded)

Written for The California Weekly.

"Cindy," the little man again called to his wife later in the evening. "If you'll jest lay hold and help sling together some grub and things a fellow'll need I'll hustle out in the mornin', throw a jug of wood into the spring wagon, tackle on the mules and if those hunters hain't showed up yet by time its light nuff ter see I'll drive over and drap the wood, fodder the critters for the woman and drive along on the road sort o' ter met them like. Don't 'spect me back 'till I come if its three days or four, fer I aint a comin' without 'em dead or livin'. I didn't run cattle over those hills three seasons, not ter know every foot of 'em and if they are there I'll find 'em and come back safe."

Mrs. Churchill was awakened next morning by what seemed to be the sound of wagon wheels cranching through the snow and ice, but when she sat up and listened she could hear nothing but the screaming wind and so fell asleep again for it was not yet day. But when she did get up and ventured out into the yard there was a goodly pile of wood at the very door and the stock had been fed and watered. Here indeed was a mystery.

Squatty Stubbins' jes nat'ally blundered right on to Big Churchill's camp in the Blue Hills, as he said himself, or he might as well have found it at all, the day was so blustery and the air was so filled with flying particles of ice and snow.

However, the camp was found, and found deserted, for neither father nor sons were anywhere to be seen, but the horses, unfed and unwatered, were shivering under the lee of a bank of clay, tied to a fallen log. It was plain that the camp had been deserted almost since the coming of the storm. Where were the men? Had they perished in that trackless waste of indistinguishable ridges?

The day had been bitterly cold and the wind cutting, but the atmosphere cleared toward night so that Squatty Stubbins could shape his course with confidence. Meantime, he had cared for Churchill's half-famished horses, dragged huge logs together with his team and built a great fire so that the smoke ascended black and beckoningly.

When Churchill's horses had eaten, Squatty saddled one and packed the other with warm blankets and provisions and started up the divide just as night closed down. The storm had quite spent itself and the air became stilled but intensely cold, and with the whitened ice coating over the tangled grass and the stars shining he could see quite well and made good progress.

At the heads of the ravines small bunches of stunted timber grew and now and again as he rode along he stopped at such places and, taking his ax, soon had enough dead and dry brush and logs piled upon some adjacent and conspicuous mound to burn brightly for an hour or two. At each place he left tied to a stake set in the ground a note which read: "I am looking for you. Will be back this way before morning. Follow the fires and they will lead to camp." The time thus lost was made up in a measure by putting Churchill's horses to a trial of their mettle and as they had been so roughly chilled and were eager enough to go so that, by one or two o'clock in the morning, he had followed the divide to the end of the range nearly thirty miles from the camp at the wagons.

As the distance stood he found no trace of Churchill or his sons, but he hoped for better fortune going back, for he felt certain that upon the breaking of the storm the men would emerge from whatever places of refuge they had found and seek their camp again if they were yet alive and would be likely to see and make for one of his beacon fires.

He was not disappointed. When he had ridden back on the return trail for an hour or two he found one of his beacon fires burning brightly and, crossing now and again betwixt himself and the light, were two tall figures engaged in adding more fuel to the flame. Putting the whip to the horses he dashed up to find the two young Churchill kids patiently awaiting the return of their benefactor, though whom it could be they could not guess, for he had signed no name to the posted notes and the handwriting was unfamiliar to them.

The young men were quite a little frosted and ever so hungry and tired. Having become separated from their elder brother at the coming on of the storm they had wandered until worn out and, finding a sheltered cove at the head of a rocky ravine, they had built a fire under a ledge overhanging the river bank, though they had been compelled to work unceasingly to keep fuel gathered for the fire and had for food only a shot hare which they had fortunately shot.

A pot of coffee was soon on the coals and biscuits thawed by the fire for an early breakfast. Taking one of the rifles from the boys and leaving them to ride, wrapped in warm blankets, when they should have eaten and rested, Squatty hastened along the divide on foot to stretch his legs and maybe catch a deer if the fires should make them curious enough to come out in the early morning," he said as he struck a dog trot down the ridge.

And how tireless the little man was only those knew who had kept him in the order and keep it hour after hour without once stopping to rest, up hill and down, on the trail of a band of deer or "footing it" across the country. An Apache could not have done better.

Coming around the head of a deep ravine, and hearing the smoking remains of one of his beacon fires just as day was dawning a band of deer jumped out. Two flashes of light, two reports from the rifle and two of the beautiful creatures lay dead before him while the remainder went dashing down the ridge to the south, but Squatty had no more than drawn his knife across their throats than his quick ear caught the sound of another rifle shot far down the ridge.

Dashing into the head of the ravine and filling his arms with dry brush and twigs he soon had his fire blazing aloft again and then made off in the direction from whence the shot had come hallooing like an Indian. There was an answering call and soon he came upon Churchill's eldest son vainly trying in his exhausted and stiffened condition to carry the remains of an antlered buck he had shot out of the bunch Squatty himself had depleted. Throwing the buck across his own shoulders and leading the team he came in the order just as the younger brothers came up with the horses. There was another hasty gathering of ice for melting, brewing of coffee and thawing of bread for a breakfast, for the young man, save for a single prairie hen he had shot, had been without food since the morning and had suffered not a little by the biting frost.

Strapping the three deer upon one of the horses and allowing the Churchill brothers to "ride and tie" or cling to the saddle straps, the company filed off toward camp. Squatty Stubbins leading the way and the Churchill boys plodding painfully after.

Impatient for the chase the young men had gone into the hills upon the day of their arrival as soon as they had eaten their lunch, leaving their father to put the camp in order, thus promising to return before dark, but when the storm broke they soon lost their way. They supposed that their father was safe in camp and were greatly concerned when they learned that he was not, for they had seen no trace of him.

It was a long tramp back to camp and the progress made was slow. It was nearly noon before they came in sight of it, and there, sure enough, were the blazing logs and, who should be there before them but Big Churchill himself, swathed in blankets and crouched directly before the fire.

"Squatty Stubbins' Triumph" (Concluded).

A loud whoop was raised by the boys from the top of the hill, and Big Churchill to rise to his feet and hold out toward them. "Well, you ain't dead anyhow," he said as they came up and then, catching sight of the deer, "and I'll be durned if you haint got the venison, too. I'd shake hands with you, Mr. Stebbins, but I can't for my hands are frosted. I don't want you to think that I'm not much obliged for your trouble." That was all he said, but his voice was husky and Ransome declared to his mother that there actually were tears in his father's eyes.

After his sons had gone into the hills on the day of their arrival Big Churchill busied himself with putting the camp in order until after the storm came on, and then, building a great fire and firing a big shotgun at intervals during the night, he waited impatiently with only some snatches of sleep, until the morning when he started in search of the lads, going on foot because he well knew that he would soon freeze if on horseback and must depend for life upon his own physical exertions. For fully twenty-four hours he had maintained a constant marching up and down the range until at last, tired out and thoroughly bewildered, as unable to find camp as he had been to find his sons, coming upon a little clump of trees, he built a fire and fought the battle out under the shelter of a precipitous bank of earth. He had not suffered for food, because he had taken provisions with him, but was more seriously frosted than either of his sons. Upon the breaking of the storm he whistled out again, and seeking the way back to camp and, coming upon one of Squatty's beacon fires, followed from one to the other and so reached camp in the early morning.

The people of Stolliker's Prairie declared with a unanimity entirely unknown in that contentious community that they had not before experienced such a jolly Christmas. There was a well-hung tree at the school house and nearly everyone was there, crowding the little building until there was standing room only. And the women could hardly get around to set the tables for the supper, but when the tables were spread the food they bore belied the poverty that was so generally complained of, and not the least toothsome viand of the feast were sundry hams of venison roasted brown.

When all were seated at the tables, Elder Usher had invoked a divine blessing upon them all and had solemnly exhorted them to ways of peace and charitable neighborliness, Big Churchill delivered the first public address of his life.

"Neighbors," said he, rising painfully to his feet, which were swathed in woollens and had been so badly frosted as not to be confined in any sort of shoe leather. "Neighbors, we don't any of us drink anything stronger than coffee. Anyhow, we oughtn't to and can't here, so I can't offer any toast as they do in books, but there aint nothing I reckon to prevent our eating this here venison to the health of any person we like and so here goes. I propose that each man here, and each woman and all the young ones, shall eat a good, big slice of this venison to the health and happiness of the man that killed it, or most of it, Mr. Watson Stebbins. Time was when that name tasted mighty bitter in my mouth, but it don't taste that way any more."

"Neighbors," he continued, raising his voice and speaking with much earnestness, "this same Squatty Stubbins, sit'n opposite is, in my opinion, the quickest, pluckiest, stoutest and best natured onepotent sinner that ever jumped a claim and held on to it in spite of perdition and high water, in spite of blizzards and bad manners, and that, too, without gettin' unruly arry time or saying a cuss word to nobody."

"He licked me, a thing no man ever does before. I can't tell to this day how he did it, jest for spite I reckon (because it's been a good deal harder to bear than the lick'n) he saved my wife and babies from freezing, drove forty miles through the toughest blizzard ever known in western Kansas, built a campfire big enough for a barbecue to show his enemies where camp was, then put in the night riding fifty miles more and walking the rest of the way, building beacon fires on all the hills to light home a parcel o' men that would 'a' let him freeze without stirring a peg on 'n their warm beds and snug houses and most likely said, 'good enough for him,' when he was dead; saved the whole unworthy family and then sneaked off home as though he was 'shamed of the whole business and never told a soul of what he'd done."

"Squatty Stubbins," he cried, reaching across the table, "give us yer hand, but don't squeeze too hard because the fingers are only jest thawed out. Big Churchill's yer friend and don't ye ever doubt it for a minnit."

What a tumult there was, to be sure, while the two men stood there shaking hands across the table! The people laughed and clapped their hands and finally broke into a wild cheer, and Squatty, well, he did look too silly and shamefaced for anything, standing there ducking his head and chucking, but the tears were streaming from Big Churchill's eyes, half for joy and half for genuine contrition.

"Yes, neighbors," Big Churchill continued with quavering voice. "I've had a good deal o' time for thinkin' since Squatty Stubbins licked me last summer. I've been all over my doin's from boyhood up. I've licked a heap o' men in my time, first and last. It seemed a mainly sort o' way o' settlin' differences until this little runt licked me. That sort o' give me holt of the tail end o' myself and the more I pulled at it the more meanness I fished up 'till it 'peared like I was about the ornieriest critter God ever made. I thought I was brave, when I was only big and strong. I found I'd been cross to my family, mean to my neighbors and unkind to my durned old man. I'd cheated in boss tradin' and stole wood off'n government land. If I had friends before I was licked I could see plainly that I hadn't any afterwards. It 'peared like every eye set on me looked me through and through and saw what a lot of corruption my hide was stuffed with. I felt that even my wife was a snickerin' at me in secret."

"Folks," he shouted as he braced himself for a final effort, "when I found that my enemy, the man I most wanted to kill, had risked his life to save me and mine, I couldn't understand it. I was dumfounded until Elder Usher told me that he is a prayin' man and then I thought I'd be a prayin' man, too. Friends, if from this day Big Churchill's a better neighbor to ye, wife, if he's a better husband; children, if he's a better dad, it'll be because Jesus Christ, whose birthday we are celebrating to-night, has power to forgive sin and because Squatty Stubbins first licked me and then shamed me into a consciousness of my sinful condition. Squatty, what are ye doin' there looking so simple? Pass me your wife's plate 'till I help her to a slice o' this here venison."

And Squatty Stubbins' triumph was complete.

NEW REMEDY GUARANTEED TO CURE CATARRH

So confident are the makers of its certain curative properties that they will let you try it free.

Remedial properties in vegetable life have recently been discovered by a local experimental chemist which have proven extraordinarily successful in curing refractory cases of catarrh. The remedy is in liquid form, easily applied or taken, and is at once efficacious, simple; not distasteful, and above all absolutely free from any deleterious substances. It is Nature's remedy, as many cases of catarrh of various kinds and intensities have proven. It is especially recommended to those afflicted with frequent coughing spells in vain efforts to expel clinging phlegm. Not only is this discharge stopped in a short time, but the remedy unflinchingly seeks the seat of the disorder and eradicates it, thereby thoroughly clearing the system of insidious catarrhal attacks that may threaten the ears, eyes, stomach and other organs. As a remedy for curing distressful headaches from the same cause it has no equal. So confident are the makers of the curative properties of this new vegetable compound that they will not only guarantee its efficacy and refund the cash on any purchase if no cure is made, but they will send free samples for trial. PERSONALIA

Sir Gilbert Parker has been elected president of the Sir Walter Scott Society of Edinburgh.

W. C. Morrow, author of "Lentala of the South Seas," used to run a school for authors in Oakland.

C. H. Bledsoe, of Dinuba, Cal., is the inventor of a panoramic camera with which he takes pictures ten feet long by ten inches wide.

Readers of fiction will be pained to hear that Thornton J. Hains, recently acquitted of the murder of William E. Annis, is going to write a novel about it.

Gifford Pinchot, chief forester of the United States, possesses an independent fortune inherited from his father, who, by the way, knew as much about forestry as the son.

The Rev. Robert Collyer, the great Unitarian divine, now 85 years old, and has just published "Some Memories," a remarkable autobiography.

"Buck" Duke, as the president of the American Tobacco company is known in North Carolina, has just purchased a modest dwelling at Fifth Avenue and Seventy-eighth street, New York, for $1,500,000.

Dr. Simon Flexner, discoverer of a serum for the treatment of cerebro-spinal meningitis, is a Jew. He is the director of the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research.

It is noteworthy that Miss Ida M. Tarbell is doing an optimistic and constructive kind of muckraking in "How Chicago Is Finding Herself," in the American Magazine.

George Ade is traveling in Europe, and finds Berlin to be "Chicago idealized and starched." He professes to be shocked at the newness of that city, and at the preposterously late hours kept by its citizens.

W. J. McGee, United States Commissioner of Inland Waterways, and an authority on archaeology and anthropology, was a waif in youth and was known only as "Buck" until the tax collector required him to give his initials. He had none, so invented W. J. for the occasion. He signs the two capitals, without periods, as his given name.

Of all the sharp things which have been said about Charles F. Murphy of Tammany Hall none has been more epigrammatic than this by his fellow politician, William S. Devery ("Big Bill") Devery, who is called in New York: "I remember Gas-House Charlie when he was a conductor on the Second-Avenue horse-car line. He resigned the position the day they introduced bell-punches."

Ten years ago, when E. H. Harriman was first elected chairman of the executive committee of the Union Pacific, a request to transfer his private car over the lines of the New York Central was met with the inquiry by one of the officers of that company, "Who is Harriman?" and, after an explanation, by the contemptuous remark, "We don't seem to know Mr. Harriman up here." To-day Mr. Harriman's Union Pacific holds $14,000,000 of stock in the New York Central and sometimes the officers of the latter company appear to fear that he will play the same part with them that the camel played when he stuck his head in through the door of the Arab's tent.

Sharlot M. Hall, the author of the poem, "The Last Camp-fire," which was reprinted recently in The California Weekly, was born in Kansas, and at the age of twelve years rode on horse-back over the old Santa Fe trail to Arizona, where she grew to womanhood on a lonely ranch remote from the advantages of civilization. On the journey from Kansas she received a spinal injury from which she has suffered ever since. Her later life has been that of a busy woman on a western ranch, and her literary work has been done in the odds and ends of time between other duties. Most of her poems have appeared in Our West, of which magazine she has been assistant editor.

"ALL FOR ONE AND ONE FOR ALL."

By James G. Clark.

All for one and one for all,
With an endless song and sweep;
So the willows rise and fall
On the bosom of the deep;
Louder in their single speech,
More restless as they roll,
Broader, higher in their reach,
For their union with the whole.

Wheeling systems sink and rise,
In one shoreless universe,
And forever down the skies
Myriad stars one hymn rehearse;
Countless worlds salute the sun,
Planets to each other call,
Ages into cycles run,
All for one and one for all.

Kissed by sunshine, dew and shower,
Leaping lily and living sod,
Sea and mountain, tree and flower,
Turn their faces up to God;
And one human Brotherhood,
Pulsing through a thousand lands,
Reaches for one common good,
With its million million hands.

Through all warring seas of life
One vast current onward rolls,
And within all outward strife,
One eternal Right controls.—
Right, at whose divine command
Slaves go free and tyrants fall,
In the might of those who stand
All for one and one for all.

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

The House of Representatives.

The makers of the Constitution of the United States planned the House of Representatives as a concession to the almost morbid fear of the common man that his liberties would be endangered unless the common people had a representative body in the government with members coming freshly from them, and elected at such short intervals that their accountability to the people could never be a subject for doubt. It was foreseen that unless such a body was provided the people would not ratify the constitution if submitted to the constitution was that members of the more numerous body of legislation were to be elected every two years instead of annually. It was feared that so long a lease of power as two years might be fraught with danger to the liberties of the people. It is hard for us, at this stage of the world's history, to understand and appreciate the almost mortal fear which our forefathers felt for the preservation of dearly bought liberties. We have grown heedless of them.

It was felt that the House of Representatives must become the repository of the people's rights, and represent a national, rather than a state, spirit in the general government. It was expected that the Senate would be bound to state lines very generally, but that the house would not only speak for the common people, but for the people as a whole.

How far the House of Representatives has fallen short of the expectations of the makers of the constitution only those who have studied the matter thoroughly are prepared to say. Instead of representing the people as a whole members of the lower house represent the districts from which they are elected and too seldom are able to look beyond the confines of their districts. This will continue to be so until, if ever, some revulsion of feeling against a narrowed horizon, or some broadened aspect of patriotism, either prompts states to elect their members of congress at large or prompts districts to select big men from outside their districts to represent them, in accordance with the custom which obtains in Great Britain. There is nothing in the constitution of the United States to prevent the inauguration of either or both of these policies, but there does appear to be considerable in the constitution of politicians to prevent either or both of them. There is at least no present likelihood of anything of the kind occurring.

Nor can we regard the district system as wholly unfortunate. Each member may know his district's interests well and ably defend them when he might not the entire interests of the state and, after all is said that may be for government by ideas and convictions, the direction taken by legislation is generally that of the results of the impacts of clashing interests, rather than ideas, that focus upon the national capital.

The House of Representatives, by its unwieldiness, is scarcely to be regarded as a deliberative body. The work of investigation and deliberation must be done in committee and merely ratified in the House. This enables a few strong members to come into power and, if so disposed, use that power for purposes other than the "preservation of the liberties of the people."

Despite these strictures the House of Representatives has by no means proven a failure. It has only failed to do some things that it was supposed it would do. Instead of being the body wherein legislative measures mainly originate it seems likely to become the body wherein legislative measures will receive their final confirmation or rejection.

The Constitution vests in the House the prerogative of initiating all appropriation measures. This provision was inserted in the belief that where the commons are in custody of the nation's purse the aristocrats, and those ambitions for kindly prerogatives, could not work any very great evil, but it may be doubted if this provision has been of great practical value. If the Senate cannot originate appropriation bills it can alter and amend, or refuse to concur in measures which the House does originate, and so is not placed in especial disadvantage on account of this limitation.

The trend of events legislative appears to be in the direction of forcing the initiation of legislation upon the executive office, as in the government of Great Britain and on the continent of Europe, leaving it to Congress to alter and amend, and to the House of Representatives, as the more numerous body and holding more direct credentials from the people, to render final judgment.

A movement is now on foot in the House of Representatives to make its "Steering Committee" elective by the House instead of appointed by the speaker. If successful this should make the House more representative and less subservient to special interests than it has been for some years.

Do You Hear Well?

The Stolz Electrophone—A New, Electrical, Scientific and Practical Invention for those who are Deaf or Partially Deaf.

MAY NOW BE TESTED IN YOUR OWN HOME

Deaf or partially deaf people now may make a trial of the Stolz Electrophone at home. This personal, practical test serves to prove that the device satisfies, with ease, every requirement of a perfect hearing device.

This new invention renders unnecessary such clumsy, unsightly and frequently harmful devices as trumpets, horns, tubes, ear drums, fans, etc. It is a tiny electric telephone that fits on the ear and which, the instant it is applied, magnifies the sound waves in such manner as to cause an astonishing increase in the clearness of all sounds. It overcomes the buzzing and roaring ear noises and, also, so constantly and electrically exercises the vital parts of the ear that, usually, the natural unaided hearing itself is gradually restored.

THE PLEDGE OF CITIZENSHIP

I, a citizen of the United States of America, realizing that a free Republic is an impossibility unless the citizen performs his civic duty, hereby pledge myself upon my sacred honor never to fail to exercise my right of citizenship by voting at every election, primary or secondary, wherever it is possible and legal for me to render that service to my country, my health permitting me so to do.

In taking this pledge it is distinctly understood that I in no way obligate myself to vote for any particular party, any definite candidate or any certain measure. I am binding myself only to my Country, and pledging myself solely to the faithful performance of the duty I owe to her as a citizen.

WHY TAKE THE FOREGOING PLEDGE?

Those taking the foregoing pledge, signing and sending it to this office, will be enrolled upon The California Weekly's "School for Citizenship," which will be a permanent feature of this paper. It will entitle the person sending in his name to have answered, either through the columns of the paper or by letter, any rational question he may ask concerning public affairs, and, generally, by the person best equipped to afford the desired information. It will also entitle the signer to such special literature bearing upon the obligations and opportunities of good citizenship as may from time to time be issued. While this pledge is of no value to persons of all ages it is especially desired that it be taken and sent by young men lately become voters or who will cast their first votes two years hence. It will take but a moment to clip out the pledge, sign, enclose in an envelope, stamp and address to "School for Citizenship," office The California Weekly, 25 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, and it opens the way for a liberal education in citizenship.

MR. HERRIN'S PROMOTION.

Mr. William F. Herrin holds the probable distinction of being the most thoroughly hated man in California, not excepting Abe Ruef, and yet it is to be doubted if any man will begrudge him his reported good fortune in being promoted in the service of his employer. Indeed, there will be an element of state pride in seeing him elevated to the position of second in command to the Wizard of modern railroading. California's grievance against Mr. Herrin is solely that he has usurped the powers of government that belong to the people themselves. Had he proven a benevolent despot the feeling of antipathy toward him would scarcely be abated, but the quality of his despotism has not been benevolent. It may have been forbearing according to his standards, but it has been benevolent toward the great corporation he ably serves rather than toward the People of California whose free government he has subverted. His destitution is well earned.

Nevertheless, the rise of Mr. Herrin in the ranks of railroad managers will be conceded to be fitting. He possesses great executive ability. His clearness of mind is not to be questioned. Moreover, he possesses that pitilessness of nerve which will enable him, as it has enabled Mr. J. C. Stubbs, to fry the fat out of other people's industries for the benefit of "the Company" without a qualm of conscience or symptom of remorse. Mr. Herrin is a big man and belongs with big men. He will make an able first lieutenant to Mr. Harriman and, should the latter's race be cut short he might even make an efficient successor to the "wizard."

It is reported that Mr. Herrin is to receive a salary of $100,000 a year. That is not enough. It will poorly compensate him for the things he will have to do as Mr. Harriman's next in command. Whatever his salary as manager of California's politics may have been it has been insufficient to compensate him and his family for what they have had to endure because of his usurpations of the powers of government. It is probable that what he has had to do to California he will now have to do to many states, with an equally broadened field of detestation and resentment. A million a year would not be too much. In fact, California has men, some of them the equal of Mr. Herrin in executive capacity, and his superior in other many attributes, who would not accept the place of first lieutenant to Mr. Harriman for a million dollars a year. Mr. Herrin, all things considered, works cheap, dirt cheap, and Mr. Harriman is a niggardly paymaster.

No doubt Mr. Herrin has governed California as well as possible, if we take into consideration the special interests he was paid to serve, and the human cattle he was compelled to hire to do the pulling and hauling of the political freight. How galling it must be to a man of sensibilities to have to deal with such Judases as may be hired to betray their fellow citizens for political odd-jobs, free rides and a few pieces of silver! Mr. Herrin's couch has been no bed of roses.

But Mr. Herrin is a rising man. There can be no doubt of it. The predatory tendencies of our modern robber barons cannot be satisfied without the use of such men as he. If heaven gives him length of days he will die many times a millionaire, a manager of great enterprises, the author of great iniquities, the usurper of the powers of popular government in many states, the object of the detestation of as many persons as John D. Rockefeller, for, if he die without fewer millions than Rockefeller, he will live wanting that garrulosity of age which has done no little to soften the asperity of public antipathy toward the father of Standard Oil.

THE LIFE OF TRADE.

It used to be said that competition is the life of trade. There are those who would now substitute "combination" for competition in the old proverb, but they are quite too fast. The world has not done with competition nor will it be done with it until all things are involved in a common ruin wrought by dry rot. Competition has been a factor in all forms of human development and must continue to be or there will be no human development. It may be transferred from between individuals to being between combinations of individuals, from between small combinations to large, from large to competition between the allied industries of nations, but not until all nations are resolved into one nation will competition in some intense form cease to be a factor in affairs. It is written into the constitution of man and had it not been so written man would never have had a constitution.

This is not saying that intensities of competition may not be softened. Any unrestrained force will work harm, but no greater harm is to be looked for from unrestrained competition than from unrestrained combination. The trend of legislation is toward putting restraint upon both competition, and combination. That is the policy of the President, and it has encountered opposition in the United States Senate, which has lately taken stand for the Sherman anti-trust law unmodified and unmodified. The "gray wolves" of that body, who long fought the placing of restraints upon combination, are now fighting against taking off the restraints which the President advised through fear that evils of unrestricted combinations may come upon the people of this devoted land.

There runs a false note through the report of the senate judiciary committee. Whether it is to be accounted for by opposition to the President and his policies or by a knowledge that the Sherman anti-trust law is unworkable and non-preventive of combinations, is not readily to be determined. Whatever the reason, neither the senate committee nor the senate can long stand in the way of such a mitigation, or regulation, of the extremes of competition and combination, as the good of the nation demands. The problem of fair play must be worked out, if not under Roosevelt's presidency, then under that of William Howard Taft.

It is unfortunate for would-be statesmen and more unfortunate for organized labor, that legislators feel called upon to execute political flub-dubs every day in the week in order to keep themselves "solid" with the workingman. They are mush with nearly everyone except workmen, and with sensible workmen, too.

The Springfield (Mass.) Republican attributes the belligerent attitude of the legislatures of California and Nevada toward Japan to the courage put into the two states by the visit of the Atlantic fleet to Pacific waters last summer. And yet the Atlantic fleet is about as far away from Pacific waters as it can be and, in the event of war with Japan, could not possibly reach the Pacific Coast before it would have been overrun with Japanese from Puget Sound to Lower California. The Springfield Republican lacks sagacity and does not know the color which the word, "Japan," imparts to Pacific coast livers. The demand of the Pacific is that it shall be given a fleet equal to that of the Atlantic, after which we may bluster some, but not now.

THE IRREPRESSIBLE ISSUE.

There are times that are opportune and times that are not. There are tactful ways of doing things and blundering ways of how not to do them. The man of sanity will wish to take the tide at its flood and the time at its psychological moment, but no matter how or when we deal with the problem there is an irrepressible conflict between Japan and America over the rights of Japanese who emigrate to our shores. The same issue will arise between the United States and China when China becomes strong enough to stand upon its dignity.

The position that Japan takes is simple, direct, dignified, self-respecting. Were we in Japan's place we should take no other. This position is that, in all countries of the world, the Japanese shall have all the rights and privileges granted to the citizens of the most favored nations. Uncle Sam demands as much for his citizens; why may not the Mikado for his? On the surface the demands of Japan are unanswerable. At bottom they are, with us, impossible.

The one irrepressible concern is that of race, race, race! Every other is of secondary importance.

Not that the Japanese race is inferior. It is not. Neither is the Chinese race inferior. Wherever the Mongol has gone he has shown his ability to hold his own. He has a full share of the graces and powers that God has given to any of his children. We accept him on an equal and accord to his country an equal station among the nations of the earth.

But we point him to Asia, the vastest continent on the globe, and say to the Mongol: All that lies north of the Himalaya mountains is yours. Enter into it and possess it. Make it what you will, so it be orderly, and we will buy with you and sell with you, eat with you, and drink with you, visit with you and pray with you, if you will, but we will not make our beds with you nor take you into our national life as part thereof, and this we deny to you for the one reason of race, race, race!

God knows what there is in this thing we call race, but that race antipathies are cruel, unreasoning, productive of strife, disorder and hatred the blackman of the South can testify. And this we know: amalgamation of white man and black, white and copper, white and yellow, white and brown, is not good. It works degradation. This we also know: emigration, fast or slow, ownership of land, accumulation of wealth, will involve amalgamation of races. Nothing short of a lack of opportunity to amalgamate will prevent it.

Elsewhere in this paper we have given a hearing to the Japanese side of the Japanese question. It is the policy of this paper to do this with every important public issue. There are few arguments advanced in that article to which exception can be taken. It is true that the Japanese now here are useful and equally true that use would be found for ten times as many more if allowed to come. Employing corporations would like to have ten Chinese here where there is one.

The Japanese will assimilate to the best of their ability and become the best American citizens they can. If permitted to come freely they, and their employers, would orientalize this coast in ten years. If restricted inadequately they will orientalize it in a hundred years and Mongolize it in two centuries and a half. Were the element of time the only issue, it were best to waive it altogether. The consummation being the vital issue it needs to be forestalled now.

The ownership of real estate is the crux of the question. Unless they can take root in our soil the Japanese are not likely to enter into the family life of the nation. With roots struck into our soil they are certain to, and what the result will be a hundred years hence only God knows, but that it cannot be fortunate to our national life, or productive of amity between the two nations, there is every reason to believe.

We have one race problem in our country. What it has cost us is proper penalty for the wrong against humanity which avarice prompted our progenitors to inflict. To repeat that wrong in any form will be to repeat the punishment in some form adequate to our deserts. Our legislature should limit Mongolian ownership of soil to a space four feet by six. All other anti-Japanese legislation proposed is harassing, demagogic and either vicious altogether or without the excuse of necessity.

A STATE TRAINING SCHOOL.

State Senator Price, representative of the State Board of Examiners in handling the dependent children's fund of California, is pushing through the legislature a bill providing for the establishment of a State Trades and Training School for dependent children. The proposal reflects greater credit upon the Senator's goodness of heart than upon his soundness of judgment.

This is not saying that such a school would not do good. It might easily do a great deal of good, but the expenditure along other lines of a sum of money equal to what it will cost to establish and maintain such a school could be made to accomplish ten times as much good, and at the same time, set the face of the state in a direction opposite to that in which it has already traveled far too far.

It is true, as premised by the introduction of this bill, that children come out of orphanages at fourteen poorly equipped to make their way in the world. They would be scarcely better fitted if they were to remain in a state school until eighteen. Their supreme need is a knowledge of real life and that they can never get in an institution, however well officered, equipped or endowed.

The orphanages of California are fairly good places in which children may be placed while the family is being tidied over a period of adversity. That period should not average more than two years and, where such is the case, no irreparable injury is likely to follow, but children should be absorbed into the family life with the shortest possible stay in an institution of any kind. It is to this policy, and not to the creation of more institutions, that the state should address itself.

The $125,000 that is proposed to be expended in the founding of this institution would finance a child-placing department, under the supervision of the State Board of Charities and Corrections, for ten years, and during that ten years that department should save the state an equal sum annually from the general dependent children's fund and still have the children better provided for than they are now.

In dealing with the problem of the dependent child California has taken the direction of least resistance, and the measure which Senator Price is pushing is another step in the same direction. It is one that should not be taken, at any rate for those on whose behalf the step is proposed.

The most objectionable feature in the bill, and one that should condemn it altogether unless remedied, is the following: "Children admitted must be sound of mind, free from contagious or other diseases and acceptable to the Board of Trustees in other ways," thus excluding from the further care of the state the type of child that stands in greatest need of that care, and taking under state coddling the type of child that is most certain to find somewhere in the life of the people a niche it can fill. Per contra, nearly every orphanage has children under-endowed mentally, physically defective, diseased, or otherwise unattractive, for whom, if for any, the state should undertake to care after reaching fourteen. Such as these will become wards of society somehow and if the proposed Trades and Training School were to be for their benefit alone much could be said in its behalf.

THE NEW RENAISSANCE.

The United States Commissioner of Education presents a report devoted largely to the progress of industrial education. The report and the subject of it are characteristic of what has amounted almost to a new Renaissance of our educational ideals. The old Renaissance consisted largely of the rediscovery of the sander, freer life of the ancient world, beyond the mists of mediæval superstition. That life lived only in books, and so the best education for life consisted in the learning of dead books in dead languages. But finally the education of the Renaissance became as ancient and as traditional as the trivium and quadrivium of mediæval learning. It still preserved a noble culture, but it lost touch with life. Ancient life had ceased to be the regenerating force, and education had not discovered modern life. Gradually, as classic education waned, modern subjects were introduced—but by books. The telescopes, through which alone ancient life could have been perceived, were turned on modern life, with the result that they rendered it nearly as distant as the ancient life had been. The obsession of "book-learning" was on the schools, and our academic population saw through a glass darkly what it had only to open its eyes to see face to face.

But now comes the new Renaissance—the discovery by the schools of modern life. The industrial part is being discovered first, because it is most visible and most needful. Therefore the reaction seems to be one from culture to materialism. But the Renaissance will not be complete until it discovers the idealism as well as the materialism of modern life. Then we shall have culture as well as "practical" training. But it will be modern culture, the spiritual and aesthetic interpretation of the life of our own times.

WHAT TO DO WITH STATE MONEY.

The State Controller and Treasurer have agreed upon a measure providing for keeping the state's money in the banks, properly secured. Why not? Is there any good reason why the state should transact its business in a way essentially different from that in which other kinds of business are transacted? It might be well for the treasurer to keep a liberal working balance in his strong box, but to have millions withdrawn from circulation and kept idle is no better in theory or practice than to withdraw able bodied men from industrial activity and keep them in idleness. Another gain would be in the facility of effecting exchange over the state, a great saving to taxpayers if not to the state.

Possible Coalition In Congress.

While it is impossible for the House of Representatives to throw out all issues upon the floor, there is a deep feeling of restiveness because of the autocratic power assumed by the speaker, but which the speaker is loth to let go. He has with him the "organization" Republican members, but there is a "right smart" sprinkling of independent Republicans in the house, beside 168 Democrats, and, it is believed, if the insurgent Republicans and Democrats can find common ground to stand on they will be able to force the election, by the house, of a non-partisan steering committee to order the business of the house in place of the speaker and his private steering committee. An effort is making to that end.

Invaliated By Age.

Gentlemen who tremble for the liberty of the press, because the National Government has instituted proceedings against the New York World and its owner for malicious slander in connection with the Panama Canal transaction, aver that such proceedings should not have been instituted because, in order to find a basis for action, it was necessary to dig up a law enacted in 1798. The command: "Thou shalt not bear false witness," is older than the alien and sedition laws of the United States, but it has not been urged in extenuation of lying that the command has now become so ancient as to be invalid. The liberty of the press is to be defended at all hazards. The license of the press to defame without cause and lie without ceasing is quite another matter. It should be curbed even if the Department of Justice has to go back to Sinai and the tables of stone to find a foundation for beginning proceedings.

Pilloried For Plagiarism.

Hannis Taylor, who has flown high as a writer on constitutional law, has been pilloried for Professor Henry County of Edinburgh for having taken holy chapters, not to mention sentences, paragraphs, foot notes, and pages from other writers in order to make up his recent, "Science of Jurisprudence." It is too bad. "Hannis" had such a nice sound to it. "Taylor," of course, is common, though heretofore reputable, but to have "Hannis" smirched by literary grand and petty larceny falls little short of a national misfortune.

The Needs of the Navy.

That the portion of our navy afloat is as good as the navies of other nations few are prepared to deny, but there is evidence to show that the land portion of our navy may have more politics in it than statesmanship, more loggolling than patriotism. The President's effort to have the situation analyzed and illuminated is commendable, only it should have been made before. The points at issue are mainly as to demonstrable facts, as, for instance, whether or not after expending in ten years $13,000,000 in construction and support of Mare Island Navy Yard there is any certainty that a first-class battleship can be gotten into the drydock and out again. If not then the navy yard at Mare Island was misplaced and the millions squandered. Let the truth be known no matter whom or where it hits.

Will Bring Us Good Citizens.

Should an alien land law be enacted at Sacramento one effect of it will be to encourage a large number of esteemed gentlemen, and model neighbors, who have lived among us half a lifetime owing allegiance to Britannia, to take out naturalization papers. They have paid us the compliment of conducting our affairs of government so admirably as not to require them to bother about our politics. Of all foreign born persons the English have been slowest to become American citizens, and yet of all foreign born persons the Englishman has most in common with Americans in blood, language, literature and institutions. He should turn his trousers down at the bottom, pick up his h's, and become an American forthwith.

Lincoln Highways.

The pleasure of automobilizing, as much as anything else, perhaps, has suggested the construction of a number of "Lincoln" highways in different parts of the country. One is proposed to run from Washington to Gettysburg. Another is from Chicago to Springfield, Illinois. At Joliet the state has an abundance of good trap rock and several hundred guests at a state boarding house with nothing better to do than to crack up this rock by hand. If the road sinks into the mud, or if the automobiles wear the roadbed out, there will still be men enough in Joliet prison to crack up some more rock. If Governor Gillett is determined to have a state highway why not build a "Lincoln" way from Sacramento to Benicia? The Suisun marshes will afford his engineers a good test of capacity and Folsom has the rock and the men to break it.

What Shall the Memorial Be?

There are three plans before Congress for erecting an enduring memorial to Abraham Lincoln. One is for the building of a great highway from Washington to Gettysburg. Another is to enlarge the capitol ground and surround the front portion of it with a splendid peristyle. The third is for the erection of some sort of edifice on the banks of the Potomac river at the far end of a splendid avenue extending from the capitol to the river. It has developed that the President favors the third idea and this has served to divide the reactionaries in congress about equally between the other two propositions and to make them all implacably hostile to the third. Vox Populi should make it plain that if the Lincoln memorial does not go to the banks of the Potomac a memorial for Theodore Roosevelt will. That will flop 'em.

Hetch-Hetchy Is Hitch-Hitchy.

It is evident that the coveted water privileges in Hetch-Hetchy are not to be had without a determined contest. While, from the standpoint of San Francisco and the bay cities, there are not two sides to the issue it happens that, from the standpoint of the nation at large, there are two sides if not more. Spring Valley has played its cards well. That there are other possible sources of water supply for the bay cities cannot be denied. It would be possible, for instance, to bring water from the Mississippi river, but not very feasible and the bay cities have a right to emphasize feasibility for all it is worth. Fortunately, there is no great hurry. There will be other congresses after this one and it will be ultimately possible to make a good cause good.

The Duty of Doing Jury Duty.

There is an obligation resting upon every honest citizen to take his turn in serving on juries. This obligation is made superlatively hard to discharge by reason of the abnormal and unnecessary burden which custom and procedure have imposed, yet this cannot warrant men lying out of jury duty as delinquent school boys lie out of bad scrapes. If good men will not serve upon juries the jury system must break down, and if the jury system breaks down autocracy in some form must take its place. Therefore, the duty of doing jury duty resolves itself into an issue of patriotism or a skulking refusal to bear one's share of a common burden.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

The best short story in any language is the story of the Good Samaritan and the second best is the story of the Prodigal Son. Sermons by thousands have been devoted to these two stories and yet they have not succeeded in squeezing dry of their interest and have not lost their power to reach the human understanding or to arouse the conscience to action.

The problem of drunkenness is mainly a problem of adolescence, a problem of the care of youths of twelve to twenty-one years of age. Something like 65 per cent. of inebriates began to use liquor between ten and eighteen years of age and perhaps as many as 75 per cent. began its use under twenty-two, while a resistant, hardy, stable adulthood is rarely reached until twenty-five.

The problem of criminality is likewise a problem of adolescence, a problem of the care of youths of twelve to twenty-one. The average age of persons confined in prisons and reformatories in the United States is twenty-two, notwithstanding that there is a kind of criminality—offenses against girlhood, and boyhood,—mainly committed by men who have passed their three-score-and-ten years of life, thus tending to increase the average.

When Society comes to so thorough an understanding of these two facts as to act upon them efficiently half the crime and drunkenness that afflict our country will disappear as if by magic.

Now let us drop back to see what the author of the Parable of the Prodigal Son knew about this problem of adolescence. "And when he came to himself," he said in the narrative, the prodigal said: "I will arise and go to my father." He did not say that as long as he had anything to spend in riotous living, or as long as he could find employment by which he could supply his bodily needs, but only when he hungered, when he felt that he had filled his stomach with the food that the swine ate—when he was "up against it," as it would be slangily expressed in our day.

So it is nearly always with the boy who is headed wrong, who is following his instincts unhindered because, his head being in a whirl, his conscience untrained, sound habits unformed, he has nothing else to follow. Unless brought up with a short turn, unless he feels the grip of the law upon his shoulder like the jaws of a biting horse, unless something happens to cause him to come to himself he will pursue his heedless course until habits have been formed that he will be unable to correct.

Orpheus sailed safely by the isle of the sirens by filling his own ears with a more ravishing music than the sirens were able to make. Truth needs to be piloted through adolescence in much the same way. Life needs to be so filled with better interests as to leave no room for bar or brothel. What is true of boys is less true of girls only because girls are better looked after during adolescence. When they are not their road to ruin is made shorter and the time swifter.

"And when he came to himself," he arose and went to his father, but he did not come to himself until he had gone hungry. Is it only in adolescence that such folly is committed? Many there are who do not come to themselves until the palsy of poverty and age are upon them. By that time more mischief than an empty stomach has been inflicted. By that time the gnawing of the wolf has devoured character and conscience and there is little to take to the Father but a skin full of bones. The need of our time, when criminality is tremendously on the increase, is to help young persons to come to themselves.

The need of the Berkeley high-school boys, who lately disgraced themselves, were able to come to themselves. A strap applied to the bare back, followed by an order of court to attend school every day, might fetch them. Expelling from school, and washing the public's hands of them, is the equivalent of the Father setting the dogs on the prodigal in the parable.

THE WORLD AT LARGE

Great Revival in Boston.

Evangelist J. Wilbur Chapman, and two dozen assistant preachers with as many solo singers, have attacked greater Boston with energy and are creating an interest not surpassed in many years. Dr. Chapman declares that it is hard starting a revival in New England, but that once under headway it gathers momentum as it goes and sweeps on with greater power than elsewhere. It takes a good deal of heat to warm the hearts of the Yankees but once hot they stay hot.

Hoboes in Convention.

The Sons of Rest held a convention at St. Louis last week with delegates from all points of the compass and as many as could get there. The chief topic for discussion seemed to be as to whether the hoboes or the railroads are to rule in the matter of free transportation. The hoboes were urged to stand firm for the right of free transit. No fault was found as to accommodations. Brakebeams were good enough, but the fraternity viewed with alarm the recent tendency to prevent their riding at all, the consensus of opinion being that unless hoboes can ride on the railroads there cannot be any hoboes. This view is undoubtedly correct. To stop free railroad riding will be to stop hoboeing.

A New Marine Compass.

An inventor at Liverpool has completed and has on exhibition a new marine compass that has several important advantages over the common form. The card is much smaller than in the case of the ordinary ship's compass and is made visible to the eye of the helmsman by means of a magnifying mirror with the result that the smallest deviation of the vessel from a given course is immediately perceptible without eye strain and without difficulty occasioned by rolling or pitching of the ship in rough weather.

Rescuing the Gymnasiums.

When a new school building is erected in New York City it is generally provided with a capacious gymnasium but when the school gets crowded for room the tendency has been to cut the gym up into class rooms, much to the detriment of discipline. The board of education has voted to stop this practice at whatever cost and, per contra, to place as much emphasis as possible upon physical training and, if possible, to make boxing compulsory in order to make the boys "sweat out" their incorrigibility and satisfy their belligerent propensities by battering each other. There is much more than half an idea in that.

Wiley Goes to Chicago.

Dr. H. W. Wiley, chief of the government bureau of chemistry, expects soon to become a resident of Chicago, where he will continue to rap the adulterators of food through the medium of the magazine "What To Eat." Doctor Wiley has made many enemies, and it is conceivable that he has made some mistakes, but it is to be hoped that his change of residence does not foreshadow the success of those who have tried to drive him from an office in which his work has been generally of prime service to the country.

Girls Hardest to Save.

Few cities have given more attention to the redemption of delinquent childhood than has Chicago, and few cities have had greater need for it. The close of the year's redemptive work has, in retrospect, given the child saving agencies much ground for hope, more especially so far as work with boys is concerned. There were over 300 fewer delinquent boys cared for during 1908 than during 1907 whereas, with girls, the decrease was only 22, relatively a much smaller gain although, absolutely, there are still three times as many delinquent boys as girls handled by the juvenile courts. The age of delinquency among boys is mainly between 11 and 16 years, while, for girls, it runs from 14 to 17, recognizable as the silly age of girlhood and the period during which girls need the most watchful care. Renewed efforts are making to supply that need in Chicago with hopefulness of a better record for 1909.

The Rejuvenation of Turkey.

The better state of things brought about by the "Young Turks" promises to usher into the Ottoman Empire a new era of industrial development, particularly in the direction of railroad building. There are many untapped fields for modern transportation facilities to enter and concessions so valuable are being offered that all Europe is vying for opportunity to pour its cash into constructive work. France, Germany and England are trying to outbid each other, the Mesopotamian plain being looked upon as the greatest prize with Germany on the inside in that struggle.

Amnesty for Lincoln's Assassins.

A member of Congress from Tennessee, who insists that J. Wilkes Booth was not killed by the posse who went in pursuit of him, proposes that Congress prove the fact by declaring, by the forgiveness of Lincoln and the American people, that full amnesty shall be granted Booth and all living persons who aided him in the consummation of the conspiracy to take his life. It is not likely that Congress will take any such action, but it is likely that it will do something more to the purpose—purchase the house where Lincoln died, and two houses adjoining, for a perpetual memorial of Lincoln. The house wherein he died is now as it was then. The other houses are to be removed in order to afford park space to the house having historic value. It will require about $130,000 to accomplish all this and Congress is expected to appropriate that sum.

Medical Use of Radium.

There is no end of charlatans who hasten to cure all the ills of humanity by the application of each new invention of a startling character, and this has caused many to doubt the claimed efficacy of radium, but Sir Frederick Treves, physician to King Edward, is enthusiastic in its favor and predicts great things when science shall have possessed itself of all the radium it needs, and he regards that as a matter of no great difficulty. The force resident in a small particle of this substance almost transcends the power of the imagination.

A New Kind of Steel.

It is announced by Professor John Oliver Arnold, of Sheffield University, that a new kind of steel has been invented that will possess four times the cutting power of existing steel and yet its manufacture will be so cheap and speedy as to displace all kinds of steel now on the market. That is a startling announcement, but if it is half true it will make such a revolution in the steel industry as will make the Bessemer process a mere incident by comparison.

The Cuban Situation.

A careful investigator from Minnesota, after spending some time in Cuba, declares conditions to be very unsatisfactory in that island, the dissatisfaction permeating all classes, if not for the same reasons. The conservative element openly desires American domination in some workable, permanent form. There is much complaint among politicians because Governor Magoon spent so much money upon sanitation and road building. When he took office there was a surplus of $11,000,000 in the treasury and the revenues have produced another surplus of $12,000,000, yet he turns over the treasury to Gomez with no surplus at all. As for the common people of Cuba their chief concern is that lotteries and cock fighting be legalized so that they may hazard new fortunes and have some fun. That is hard material to make free government out of.

The Balkan Situation.

The idea of an all-Slav, Balkan empire, which has long possessed the affections of the Servians, appears to be vanishing. Austria and Turkey have compounded their respective felonies on a monetary basis which permits Austria to retain Bosnia and Herzegovina, and about all Servia can do is to roll rocks down the mountains on its enemies while the compounding is being effected. As for Bulgaria it also has received a warning from the powers signatory to the Berlin treaty to pay Turkey a reasonable sum for the abandonment of suzerainty and to demobilize its forces along the Turkish frontier or take the consequences. Thus peace in the Balkans is being established on a strict monetary basis.

At the time when General Burnside's force was besieged in Knoxville, Tenn., with an apparent danger of being starved into surrender, a telegram came one day from Cumberland Gap, announcing that "Firing is heard in the direction of Knoxville."

"Glad of it!" Mr. Lincoln. "It reminds me of Mrs. Sallie Ward, a neighbor of mine. She has a very large family. Occasionally one of her numerous progeny would be heard crying in some out-of-the-way place and she would exclaim, 'There's one of my children that isn't dead yet!'"—From "Table Talk of Abraham Lincoln." WHAT THE SALVATION ARMY IS DOING

By E. FRENCH STROTHER.

"Seven uniformed psalm-singers with a bad brass band and a tambourine, disturbing the peace on the main streets Sunday afternoon," is a popular answer. "And an American flag," you add.

Yes, and don't forget the red and blue uniforms, nor the bonnetted "lassie" selling the "War Cry" in the saloons, nor Santa Claus on the street corner in a wig and red coat reminding you to "keep the pot boiling" around Christmas time. Let us say, for the moment, that these things sufficiently describe what the Salvation Army is.

Then, What does the Salvation Army do?

It does a great deal more than give Christmas dinners to the poor and hold prayer-meetings in the jails. It helps the poor every day in the year, it visits the sick, it rescues fallen women, it maintains one of the best orphanages in California, it gives employment to idle men and finds employment for others, it helps ex-convicts to stay straight after they leave prison, and it teaches city failures how to become successful farmers. If a woman is alone in a strange town, the best place she can go to find out where she can lodge safely and cheaply, is to the Salvation Army headquarters.

Let us translate these assertions into terms of human experience. As I sat talking to Major McPhes, in the Army headquarters in San Francisco last week, a German woman wearing the Army bonnet came in and interrupted.

"It's a sick woman this time, Major. Her husband's out of work, and she's done washing until she broke down and had to go to bed. There's three children—two babies and a ten-year-old boy. The boy's been selling papers, until three days ago he used his last cent to buy food, and hadn't anything left to buy papers to sell. I gave him ten cents to start with, and bought her some soup. You've got to do the rest. It'll only be three or four days—but they've no wood nor a thing to eat in the house."

"Get what they need and send me the bill," said the Major, and added to me:

"We never give more than the least that will possibly tide people over. Give them more than that, two or three times, and you make paupers of them. The Army is accused of giving indiscriminate charity. It doesn't. If a person is starving, we feed him without question; but we investigate before we give him anything more."

One day's work of the Relief Department of the Army in San Francisco is torn from the diary of the department and inserted here. The date was December 8th, last.

When Mrs. S., applied at the Relief Department she did not ask charity, she did not ask food, but she asked for work, and she really was finding someone who would care for the tiny babies while she worked.

One week ago yesterday she became the mother of twins, utterly unprovided for. She wanted a baby as other mothers want them, and she planned to prepare for its coming, and to cry of financial panic when her husband lost his position. She went to work for $1 a day and kept life in herself and him until three weeks ago, when he was laid off. The Salvation Army sent the woman home and provided for her and babies.

Mrs. J. — with a family of six, and a weak husband, destitute with very poor prospects, but struggling bravely to maintain the independence, and only accepting relief on account of the children.

John — aged 60, and looks as though he had stood 80 years' wear, and has just done sixty days in the House of Correction for using a cemetery as a lodging house, applies for shoes, exhibiting a pair of antique extemporized out of a pair of old shoes that were so tight that they crippled him.

A little boy, the last face of one of our street collectors and with a choked voice said, "Please, Mr. Santa Claus, will you bring back my papa? He died and was taken away."

Forty-nine single men applied for assistance.
Twenty women applied for Christmas baskets.

Consider the Army's work for children at Lytton Springs, in Sonoma county. The Golden Gate Orphanage and Industrial Farm for Destitute Children is the name of the work. Here, on 645 acres of rolling farm land, are 200 children from the state of California, all under twelve years of age, orphans and poor, who are learning to become wholesome, "healthy minds in healthy bodies," and equipped, when grown, for life's struggle. These 200 children, if left alone, would grow up paupers, criminals, and illiterates. Here they live at open-air life. The boys are taught practical farm work. They make gardens, milk cows, raise poultry, and sell all their eggs to the Hotel St. Francis at a cent a dozen over market prices. In 1908 they hatched 10,000 chicks, besides selling a case of eggs a day and keeping enough eggs to supply the farm table. The girls are taught household science. They learn to cook, to make beds, to sew, and all the little arts of home-making.

But better even than learning these useful things, boys and girls alike learn the love and homely spirit that make life liveable. Major Bourne and his wife, who are in charge, are father and mother to all the children, and make the orphanage a "home" and not an "institution."

Rescue Work.

Again, consider the Army's work for the rescue of women who go wrong.

At Beulah Heights, near Oakland, the Army maintains a Rescue Home for women. Here women who have gone wrong, even women from the underworld who desire to reform, are kept from three months to a year, away from temptation and their old associates, learning household arts and strengthening their moral fibre for the struggle to reenter the world in self-respect. Before they leave, a position is found for each one according to her ability to work. The Army officers keep in touch with these women for years after they leave, and 84 per cent. of them are known to stay in the path of virtue. In the eighteen years of its existence, the Beulah Home has been the refuge for hundreds of ruined women who, through it, have found their way back to hope and a life of self-respect. This is one of the most humane and important of all the Army's social betterment works.

If a man appeals to the Army for help in finding work, the officers help him if they can, and if they know him. They keep in touch with the employment officers, and are able to place many men. For instance, last year in the United Kingdom of Great Britain, the Salvation Army found employment (temporary or permanent) for 204,766 persons. In California last year, hundreds were similarly assisted.

But, if the Army officers do not know the applicant, they will not recommend him to an employer. But they will take him into their Industrial Home. Here he is put to work—maybe sorting rags, or old magazines, or mending old shoes or furniture. (The Army collects these cast-off things from the public, works them over into useable articles, and sells them to the deserving poor at prices they can afford to pay. Even once-used tea leaves are collected.)

If the man proves his willingness to work, and his honesty, he remains at the Home, receiving a small wage and his board and lodging, until he advances through positions of trust to a point where the Army can recommend him to outside employers. Thus the man retains his self-respect, helps advance a worthy charity by his work, and is tied over a period of economic stress and returned to a self-supporting position in the competitive world.

Keeping Ex-Convicts Straight.

When a convict leaves San Quentin or Folsom at the end of his term, the state gives him a suit of clothes, a ticket to the town from which he came, and $5. But he is a stranger in an unknown world, and branded as an outcast. The world has changed and no one will help him, because he has had no chance to find one, and employers generally do not want ex-convicts.

But many ex-convicts will stay straight if they can find work and have their record forgot. If the record follows them, and drives them from job after job, they lapse into criminality again in sheer desperation. Here the Salvation Army performs a great work.

When a convict is soon to be released, if he asks it, the Army will find him a job with a man who is first fully informed of his record, and who is willing to help him live the live record down. Preferably, the job should be in the country, and where the convict is unknown.

The day the convict is released, the Army officers take him to some quiet place, give him a second-hand suit (for an experienced eye can often recognize a convict by his suit of clothes), feed and lodge him a few days until the very distinct and offensive prison smell leaves him and until the prison pallor begins to leave his face. Then they take him to his new employment, and he is started right.

Last year, 203 California prisoners were helped in this way. In the United Kingdom, 5,626 were so helped last year. The importance of this form of Army work to the country is hard to overstate.

Army as Probation Officers.

Another phase of the Army's prison work is this: it investigates cases of friendless prisoners who it thinks may deserve a parole from prison. If it decides that the case merits it, it puts in operation the machinery for getting a parole, and if successful, acts as the probation officer who is responsible to the state for the conduct of the prisoner on his release. By securing employment for them and keeping them occupied and self-supporting, they have reformed many convicts in this way.

The Army officers are also highly regarded by the criminal courts as probation officers for juvenile offenders who are not incorrigible.

Army Hotels.

The Army maintains a hotel in San Francisco for unaccompanied women. Here a woman can get a clean, safe night's lodging for thirty-five cents or more, and meals on the same scale. This hotel saves many women from the dangers and temptations that await a woman alone in a strange city.

There are besides many hotels maintained by the Army for workmen, where a night's lodging may be had for fifteen cents.

Farm Colony.

At Romie, near Soledad, California, the Army has demonstrated the feasibility of removing city failures to farms. Here, in a few years, these men, on their ten-acre patches, have reclaimed themselves from hopeless economic inefficiency to self-respecting farmers.

Finding Lost Friends.

Last year, in the United Kingdom, the Army found 12,842 persons with whom friends or relatives wished to communicate, and of whom they had lost track. Because of the universality of the Army (it has branches in almost every country on earth), and because of the complete system of intercommunication between the posts, descriptions of lost friends get wide circulation. In one case, a missing German husband whose wife was in Berlin, was located in Johannesburg, South Africa, and compelled by the Army officers to send his destitute wife and children a fair share of his salary.

These are some of the things the Salvation Army does. In California, Arizona, Nevada, Utah, Colorado, and New Mexico (they call it "this Province") the Army last year collected and disbursed more than $100,000. This money came from public offerings, collections, and the generosity of themselves.

When you give a beggar a nickel you say to yourself, "Buncoed again." When you give the old lady with the black shawl and the crazy hand organ a spare dime you think, "I hope this cheap little tribute to my love for my own mother hasn't led me into being a

SAFEGUARDING YOUR CASH

By MARVIN WALLACE.

When the string of "Walsh banks" in Chicago went the way of frenzied finance to spectacular disaster, the catastrophe taught bankers and public alike that inefficient examination is a costly business. To save the honor of the banking business, and to restore public confidence, the other banks of Chicago assumed all the liabilities of the Walsh banks (amounting to more than $2,000,000) and paid its creditors dollar for dollar. Then, that they might never have to repeat this expensive advertisement, they formed an association, comprising all the leading banks, for the purpose of providing private examinations of the banks as an extra precaution in addition to the official examination by State and National inspectors.

When the California Safe Deposit and Trust Company closed its doors, San Francisco learned Chicago's bitter lesson. And San Francisco's bankers promptly "went Chicago one better" by introducing a system of private examinations more exacting than Chicago's.

The eighteen leading banks of San Francisco are members of the local clearing house. The smaller banks clear their checks through one or another of the clearing houses. The house itself undertook the work of providing the extra safeguards. It employed Mr. A. Kains, a banker of twenty-seven years' experience as a manager, for the Canadian Bank of Commerce (successively in Toronto, New Orleans, Chicago, New York, and San Francisco) to be its private bank examiner. It gave Mr. Kains complete access to every detail of business of every bank in the clearing house, and required every bank that clears through a member to extend him the same privileges.

Mr. Kains' position is unique in America. He entered into a five-year contract with the clearing house, beginning June 1, 1908. One provision of the contract is that he shall not engage in business in San Francisco for five years after the expiration of the contract if he fails to renew it.

Mr. Kains' duties are these: He examines each bank at least once a year, learns whether its capital stock is paid up, who its officers are and their character, studies its financial condition, its banking methods, the character of its loans, the collateral that secures the loans, and the character of the men who put up the collateral. All this involves not only the most searching investigation of the banks themselves, but of the businesses that borrow the banks' money.

Whenever Mr. Kains discovers any irregularity in book-keeping, any loose or ignorant practice of banking methods, or other bad condition in any bank, he warns the officers of that bank and demands that they correct the evil. If they fail to do so, he then reports to a committee of the clearing house, which exists for this purpose, telling them that an unsafe condition exists in that bank, but not giving details. The committee then uses its offices of warning and persuasion to impress the bank's officers. If this still proves insufficient,

Mr. Kains reports the delinquency in detail, and the committee may, if it seems wisest, expel the bank from the clearing house. This would amount to a public advertisement of its bad banking, and the threat of such action would be sufficient to compel any bank to correct its ways.

Los Angeles has followed the example of San Francisco, and about three months after Mr. Kains' employment, the Los Angeles banks employed Mr. John W. Wilson to perform similar offices for them.

The banks of the state, outside of these cities, have also taken steps to provide like safeguards. At the last annual meeting of the California State Bankers' Association the subject was discussed, and the result was the formation of the California State Clearing House Association. This association, which already has a membership that includes more than 400 of the 300-odd banks in California, adopted a constitution on October 26, 1908. This constitution provides that the state shall be divided into eleven districts for purposes of private examination, as follows:

District No. 1 includes all banking corporations and individual bankers in the city and county of San Francisco that are members of or clear through members of the San Francisco Clearing House Association.

District No. 2 consists of the members of the Associated Savings Banks of San Francisco.

District No. 3 includes all banks in the corporate limits of the City of Los Angeles, that are members of or clear through members of the Los Angeles Clearing House Association.

District No. 4 includes the counties of San Diego, Imperial, San Bernardino and Riverside.

District No. 5 includes the county of Orange and that portion of Los Angeles County which lies east of a line running from the westerly border of Pasadena to the westerly border of San Pedro.

District No. 6 includes the counties of Ventura, Santa Barbara and all banks in Los Angeles county not included in Districts Nos. 3 and 5.

District No. 7 includes the counties of San Mateo, Santa Clara, Santa Cruz, Monterey, San Benito and San Luis Obispo.

District No. 8 includes the counties of Alameda and Contra Costa.

District No. 9 includes the counties of Stanislaus, Madera, Merced, Fresno, Tulare, Kern and Kings.

District No. 10 includes the counties of Marin, Sonoma, Solano, Napa, Mendocino, Lake, Humboldt and Del Norte.

District No. 11 includes all counties not previously mentioned.

The constitution further provides that a Central Board, consisting of one member elected by the members of each district, shall employ competent examiners from a list of nominees submitted by the districts, who shall have functions and powers like those of Mr. Kains. One examiner may have one or more districts as his territory, and the expenses of their employment will be paid pro rata by the banks themselves.

The banking laws of the state are generally considered by bankers to be adequate already, but the practice of appointing bank examiners for political reasons, regardless of personal qualifications or high character, has shown that the state's examinations are not a sufficient safeguard.

Banking is a business done on honor, and the history of banking generally reveals a high standard of conduct. A bank's greatest assets are the honesty of its officials and the confidence of the public. The lack of the first destroys the second. Hence, the bankers, realizing that the black sheep in their business discredit the business itself, have taken these steps to safeguard the banks against the other banks. The method they have adopted in San Francisco and Los Angeles is about as far as ingenuity can go toward devising a system of enforcing universal honesty. When the banks of the state at large follow their example California banks will be in the front rank of those who have thrown the most modern safeguards around the business of banking.

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE.

Little Folk Town.

Oh, over the hills is Little Folk Town,
Where I never again may go,
Where fairies and elfins roam up and down,
O'er the fields of green or the fields of brown,
As all of the Little Folk know.

Brave Jack who slaughtered the ogre golum
In Little Folk Town doth dwell,
It was just as the ogre said, "Fe fo fum!"
That he chopped off his head, which injured him some,
As little Folk love to tell.

The Babes in the Woods are resident there,
And the robins that covered them, too,
And Goldilocks of the sunlit hair,
And the bigger bears and the little, wee bear—
It is there that such things are true.

There is Red Riding Hood, and her grandma old,
And sweet Cinderella is there,
And the little ones seek for the fairy gold,
Just all that the wee, little hands can hold,
The gold in the goblins' care.

There's the sight that gladdens, the sound that thrills,
In Little Folk Town, they say,
Till a lullaby song the daytime stills;
And I'd like to go back o'er the misty hills,
But I can't—I have lost the way.

The Super-Upper House.

First Citizen—"The lower House of the Legislature is better than usual this session, the upper House is not bad, but the super-upper House—"

Second Citizen—"What do you mean by the super-upper House?"
"Why, Hlatton, Parker and Burke, of course, you chump."

"What about them?"
"The 'organization' legislators are all about them. If you don't believe it, take a look into the big building at Sacramento some day."

The Soulful Quatrain.

"The quatrain is the thing," said the Poet.
"It is so soulful, so inspiring, and it is approved by the best authorities. Realizing this,
I have written a few. Listen to this, for instance:

"Stark cliffs against a sky of gray;
The seabird's hodelry cry of doom;
The mystic pines that surge and sway
To grasp the Secret of the Whom."
"It doesn't seem to say anything," remarked the Conservative Listener.

"Yes, that is the beauty of it," the Poet proudly responded. "It leaves the mind groping, and to do this is the Perfection of True
Art. Listen to this:

"All soulless as the sodden sward,
She sits beside the sombre sea,
'He cometh not,' she sobbeth hard,
'He cometh never. Stung! Te-he..."

"This appears to say more, but it leaves with the reader a delightful sense of mystery concerning why she should say te-he if she was stung; and this naturally raises the related question of mystery. Why does woman generally say te-he, anyway? Oh, the possibilities in the quatrain are infinite. Don't you think so?"

But all the Conservative Listener replied was: "I forgot how to think while listening to you."

Fable of the Mastiff and Whiffets.

Attracted by a bit of information disseminated, the Pack of Whiffets had assembled in the Barnyard to consider the situation.

"It certainly is true," said the Yellow Cur,
"that the Mastiff is going away. I heard the Farmer say so."

"Then it will be safe for us to yap at him all we like if we are careful to keep out of his way?" inquired the Yellow Cur.

"Perfectly," the Yellowest Cur replied. "I'm going to do it myself."

So the Pack of Whiffets yapped, snapped and snarled at the Mastiff from what they esteemed a safe distance.

But the Mastiff went on his way, injuring only such Whiffets as got in his path.

She Was Very Commonplace.

She was not "emancipated," and nobody termed her "New."

And I'm really pained to mention that from clubs she quite withdrew.

She could hear the name of Browning with no sign of soulful sighs.

And that she had read her Shakespeare she would rarely advertise.

She had culture, but of culchah she was shy.
I'm grieved to state,

And I've seen her wear a costume which was three weeks out of date.

"Bridge," she said, "I think that gambling is a sin and a disgrace."

Oh, I may as well admit it—she was very commonplace.

But you should have seen her children as they nestled by her side,
And you should have seen her husband as he gazed on her with pride.

And I have a little notion, as they looked on her dear face,
That they never once suspected she was very commonplace.

She was not "emancipated"—but she toiled to bless her brood.

Quite forgetting sighs for Browning as she labored for their good.

She was somewhat short on culchah, but she was as long on home.

That her husband and her children never cared from thence to roam,

Never cared for crimson blossoms that the primrose path supplies.

Since they found their highest pleasure in the lovelight in her eyes.

Full content with humble duties unto which love added grace—

Oh, it must be quite apparent she was sadly commonplace.

Quite old-fashioned! Yet for love of one whose mem'ry we recall

With a tear that half is starting and is half inclined to fall.

Let us thank our God, my brothers, of the morn we left behind.

That he gave to us dear mothers of the good old-fashioned kind.

Origin of the Pussy Cat.

This is the tale as it has been whispered by father to son through untold generations:

The wail of a soul lost in the nethermost pit was borne outward and yet outward until, scaling the brazen battlements of the place where agony never sleeps, it took form and substance, and was swept onward through the black halls of chaos, a shrieking, wailing, vociferating entity.

Thus borne outward, it came at last to where Earth, clad in red flame and murk of clouds, was just awaking from the eternal slumber of the past, and there did the embodied howl of anguish make its caterwaulful home.

Thus, my children, did the dear Pussy Cat come to earth to dwell, and so it is that, waked from midnight's peaceful slumber by her long-drawn chain, we heave a bootjack at the music and ever fall to hit it.

A Suggested Amendment.

State Senator "Gus" Hartman, who admits that he is somewhat of a moralist, has introduced a bill giving a pension of $25 a month to every family which numbers twelve or more children.

But one amendment I would add.

If ne'er I'd add another;

Not one cent should the "old man" have,

But all be for the mother.

Look Back and See—

If the thing that didn't happen was not the one that worried you most;

If the "bad luck" you talk about was not due to bad management;

If you have no occasion to feel grateful that you did not get all you deserved;

If the price you paid for pleasure was not more than the article was worth;

If you have so many more brains than you need that you can afford to soak any of them in alcohol;

If the one you once longed to cage in marriage would not have made you rather died by this time if you had succeeded;

If some things you eagerly desired did not seem, when attained, very tinsel and tawdry;

If, on the whole, you have not found it own

sentimental easy mark." But when you drop a quarter into a Salvation Army collection, you feel, "Well, by George, that money will be spent honestly to do some worthy poor devil some good."

Now why is it that you feel that way? Why will men who would not give any beggar a cent, and who would hang before they would put a nickel in any church contribution box, cheerfully give the Salvation Army all that their charitable impulses can startle out of them, and think it a good investment?

Several reasons: You never hear of a Salvation Army cashier going wrong. They don't play the races nor plead tearfully that "wine, women, and song" started them on the downward path. Any Salvation Army soldier who touches liquor with his hands, even, is stripped of his uniform; and women singing hymns in a hideous Salvation Army bonnet do not lure men to folly.

When you give to the Salvation Army you do not give to a beggar, but to one who begs for the beggars. And the Salvation Army knows beggars as you know your friends. It helps only the worthy or those who are at the extremity of destitution. It gives discriminately, where you could not discriminate.

Again: If you doubt the cashier of a Salvation Army post you can go to him and demand to see his books. No matter who you are, provided you are a reputable citizen of the town, you have the right (extended by the Army itself) to require the cashier to prove to you that he has accounted for all moneys he has received.

Again: The Army itself gets nothing out of it. The supreme Army officer of this "Province" (described above) is Colonel Charles Miles. He has the supervision of a million dollars' worth of property and of the distribution of a hundred thousand dollars every year. He gets $22.50 a week. The teacher of the Army's Chinese mission school in San Francisco gets $4 some weeks, but usually about $2.50. Most Army "officers" and "soldiers" get nothing. They make their livings as other church members do, and give their work to the Army for nothing in spare hours.

Salvationists—Methodists in Uniform.

But reconsider the question: What is the Salvation Army?

It is a church; practically another Methodist church. General Booth was a Methodist preacher. The Army's theology is straight Methodism. About all of it that it preaches on the streets is St. Paul's, "Jesus Christ, and Him crucified." But it cares more for the theology of good works than for the theology of creeds. Its "officers" are preachers; its "soldiers" members; its "posts," churches.

The Swedish minister to the United States, Herr Lagerkrantz, is a member of the Salvation Army. Many of its Californian members are highly successful business men. It is not, then, a noisy band of ignorant cranks that many people think it is. It uses noise to get a hearing from people whom noise and show attract. It works among the poor and the outcasts; and it reaches classes of people that no church can reach. It is a powerful agency for peace, and order, and regeneration. No wonder it has spread in thirty years over the whole earth.

The thimble was at first worn on the thumb and was called "thumb-bell."

For "Middlemarch," George Eliot got $40,000 and for "Romola" $35,000.

The right hand, which is more sensitive to the touch than the left, is less sensitive than the latter to the effect of heat and cold.

WITH EYES AND :: EARS OPEN ::

It has been said of the commuters who come across the bay every morning, that they divide themselves, as to time of starting, into workers, clerks, and slinkers, but, while clever, the saying is not true. It would be nearer right to say that they divide themselves into those who have not enough executive ability to set themselves at work, those who have barely enough and those who find employment for themselves and the other two classes. The persons who do the full day's work in two hours in the forenoon and two hours in the afternoon is no slinker. The writer comes over with the clerks.

A very decent company of people those clerks are! Some are heads of departments, some are rising to become department heads and managers and some have gotten as high as they hope to climb, content if they can keep from being pushed to one side by younger men. And then there are whole flocks of "commutesses" with shining faces, coming in nearly the same little groups, morning after morning, as promptly on time as the trains themselves. Sometimes a commutess dumps out of the ranks to enter double blessedness and sometimes she becomes a commutess again, sits in the same old seat and reads novels as before. What miscarriage of bliss was there? Only imagination may tell for, though commuters go and come from the same station, by the same train and boat, at the same hour, year after year, and know each other as well by sight as each knows his own front door, they rarely become better acquainted for that. How much would a cheery "good morning," given and taken by these long-known strangers, add to the pleasure of the ride across the bay, and what harm could come of it?

They are a reading people, these commuters. Three-fourths of them have something in hand morning and evening, newspapers mainly, but often books and magazines. As a rule the women have the books and magazine while the men have the newspapers, but this does not imply that the women are reading solid stuff and the men trash. The books are mainly current novels and a glance over the shoulder shows that the magazines are opened at the story pages. Perhaps a fourth of all are reading something worth while. Not a few habitually carry the best periodicals and so keep abreast of the world. All deductions made, there is a round hour a day going and coming that may thus be utilized, and what may not a person do for self-culture with an hour each day?

It is mean to listen to what one's fellow commuters say, but one cannot avoid listening if he wishes and generally he does not wish to. It also is an education. For instance, there was the man who saved $1,000 on the contract price of his new house by giving the job to the lowest bidder regardless of other considerations. Before the recent rains he boasted of it. He isn't boasting now.

Every window in his house leaked like a sieve. He had to lie on his back on boards laid across the stringers under the roof and stick toothpicks through the holes where water streamed in that the leaky places might be found from the outside. When the wind blew from the east the windows and doors pitched on the outside, and when the wind came from the west they pinched on the other. No connection was made between the eaves and the sewer, so all the water the roof caught was poured into the basement and the Chinese cook had to devote his time night and day, while the storm lasted, to bailing out the water out. One portion of his front walk dripped two feet when the wet earth under it settled, and a caved-down bank covered another portion three feet deep with yellow mud. He is no longer quite sure that he saved $1,000.

The trans-bay commuters and commutesses are interesting folk and the exasperation of it is that convention has ordained that one may not know them better without the prearrangement of a formal introduction.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN.

The Best In 33 Years

A resident of Sacramento, keen of insight and sterling in character, declares the present legislature the best the state has had in thirty-three years, and he has watched them all. The cities have sent better representatives than formerly and lobbying has been reduced to its lowest terms. There are some old hacks there but, with about three exceptions, these are not as blatant as in former years, and their influence is less potent. The reason why is credited to the Lincoln-Roosevelt movement throughout the state, and to the efforts made in San Francisco to establish justice. These efforts have energized the civic conscience of California as not before in a quarter of a century. The political machine is only as good as it has got to be in order to hold power, but the difference between its best and its worst is considerable.

Leavitt Senator Leavitt is a patriot. He reveres the Constitution of the United States. Lieutenant Governor Porter must have been privy to this when he put Leavitt on the public morals committee. Leavitt so loves the constitution that he would not permit the people of California to so far evade the letter of the constitution as to venture to express their preference for United States senator. What inconsiderate use men can sometimes make of their civic consciences when employed at long intervals for brief periods!

The Governor Has the Say

The Ways and Means Committee of the Assembly is practicing a brand new system of economy. Usually the plan has been to pass a million or two of appropriation bills more than the treasury could stand and then leave it to the governor to pick and choose at the close of the session. But that is not the idea this time. Everybody who comes before the committee must call for appropriation. It is told that he has no chance unless the governor signifies his approval in advance. So the interested party rushes down stairs to find the governor and discover whether his bill has a chance for its life. Such self-abnegation on the part of a committee, which of old used to set such store by its official importance, has created wonderment. But if the arrangement results in real economy it will not be greatly objected to by any one.

"Dick" Welch Is Poetic

There is no law in California permitting a town or city to change its name. Senator Savage introduced a bill to meet the new-felt want, the bill providing that when one-fourth of the voters petition for a chance to vote on a change of name the governing body of the city shall accommodate them. If two-thirds vote for the change it shall be made. This looked safe enough, but Senator Welch saw danger lurking and so had the bill amended, much to Savage's chagrin, by providing that the number of voters petitioning must be at least one-half of all. Why this restriction? Those who have known Senator Welch, or thought they knew him, will scarcely believe it when they are told that his reason was that he feared advantage would be taken of an easy law to secure the abandonment of romantic Spanish names of California towns and the substitution of dreary and prosaic names of English derivation. After this it would not create surprise if "Dick" Welch blossoms out as a poet.

A Promising Blacksmith Statesman

One of the men who are fighting their way into prominence in the Assembly is blacksmith Stuckenbruck of San Joaquin county. At the last session his district was represented by Arthur Percival, a lawyer, who gained notoriety by returning to the treasury the per diem his wife had drawn as a clerk without rendering service for it. Percival was a candidate for re-election and it was supposed that in view of this act of honesty his constituents would return him; but Stuckenbruck, the town blacksmith, got into the fight and proved a sledge-hammer campaigner. The country people liked his style and, although the Lincoln-Roosevelt movement gave a majority to Stuckenbruck a Democrat. The blacksmith proves to be a vigorous orator of the straight-from-the-shoulder type, and is putting in some heavy blows for economy and reform. He is likely to succeed in abolishing some abuses connected with junketing committees and the payment of excessive prices for articles purchased by order of the Legislature.

Martial Law With a Vengeance

The military bills introduced in the Assembly by Perine of San Francisco have attracted a good deal of attention, but not more than they deserve, for they contain some extraordinary things. Martial law in California has been nothing more than a name, because there is no authority in our constitution and laws for the suspension, under any circumstances, of the civil authority. But if the Senate measures pass, martial law will become a grim reality. They provide that when the governor proclaims any city or county to be in a state of insurrection the civil officers must, under dire penalties, obey all orders issued by the military. Where constitutional warrant is to be found for this extraordinary enactment no one has arisen to explain, nor does there seem to be any definition of what will justify the governor in proclaiming a state of insurrection. Again, the bills provide for life tenure by elected and appointed National Guard officers. This, too, makes officialdom an astonishment.

What Race Horses Eat

Mr. Stoer sells provender for the race horses at Emeryville. They require much. The sales run into tens of thousands of dollars a year. Therefore, in the opinion of Mr. Stoer, race-track gambling is a thing to be encouraged, not prohibited. But what else do the race horses eat? They eat up the wages of many workers, eat up the characters of many men and women, and "eat 'em alive," eat up other people's money by the tens of thousands of dollars during every racing season, eat up the careers of public officials, eat bodies of suicides and gnaw at the hearts of convicts in their cells—and then go on eating until they have consumed their own hides, hoofs and tails. Their eating is the least of their virtues and Mr. Stoer can not defend their appetites without their eating all that is worth saving out of him.

Lobbyists Not On Register

The Republican majority in the State Senate are overly kind to the Democratic members in so often permitting them to make good records by standing for the morality while the Republicans are placed in opposition. The registering of lobbyists is a proper safeguard. If it had obtained in past decades it would have prevented many a scandal, saved many a legislator from temptations he was not strong enough to resist, afforded publicity regarding public affairs where the public health needed that the light shine in, and it would have made gentlemen of lobbyists instead of lobbyists of gentlemen. The Republican party is being wounded in the house of its friends.

Will He Try to Succeed Himself?

There are whisperings in Sacramento, some of them loud enough to be heard from end to end of the capitol, that James N. Gillett will be a candidate to succeed himself as governor of California. Wouldn't that make a fight, though? The political atmosphere would be thicker with brickbats and bootjacks than Spring Valley is with microscopic microbes. Has Mr. Harriman's reaching out for new fields to conquer disposed him to foreclose on California altogether? The Lincoln-Roosevelt League needs only such a provocation as this to cause it to sweep the state like a barnyard floor, clean enough but for the dust created in the sweeping.

Non-Partisan Republicanism

The appointive power generally feels that it partisan lines he not observed in the filling of offices the political world will fall apart, but the electorate does not always feel that way. City Attorney McElroy of Oakland is a Democrat. He makes no apologies for being one and betrays no tendency toward recantation, and yet the Republicans of Oakland have, for the second time, nominated him on their ticket for election to the office of city attorney, and he is as certain to be elected as he is to be alive on election day. He has gained, and held, the confidence of all interests so fully that the more politic thing a Republican citizen can do is to nominate him. The political millennium has not come even in Oakland but it is nearer than it was once.

A Mayor Who Has Made Good

Mayor Mott, of Oakland, has his critics, but these Oakland people do see: whereas for many years taxes were high but no public improvements worth mentioning were made, now, though taxes are still high, streets are being paved, parks improved, the policing of the city bettered and fire protection made more adequate. Therefore Mayor Mott will succeed Mayor Mott. It is not always that citizens are ungrateful, or that the tendency to pass the honor around, prevents an efficient mayor succeeding himself.

A Preacher In Politics

There is a report abroad, probably not very well founded, that Mr. William J. Bryan has said that he is willing to make one more race for the presidential office, if his party wants him to, after which he will go into the ministry. Among politicians he has always been something of a preacher, even though, among preachers, he may have been looked upon as a politician. At all events Mr. Bryan has rendered his country better service as a political preacher than he is ever likely to render it in any other capacity. He has a faculty of reaching, and moralizing, the political consciences of men even if he can not herd a majority of them into his own political corral. He can still command a hearing and whoever can do that has vantage ground enough.

Senatorial Calibre

The true size of men is sometimes more adequately measured by the little things they do than by the big ones they attempt to do. The movement for the restriction of child labor has long desired to make the District of Columbia free from the use of employing childhood into cash, and renewed effort has lately been made to that end. A bill passed the senate but with the proviso that it should not apply to children working for the senate. Wasn't that little, though?

The Consular School Idea

Representative Lowden of Illinois is trying to induce Congress to establish a school for training diplomats. The idea is as good as that of establishing a military school at West Point. In fact, a well-trained school of diplomacy might almost make the West Point school a superfluity. Uncle Sam's representatives abroad have compared, as a whole, but illy with the representatives of other nations. As a rule they see little of service before they are out of commission, and doing small politics in the interests of United States senators indifferently prepares them for service. The greatest obstacle in the way of carrying out Mr. Lowden's idea will be the loss of patronage to senators. They will be loth to give it up.

YOSEMITE.

By Joaquin Miller.

Sound! sound! sound!
O colossal walls and crown'd
In one eternal thunder!
Sound! sound! sound!
O ye oceans overhead,
While we walk, subdued in wonder,
In the ferns and grasses, under
And beside the swift Merced!

Fret! fret! fret!
Streaming, subdued banners, set
On the giant granite castles
In the clouds and in the snow!
But the foe he comes not yet,—
We are loyal, valiant vassals,
And we touch the trailing tassels
Of the banners far below.

Surge! surge! surge!
From the white Sierra's verge,
To the very valley blossom.
Surge! surge! surge!
Yet the song-bird builds a home,
And the mossy branches cross them,
And the tasselled tree-tops toss them,
In the clouds of falling loam.

Sweep! sweep! sweep!
O ye heaven-born and deep,
In one dread, unbroken chorus!
We may wonder or may weep,—
We may wait on God before us,
We may shout or lift a hand,—
We may bow down and deplore us,
But may never understand.

Beat! beat! beat!
We advance, but would retreat
From this restless, broken breast
Of the earth in a convulsion.
We would rest, but dare not rest,
For the angel of expulsion
From this Paradise below
Waves us onward and . . . we go.

THE MISSION BELLS OF MONTEREY.

By Bret Harte.

O bells that rang, O bells that sang
Above the martyrs' wilderness,
Till from that reddened coast-line sprang
The Gospel seed to cheer and bless,
What are your garnered sheaves to-day?
O Mission bells! Eleison bells!
O Mission bells of Monterey!

O bells that crash, O bells that clash
Above the chimney-crowded plain,
On wall and tower your voices dash,
But never with the old refrain;
In mart and temple gone astray!
Ye dangle bells! Ye jangle bells!
Ye wrangle bells of Monterey!

O bells that die, so far, so high,
Come back once more across the sea;
Not with the zealot's furious cry,
Not with the creed's austerity;
Come with His love alone to stay,
O Mission bells! Eleison bells!
O Mission bells of Monterey!

Note.—This poem was set to music by Monsieur Charles Gounod.

Origin of "Blood and Iron."

The expression quoted, in Prince Otto von Bismarck's famous speech to the Budget Commission of the Prussian Diet, delivered September 30, 1860, gave to him the name "The Iron Chancellor," which clung to him all through life. The paragraphs from which the quotation is made are as follows:

"Our blood is too hot; we are fond of bearing an armor too large for our small body. Germany does not look to Prussia for liberalism, but for power. Let Bavaria, Wurtemberg, Baden, indulge in liberal ideas; no one will assign them the role desired for Prussia. Prussia must consolidate its might and nurse it for the favorable moment.

"Prussia's boundaries, as determined by the Congress of Vienna, are not conducive of its welfare as a sovereign state. Not by speeches and resolutions of majorities are the mighty problems of the age to be solved—that was the mistake of 1848 and 1849—but by blood and iron."

THE JAPANESE SIDE OF THE QUESTION

By D. S. RICHARDSON, Foreign Secretary Consulate General of Japan.

The trade of San Francisco with Japan exceeds in volume that had with any other country doing business with this port. During the calendar year 1907 the records of the Custom House show that forty-seven foreign countries found a market here for their products, the value of which is given as $84,207,011. Of this total Japan sent $20,956,287, or about forty per cent. of the whole. Great Britain, with all her colonies, sent $8,801,435, and the Chinese Empire, which ranks third on the list, $7,942,933.

Other countries which for the year in question were as follows:

	Per cent.
Guatemala	$2,075,524 1/2 of the whole
India	2,259,176 1/2 "
France	2,141,300 1/2 "
Germany	2,101,600 1/2 "
Chile	1,720,000 1/2 "
Australia	1,488,874 1/2 "
Strait Settlements	1,109,881 1/2 "

The following is a table of total imports into San Francisco from all countries for a period of eight years, giving Japan's proportion of it for each year:

	Total	From Japan	Per centage
1900	$19,422,474	$8,849,508	45
1901	37,489,952	13,934,597	37
1902	36,079,182	9,005,608	25
1903	39,422,188	10,182,218	26
1904	33,411,228	16,270,190	49
1905	44,249,311	17,239,207	39
1906	49,162,378	16,749,962	34
1907	84,207,011	20,956,287	25

Exports.

During the year 1907 the domestic exports from San Francisco to forty-four foreign countries amounted to $29,838,469. Of this total the sum of $8,750,310, or nearly thirty per cent., went to Japan. The next approach to this was Great Britain, which took domestic produce valued at $4,862,319. These exports for several of the more important countries and given in the order of their magnitudes, were as follows:

Japan	$8,750,310	20	per cent of total
Great Britain	4,862,319	16	"
China	2,875,000	9	"
Philippines	2,016,689	7	"
Mexico	1,701,365	6	"
Hongkong	1,671,287	6	"
Australia	1,416,659	5	"
Canada	1,103,440	3	"

The following table of domestic exports from San Francisco for eight years shows Japan's proportion of the total.

	Total Exports	To Japan	Per centage
1900	$27,332,219	$8,332,394	30
1901	36,734,952	3,777,017	10
1902	38,079,182	3,001,982	8
1903	39,422,188	3,100,682	8
1904	33,411,228	10,475,574	31
1905	44,249,311	18,248,974	41
1906	49,162,378	8,749,908	18
1907	29,838,469	8,750,310	29

It will thus be seen that, for the eight years from 1900 to 1907, inclusive, Japan furnished an average of 32 per cent of the total imports and took 20 per cent of the total exports. It should be evident that this trade is of value to Japan, not only because the balance is in her favor, but because of its magnitude and future possibilities. It is not to be supposed that she will abandon it lightly or sacrifice it to considerations of less importance. To preserve it and the friendship of the American people, she has signified her desire in many ways: Witness her voluntary regulation of the labor and immigration question, her recent accord with the Government of the United States as to future policies in Asia, and her magnificent demonstration of good will in the reception of the American fleet.

Right to Hold Land.

Article VI of the Treaty of Peace, Comity, Commerce and Navigation, concluded May 22, 1882, between the United States and Korea, provides as follows:

"Subjects of Chosen who may visit the United States shall be permitted to reside and to rent premises, purchase land, or to construct residences or warehouses in all parts of the country. They shall be freely permitted to pursue their various callings and avocations, and to traffic in all merchandise, raw or manufactured, that is not declared contraband by law."

The specific provision relative to the purchase of land was not inserted in any treaty between Japan and the United States. It is provided, however, in Article I of the Treaty of Commerce and Navigation of 1894 that:

Treaty Provisions.

"The citizens or subjects of each of the two High Contracting parties shall have full liberty to enter, trade or reside in any part of the territories of the other contracting party, and shall enjoy full and perfect protection for their persons and property."

"In whatever relates to rights of residence and travel; to the possession of goods and effects of any kind; to the succession in personal estate, by will or otherwise, and the disposal of property of any sort and in any manner whatsoever which they may lawfully acquire, the citizens or subjects of each Contracting Party shall enjoy in the territories of the other the same privileges, liberties and rights, and shall be subject to no higher imposts or charges in these respects than native citizens or subjects of the most favored nation."

"The right to hold land, although not specifically stipulated in the Treaty of 1894, is clearly inferable from the wording of the article cited. It is manifestly a 'right of residence.' It is covered by the concession relative to the 'possession of goods and effects of any kind,' by the right of 'succession to personal estate' and the further right to 'dispose of property of any sort and in any manner whatsoever.'"

It was clearly the intention of the contracting parties in the framing of this treaty to put their respective citizens and subjects on that plane of equality enjoyed by the "citizens or subjects of the most favored nation."

The United States does not deny the right to hold land to the citizens or subjects of any nation with which it has treaty relations. Even if an attempt were made to discriminate in this regard between those aliens of the white or African races, who are eligible to citizenship, and those of the Mongolian or Asiatic races to whom the right of United States citizenship is denied, it will be seen that, in practice, the United States recognizes no such distinction. Many Japanese and Chinese are holders of real estate, not only in California, but in other states of the Union.

Koreans May Own Land.

The Treaty with Korea, already noted, specifically concedes the right to purchase land to a people who are racially allied to the Japanese and the Chinese. Any attempt, either by the legislature or national Congress, to deny to Japanese residents the right to acquire land, would not only be in violation of the spirit of the Treaty of 1894, but it would be discrimination of a double nature:

1st. As between Japanese subjects and the subjects or citizens of other nations generally; and

2nd. As between Japanese subjects and the Korean subjects.

No matter how worded a measure of this nature would have the features of class or race discrimination, obnoxious to both the spirit and the letter of American law. It would be clearly unconstitutional.

There is no valid reason or necessity for the enactment of any law denying the right of Japanese (or aliens ineligible to citizenship) to hold land. The advocates of such a measure do not make it clear that such a right means the well-being of the citizens of this state. On the contrary the advocates of unfriendly legislation of this kind, unsupported by evidences of evil resulting from the present exercise of that right, and indifferent to the mischievous effects of such agitation upon the amicable relations of the two people, fairly lay themselves open to the charge of demagoguery. In their zeal as petty politicians they are apparently willing not only to impose harsh conditions upon the Japanese population of California but seriously to embarrass the Federal Government in its relations with Japan. In other words, the larger interests involved in the harmonious co-operation of Japan and America upon world questions are sacrificed to petty considerations of local selfishness.

Japanese Immigration Stopped.

If there has been, at any time, a fear that the number of Japanese coming to the Pacific Coast menaced in any manner the interests of American citizens, that fear, in the mind of every observing and fair-minded man, has been at rest by the recent violent action of the Japanese Government in prohibiting the further emigration of the laboring classes to the United States and its possessions. Such emigration has practically stopped and laborers are no longer coming to America. The only exception to this is the small number of Japanese laborers who have acquired domicile in this country and are returning to their property here located, and their families. The number is insignificant, as the records of the United States Commissioner of Immigration will clearly show. It can have no influence on economic conditions in this state.

The Japanese now remaining in California, but a fraction of one per cent. of the population, are not animated by any desire to hold land in large quantities. Even if such holdings were dangerous to the interests of the state the number of Japanese land holders now here would make no impression on economic conditions. There is evidence to show, however, that to the extent that the Japanese now hold lands, they are contributing to the development and prosperity of the state. They have gone into and made productive the swamps along the river bottoms and in arid regions requiring irrigation for successful cultivation. Their knowledge of agriculture is such that their operations have constituted a valuable object lesson to American farmers and cultivators.

The Japanese population of California provides an element upon which several of the greatest industries of the state are largely dependent for existence. Millions of dollars are invested in the fruit and sugar industries which would become non-productive but for the Japanese labor. Other industries dependent upon the fruit and sugar business, and giving employment to large capital and much white labor, indirectly owe their existence to the presence in this state of a body of Japanese laborers who can be depended upon to pick and pack the fruit crop when ready.

Japanese Not Competitive Labor.

It cannot be truthfully alleged of the Japanese that they are competitors in the labor markets of this coast. As a rule they do not do things which the white laborer does not care to do. The lines of industry in which they are mainly engaged are those which have been neglected by white laborers. They have created industries of their own, thus adding to the wealth of the state. Where they have found themselves in competition with white labor they have maintained prices and, in many instances, demanded higher wages than those accepted by their competitors. This is true of their employment as house servants where the wages demanded by the Japanese are generally higher than those asked by white girls.

Concerning the charge frequently brought against the Japanese, that they will not assimilate with the American people but retain

THE GRAFT CASES

Although some progress has been made in the graft cases during the week just past, it has not been rapid, unless the development in the Coffey trial be excepted, nor has it been spectacular.

At this writing ten jurors have been secured for the trial of Patrick Calhoun, charged with bribery. This is a gain of two during the week, or an average of one juror every three days, but the gain has been made at the cost of venire after venire, squabble upon squabble among attorneys, and warning following warm words from the court. In brief, there has been no change in the modus operandi of the case.

Of course every juror thus far tentatively secured is subject to imperative challenge, but it is apparent, nevertheless, that the first stage of the great graft trial is drawing toward its close, and it is probable that the opening address to the jury will be made not later than next week.

Michael W. Coffey, former supervisor, and once supposedly of the "good dog" kind, is not wealthy, he has but two attorneys—Franklin P. Bull and Robert Ferral—to represent him, and progress in his case has been comparatively rapid. He is charged with taking a bribe of $4,000 from Tacey L. Ford, Abraham Ruef and James L. Gallagher to vote for an overhead franchise for the United Railroads. The trial will take place before Judge Dunne.

Coffey, it will be remembered, is one of those former supervisors who, having been run to earth by Detective Burns, confessed their boodling operations and agreed to lay them bare before grand and petit juries provided they might be immune from prosecution. The promise was given, and the supervisors generally did as they had agreed. Coffey did so before the grand jury, but before the petit jury he proved to have been afflicted with a failure of memory. Because of that failure—that is, because he failed to do as he agreed—he now is being prosecuted.

At this writing six jurors, all subject to imperative challenge, have been secured to try him, and it is not at all improbable that the jury will be chosen by the time this paper goes to press.

The case against A. S. Newburgh, who is to be retried on a charge of attempting to bribe a prospective juror in the Ruef case, was called in Judge Murasky's court last Friday in order that it might be set for trial. By consent of both sides it was continued for a week.

Last Monday, before Judge Lawlor, cases against E. E. Schmitz, Abe Ruef, Tacey L. Ford, Thornwall Mullaly and William M. Abbott were continued for four weeks.

("The Japanese Question"—Concluded)

their national characteristics, forming distinct communities of almost the midst of American communities, the evidence is exactly to the contrary. Nothing can be more manifest than the eagerness with which the Japanese endeavor to adjust their lives and habits in this country to those of their American neighbors. Immediately upon arrival they adopt the American style of dress and commence the study of the English language. In so far as they can, they live in American style in their houses. They are eager patrons of public and private schools and patronize the theatres, churches and public places where something may be learned. They conduct their business according to the customs of the communities in which they live and are solicitous to assimilate and become a part of the new social order about them. The charge that they will not assimilate comes with poor grace from a community which has passed so many obstacles in the way of assimilation as has California. Every state law or municipal regulation which discriminates in any way against the Japanese is obstacle and discouragement to that assimilation which the Japanese constantly seek but which the Japanese Exclusion League says they do not want.

Such were the proposed regulations to deprive the Japanese children of San Francisco of the full rights of the public schools. Such is the direct effect of Assembly Bill No. 14, introduced into the Assembly by Mr. Johnson, classifying the Japanese as Mongolians and fit associates of Indians.

Such will be the effect of the bills introduced into the Legislature designed to deprive the Japanese of the right to hold land, prohibiting them from acting as directors of corporations and authorizing municipalities to segregate them and compel them to live in ghettos.

From the broad standpoint of American citizenship, the present disposition to harass and annoy the Japanese residents of California seems unnecessary and unmanly. They are so inconsistent with the world-famed reputation of the Americans for liberality and fair play that it is difficult to believe that they are representative of any large body of citizens. Japan has made a model of America. She has looked to America as guide and inspiration in her own efforts to emerge from seclusion, feudalism and narrowness. She has believed in the bigness and the broadness of American generosity and the sincerity of American professions of friendship. She has, on the other hand, refused to believe that the professional agitators were representative of the great body of the American people. She has been patient under conditions which wounded national pride and were unjust in their discriminations against her people. She has tried in all sincerity to convince the American people of the good will of her government and people and is still making efforts in that direction. She will omit no action or effort compatible with national honor, to maintain this attitude of good will.

Does it not seem that the Legislature of the great state of California should rise above petty policies in dealing with a great question of this character? If it is not possible for the people of California, as represented by their Legislature, to see that true wisdom and statesmanship call for the closest and most friendly relations with their neighbor across the ocean, should they not, at least, respond to those broad principles of honor and patriotism which have caused the name of America to be loved and respected in all parts of the world?

THE LOST TRAIL.

By Ulric Blair Collins.

[The following lines, "The Lost Trail," were written by Ulric B. Collins in memory of his brother, Willie Collins, well-known and much loved newspaper man, who died in Sacramento on December 29th last.

Ulric Blair Collins is a "Chico boy," and both he and his brother Willie passed their boyhood days here. Ulric is a member of the theatrical profession, and in that work he has achieved fame and success. He lives in New York City under the Featherless.

I know the gorge where the feather flows,
The scrub-oak trees where the foothills bleak,
The midland meads where the poppy blows,
And the heights beyond to Lassen's Peak.

I know the reaches of barren sand
From Cherokee Flat to the lava's marge,
The scrub-oak trees whose leaves are fanned
By scorching winds in the white mirage.

I know the trail to the broken peaks
That lift their fangs by Shasta's springs,
I know the trail the river seeks,
South in his seaward journeyings.

I know the trail o'er the summit brakes,
Past giant pine and low-lean thorn,
I know the trail the vaquero makes,
And the path the mountain sheep have worn.

But where, O brother, shall I seek your trail,
When the dawn is gray and the stars are dim?
I call, but there comes no answering hail
From high divide or from valley's rim.

The fires you lit are cold and dead,
The ashes scattered and sudden wet,
A blurred trail, to the canyon's head,
And the way is blind and I seek you yet.

THE President of the Parkersburg bank placed his strong, fat hands against the low desk before him and with a sigh that meant both relief and satisfaction, showed his chair free of the table. The clock had just struck two, the bank doors had been closed an hour. Henderson, who had watched and waited patiently for that significant movement, also sighed, but without relief or satisfaction, and so faintly that it awoke only a partial gleam of hope in his quickened senses. The president arose and turning said in surprise, "Why, you here, Henderson?"

"Yes, Mr. Mercer," answered the cashier, snapping a rubber over a small roll of papers with an air of quiet diligence, "I am somewhat behind on this work, you see, and I thought I would take this opportunity—"

"Oh shucks! Henderson. Why do you close a half day on Saturdays? One of your own innovations, too. Get out into the sun, man—go to the ball-game—You're not behind—put Custer on the bank, Monday. Come, don't make yourself a drudge to the work!"

"All right, Mr. Mercer, I'll be through soon and will leave in a short time," said Henderson cheerily as the president passed through the inner gate and let himself out the side door into the village street.

Fifteen years before Henderson had entered Mr. Mercer's employ as an office boy. Diligence and energy on his part had brought him in that time to the first position in the bank. Until a few months past he had revelled in the conscious security of a well-made life. He turned his face from the street, and his thoughts from his employer. Mechanically he threw open the book before him and ran his eyes over the pages.

"Eighteen hundred dollars, between now and Monday!" The words came in low, painful gasps. He glanced quickly around the office though he knew himself to be alone. The forced expression of calmness had now given way to one of alert, active fear.

"Eighteen hundred dollars!" he repeated, glaring dully at the page before him. There lay the facts; cold, bloodless facts they were without a variation that tended toward hope. No finesse of maneuver could alter the result. He arose, took his hat, came from the hook and stood hesitating in the center of the room. He faced the safe and felt with trembling fingers for the little key in his hip pocket. The noises of the street were for the time quiet and only the faint laughter of some playing children reached him from the growing of the June after-noon. His heart, seemed loud and harsh. He took a step forward, then paused—the key slipped back, the hand came from the pocket, he stood staring straight before him, but he did not see the safe nor yet any of the contents of the room. What he did see was a little gray-haired woman sitting by a plant-laden window, rocking slowly in time to some calming old-fashioned hymn. He saw her as he had seen her a thousand times, gazing out, anxious, wistful, watching for him—calling him in her heart. He felt it now as he had felt it times without number when he had overstayed his regular time. He raised his arm and brushed the damp brow with shaking hand, then as though drawn by some subtle power he turned and, opening the outer door, slipped into the street at the June after-noon. He walked quickly, looking neither to right nor left. The street was quiet and almost deserted, most of the inhabitants dozing in the shade, or away at the ball-game. He felt a vague satisfaction, for he did not care to meet anyone at present. What he wanted was solitude and time in which to think. He knew his mother was waiting for him and that he ought to go home, but he hurried into a side street and out into the country lanes.

The dusty weeds threw great gray splotches over his well-groomed shoes, the briars by the roadside caught in his coat, breaking out little threads of the wool. Not so long ago, with almost old-maidish primness, Henderson would have avoided these but now he felt he could walk in the dust and arise refreshed. Ah, if only the dust would not wear away his very heartstrings! Ah! he felt the violence of his blood as it coursed in him—and he had made it thus!

THE VALLEY OF LIFE

By LEN LOW

Written for The California Weekly.

He crossed the creek bridge and turning into an unused wood-road, hurried up the hill. An hour's walk brought him to the place he sought, a little open glade near the summit. Here was solitude. Many a time had he sought it out in times of peace when he would look out over the valley and the village lying below and dream golden dreams that seemed as far away now as the blue line of the mountains in the distance. Once he had brought his mother here on one of their happy jaunts and had said to her laughingly, "Standing here and looking over the valley below makes me feel like Moses viewing the Promised Land. Is it not beautiful?" "Yes it is beautiful, my son, but full of temptations. Should you pass through the whole of life and climb here in your old age and view it with the same feeling of work well done, then indeed you will have won the reward of Moses." He had heard her gentle words then and had passed them by with a careless remark—how could he fail—he heard them now, thundering, voluminous, shaking him very soon, and he threw himself down on the cool ferns.

The silence of the hillside shadows was deep and insistent, and gradually he felt its calming influence. The sun sank lower and lower, the air grew cooler, yet still Henderson seemed oblivious to all around him. By and by the sun hid itself behind the blue line of the distant range, the shadows merged into heavier gloom. Suddenly he sat up and turned his face across the valley to the faint glow in the west where the sun had gone.

In the fading light he arose and made his way toward the village. A deadly calm had driven from his mind the wild and luring fantasies. He must go to her and tell her all! Some little money she had, how much he knew not; he had never thought of it for years—never had he dreamed the time would come when he should have cause to call for it! Maybe at the sacrifice of their little home and her happiness, he could yet save himself.

He entered the village and hurried toward the little cottage among the oleanthers. Several times he avoided those whom he recognized in the pale light. The vigor of his step faltered as he passed up the walk. Slowly and with trembling hand he let himself into the hallway. There he paused in indecision. He knew she was sitting by the window, expectant, waiting with that unflinching patience that only a mother has. How could he face her! His hand rested on the knob. His heart thrilled and then seemed to pause in its labor as the low, soft tones of a hymn came out to him.

"What though thy inward lusts rebel;

'Tis but a struggling gasp for life;

The weapons of victorious grace

Shall slay thy sins, and end the strife."

His hand released the knob and he shrank back cowering. How he felt his sin now! All these years he had looked with condescension on her old-fashioned precepts and rules; her way of worship had seemed of the antique, her out of date hymns he had tolerated with a manifest sense of impatience. Now as he stood so far from out the fold, so far away from it all, their very simplicity scintillated with a grandeur that awed him. He knew he stood without the gates and that though he could almost have reached forth and touched her, a universe apart he felt just then. He could not face her now as she sat there in the window singing, often, even in happier days, he had hesitated to encroach upon the harmony of those strange communions.

He crept silently from the hall out again upon the street. Someway deep in his heart he longed to breathe a desire for aid. Impelled by some inward potent suggestion he strode back toward the business center of the village. His mind worked calm and fast. He thought of horrifying the sum, but feared it might arouse a suspicion that would lead to the investigation he wished to avoid. If he could only devise some plan whereby he might keep the knowledge of his position from his mother! He turned into the corridor of the post-office and unlocked his private box. Yes, there was a letter! He tore it open, glancing in a vague way at his name on the envelope. It seemed an unusually long and bulky affair. As his eyes rested on the contents he could scarcely repress a shout. In that second he felt that he was saved; in the few succeeding seconds his heart slowly hardened, the desire for appeal faded and the cold, self-sufficient poise regained itself. With scarcely more than a glance at the contents of the letter he strode away with a step vigorous and animated.

It was yet early, though no light showed about the cottage from the new window, still there by the western window. He opened the door and entered, calling softly, "Still up, mother?" In the dim light he saw her turn quickly and then came the eager, tender words.

"Yes, Jimmie—but you are late! so late I have been a little uneasy, my son. Your luck—"

"No mother, I want nothing to eat. I am sorry you were anxious. You see, mother, I am tired out." He laughed a little uneasily and continued, "I've had a great jaunt up the mountain. 'Twas such a nice day, I wanted to view the valley—look down from Pisgah lights."

"Was it still as beautiful, my son, as in the past?" Someway there was in her voice a note of inquiry mingling with the never-absent tenderness. He did not speak for a second, pondering on her words. Was it still as beautiful? Why, the tortures of the damned had beckoned to him from the dark again! "Was it still as beautiful?" she asked again, coming closer and laying a soft warm hand on him.

"Mother," said he, his voice trembling slightly, "I expect I am what you would call over-worked. It was a beautiful day but—but—" He paused for he feared to speak his thoughts. He felt the spiritual influence of her very presence and he knew from many years close contact, the discerning quality of his mother's intuition. "Mother, it did not look as beautiful as it has in times past, but you know we all have our off days." He paused again, for although he knew no question of hers would come to draw from him that which he did not freely give, he feared his weakness in her presence; and why should he cause her pain, now that he had the power to keep it all secret?

"Jimmie, our lives are not unlike a forest lake; for the most part it is placid and serene, but there are times when the winds rattle the surface, and again a fierce storm will lash it into fury, dissolving all trace of its calm beauty, and one looking upon it then must needs have faith to feel the assurance of the coming calm." How many times had he heard these words, how many times with such meaning—how many times had he really heard them? Never, until now!

"Mother, I have felt the first touch of the storm—I am poor of faith—yet I believe it will pass—and soon."

"So it is always in the Valley of Life, my son. The greater the victory, the greater has been the—she did not say the word for the lake drew him gently to him and kissed the trembling lips.

"I'll go now. In the morning I'll—I'll be myself again." He turned and groped his way slowly up the stairway to his room. He felt with elation that he had passed through it without ever having a suspicion of the great peril he had escaped, though her few words were so direct and suggestive. He closed the door softly yet a little hastily for he could hear the melancholy words of the song she was singing.

"The music of my heart is gone:
It cannot sing as once it sung.
For grief has murred its every tone,
And all its sweetest chords unstrung."

He turned with a smothered ejaculation on his lips, and petulantly drew down the window shade. There was something so irritable, so pregnant with direct insinuation in the wording of those old lyrics! Had he confessed to her his straight, she could not have selected one with more potent meaning.

He lighted the lamp and drew a sigh of relief as he seated himself by his table. His hand trembled as he took the contents from the envelope. Several legal looking documents, a letter, and two bank drafts that bore on them the face of that great cavalry leader, Phil Sheridan. It was the back pension of his long dead father, coming to the widow after all these years. It had come at a most opportune moment for him! He would use the money for his salvation and later, when he could replace it, he would give her the letter and she need never know of the ignominy he had escaped or the heartaches that had passed her by.

For a long time he sat, staring with aching eyes into the long past. Memories of his father came to him. He remembered the invalid soldier, his long suffering from an old wound, and his final death. How proud he had always been of that hero father—proud of his uniform, of the captain's straps on the coat, won for bravery on the field—proud of the saber he had so often strapped about his own waist while yet his arm was too weak to hold it forth! Involuntarily he now raised his eyes to where it hung above the mantel.

The hours wore on. The rasping discordant note of a cricket in some unknown quarter, the call of a night bird far out in the copse, and the regular tick-tock of the old clock only served to emphasize the deep, impressive silence. Gradually the disturbing element in his thoughts took form, stubbornly his old self gave ground. Could he use this money—blood money it seemed to him now, coming from off the field of battle—without trait from the grave? It was her heritage, and his—but it would be a pollution to use it for his sins, and without her knowledge! If she only knew! But to give her that knowledge might possibly kill her and wound him for life. The words he had so often heard from her in youth, "An open confession is good for the soul," came to him but his pride still rebelled, yet he could not keep down the feeling of degradation, the deep remorse that the thought of using the money conjured. Vaguely at times he wondered if his father had ever to fight such battles—if any had fought thus. The valley of his life was indeed storm-bound—where could he resurrect the Faith to combat this storm and to await a calming peace? Where? But to the Mount of Oblivion! He bowed his head and wept, softly, quietly; no quivering sob, no convulsions of sorrow, but a gentle weeping, almost soothing grief; it caressed it, fondled him, and through it all stood out vivid and inspiring, the picture of his mother sitting in the rocker by the window—the anxious smile, the entrancing caress. He had passed it all by so long with dignitant courtesy, but it now fell upon his soul fostered by the cumulative strength of years.

"No," he breathed softly, "mother, I'll stay in the Valley!" He sat up with a gesture of defiance. The clock slowly twanged the hour once. The dawn was stealing in through the blind.

How often he had waited and watched that morning light come creeping in, forewarned by that old clock! He watched it now as then, revealing the room in changing and intermittent installments. As it fell on the old clock he remembered, how he would wait for that warning click that came before the stroke, the long, sonorous chimes, the final chuckle of content as it continued on in the infinitude of the future; as the light crept up the walls revealing the medley of flower-filled urns that he thinned the wallpaper, he remembered how in his boyish mind he had tried to disentangle them; as it grew stronger, it showed the picture of the immortal Washington in its cheap frame; it glimmered on the war saber of his father, then it lit up the picture of the wondrous Christ standing and blessing the little children. How often in those silent days, now almost passed from memory, had he lain there looking at that picture, marvelling with a sense of awe if he would be among those that were blessed! He brushed his hands across his eyes at the thought.

In that instant he saw himself for the first time clearly. Clad in a false and tarnished armor of worldly pride he had essayed with impotent effort to withstand the immutable law of Right! His motto "advance at any cost" was trailing in the dust. Barriers hitherto brushed aside by custom and modern devices, now bade him pause. He was no longer the heralded knight but the nameless churl. He felt the call of the supreme surrender! Yes, he would tell her all, he would yield himself wholly to the power of her homely justice. He no longer feared to act, rather he longed to unburden his soul; somehow as he drew the mantle of truth around him, the power to face the world grew strong. Without her knowledge he could not, he would not use this money so miraculously thrown in his way. He would go to her at once. Whatever the path she marked out, he would follow. He arose with a gesture of decision.

Mechanically he took from the table the papers, and carefully replaced them in the envelope. Mechanically also, he read his name on its face. What was there so familiar about that hand-writing—and the stamp and the post-mark!—He turned it over and over and over with distrustful eyes—why, it bore no foreign post-office—it had been dropped in the village post-office! It was her writing! "Mother—Mother!" he groaned in the misery of his soul. He saw, he realized all now—she suspected his situation, she knew by that mother's intuition! She had received these papers unknown to him and had given them to him in his extremity—waiting, wondering, praying for him! For a time he stood numb and bewildered, then came a step, a light tap and then the well-known words, "Jimmie, are you up?"

"Mother, come!" he called. She entered, smiling on him fondly. Her quick eyes saw all at a glance.

"Mother," said he slowly, still holding the envelope, "I did not know you sent this—till now. I was coming to tell you all."

"I know, or almost know, Jimmie!" She held out her hands to him, her face working in little convulsive quivers as she tried to be calm. He drew her to him in a caress that meant years of untasted happiness.

"Mother," said he brokenly, "I've been through the storm!"

"Jimmie, we must all encounter them—none escape. Yet now I am glad—glad, Jimmie!"

"I'll rest a little now, mother, and then we will again go up on the mountain."

"Will the valley appear as beautiful, my son?" said she smiling through her tears.

"I'm sure it will, mother," said he. She turned away, her face radiant with a fulfilled hope. Henderson threw open the blind, letting in the glory of the new-born day. He looked across to where the green sides of the mountain reflected the golden touch of the morning. A deep, serene calm seemed to pervade the valley, it entered his soul. Mingling with the notes of the awakening birds came the voice of his mother in joyous anthem:

THE WORK OF

Allen's Press Clipping Bureau

FOR PUBLIC MEN

Allen's Press Clipping Bureau has now had experience in six National and five State Campaigns. In this time it has had the honor of serving hundreds of public men, including members of the Cabinet, U. S. Senators, Congressmen, Governors, State Legislators, Assemblymen, Mayors, and State and County Central Committees.

It has aided these men by bringing them quickly, easily, and cheaply, what the entire press has to say of them or the measures in which they are interested.

A thorough clipping service discloses the state and trend of public opinion, brings to attention false charges that should be denied, true charges that should be parried; shows what editors need argument, and what editors need encouragement.

In short, aids in handling the most powerful and important of political weapons, the Press.

Having three offices, a staff of thirty people, and reading 2,000 choice papers per week, we have now unsurpassed facilities for very high grade and thorough work.

We can cover counties, districts, the State, or the Pacific States.

Rates will be furnished on application.

PERSONALIA

Speaker Joe Cannon once clerked in a grocery store.

Senator Beveridge was in turn a farm boy, "lumber jack," and book agent.

Caruso has signed a contract for a tour of England at $10,000 a week salary.

George Meredith declares that the poet Rossetti died of too little exercise and too much ham-and-eggs for breakfast.

John Muir has rewritten his famous dog-story, "Stiiken," and it has just been published as a book by the Houghton, Mifflin Company.

Dr. William Horace Day, pastor of the First Congregational church, Los Angeles, has been chosen president of Pomona College, at Claremont.

Thomas Hardy last week said of Poe that he was "the first to realize to the full the possibilities of the English language in rhyme and alliteration."

Witty Bernard Shaw said the other day, when illness prevented his keeping a public engagement, "Inform the public that I am dead. It will save a great deal of trouble."

The late Rear-Admiral Coghlan's widow will be compelled to work for a living unless Congress raises her pension from $50 a month, which is the niggardly allowance it has made.

King Edward recently announced at a dinner that the Queen of Spain has bet the Prince of Wales a fan that she will have a larger family than the Princess, who now has six children.

Eleanor Gates, the author of "The Plowman" and "Cupid," is engaged in the business of breeding pure-blooded Arabian horses in the Santa Cruz Mountains. Her writing is a side issue.

The author of "Helen's Babies" is still living. More than that, he has written a sequel to that classic, called "Budge and Toddie." Who wrote "Helen's Babies," anyhow? Oh, yes: John Habberton.

Madame Schumann-Heink has refused to sing the part of Clytemnestra in Richard Strauss' "Elektra" in Berlin if the author insists upon having live bulls on the stage in one scene. She has to wear a red robe, which adds to her alarm.

Ernest Thompson-Seton recently made a plea for the mercy of the court for a trained nurse, formerly employed in his household, who pleaded guilty to grand larceny in the second degree in taking a patient's rings from a trunk to try them on.

Grace Luce Irwin (Mrs. Wallace Irwin), of San Francisco and New York, has written a story of theatrical life in the latter city. Titled "Elektra" in Berlin if the author insists upon having live bulls on the stage in one scene. She has to wear a red robe, which adds to her alarm.

The first volume of the collected works of Ambrose Bierce will be published between now and the first of next month by the Neale Publishing Company. The set will be completed in ten large octavo volumes. It is edited and arranged by Mr. Bierce, and each volume will contain an introduction from the pen of some distinguished man or woman of letters.

Madame Tetravanni made a hit in San Francisco music halls years before London provided her the greatest coloratura soprano in the world. She is superstitious, and carries many small crucifixes given her in the various Italian cities in which she has sung in a little chamois bag hung about her neck in order to preserve the marvelous purity of her birdlike voice. She also thinks that it is good luck to see a hunchback going along on the street. A man hunchback, however; never a woman.

SHEAR WIT

"My boy, do you know the nature of an oath?" "Yes, sir; we got a parrot."—Houston Post.

Mr. Shyboy: "Have you—have you ever been kissed?" Miss Wise: "Gracious! Do I look as homely as that?"—Syracuse Herald.

The reason a woman wants to have her husband's name in the paper is so she can ask him for a new dress and get it.—Chicago News.

One of the Friends: "Pardon me, sire, but why do they call you Satan?" His Diabolical Majesty: "Oh, that's just an Old Nick name."—Cleveland Leader.

A cable from London says the Queen opens and reads all of King Edward's letters. What does it avail a man to be a King?—Chicago Record-Herald.

"What is the price of that fine big range?" "That is $95. Isn't she a beauty?" "Yes. Gimme a nickel's worth of stove polish."—Poughkeepsie News-Press.

Mother: "Samuel, where are those green apples that I left in the pantry?" Samuel: "They're with the Jamaica ginger that was in the medicine chest."—Lippincott's.

"Don't all those papers make you tired?" the kind hearted gentleman asked the newsboy. "Nope," the mite cheerfully replied, "I can't read."—Youth's Companion.

"I thought your son was going into a lawyer's office to study." "No; he has decided to practice the Unwritten Law; it's the least expensive course."—The Green Bag.

Those burglars who tried to rob Tom Lawson took long chances. If Mr. Lawson had caught them he might have sold them Bay State Gas or Yukon.—New York World.

Washington was crossing the river on the ice. "I do hope that history won't confuse me with 'Oliver,'" he cried. Here with he had the painting executed to nail it.—New York Sun.

"What part of the service is this?" whispered the belated mourner at the funeral of a lawyer friend. "I've just come myself," was the answer, "but I believe they've opened for the defense."—Ohio Law Bulletin.

"I took in $2 just now," said the first promoter. "Good enough," declared the second promoter. "Shall we issue additional stock to correspond with our increased capital, or shall we have lunch?"—Puck.

"So you have broken your engagement to Charley Nipperson?" "Yes. I simply couldn't stand for his slang. Why, the line of bunk that he handed out was so fuzzy that he had me going half the time."—Chicago Record-Herald.

"You say that local option has been of great benefit to this section of the country?" "Yes, sir," answered Colonel Stillwell. "As soon as a lot of us citizens realized how far anybody would have to go for a drink we organized a good roads movement."—Washington Star.

"Are you really a bishop?" "Yes, I am—really," answered the amused prelate. "Well, I don't believe it," returned the candid 8-year-old daughter of his chess-playing host, "cos I've watched you ever since you came, and your head isn't split down the middle, and you don't walk comeways."—Fry's Magazine.

"Say, do you see the chromo over there in the blue dress?" asked the man of one standing next to him at a dance. "Yes," replied the one addressed, with interest. "Let me give you a tip. Don't dance with her; she walked all over my feet." "No, I'm not likely to. She's my wife."—Yonkers Statesman.

A general superintendent of a western railroad wrote his state solicitor that he believed shipments of liquor were being handled as baggage at certain stations in that Prohibition state and asked how he could break up the practice. The solicitor answered, "Hang on; you do other baggage."—The Green Bag.

("The Valley of Life"—Concluded)

"Sing of the wonders of that love Which angels play on every chord."
"Yes," breathed Henderson softly, "the valley is surely beautiful."

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

The Senate of the United States.

The framers of our constitution intended to make the Senate the stronghold of aristocracy and the protector of the property interests of the country. They succeeded, at least as to wealth, which has been entrenched in that body from the day of its organization.

This is somewhat less true of such a semblance of an aristocracy as a country that does not sanction peerages and other appurtenances to royalty can maintain. Prior to the Civil War the American aristocracy was clearly definable. It consisted of a few first families in all the Atlantic states from Maine to Florida, with scattering branches as far west as the Mississippi, but after the war there were so many new states created, and these new states sent to the Senate so many men who had no other claim to distinction than that which suddenly acquired wealth gave them, that the aristocracy of the Senate suffered degradation in quality and character. Another source of degradation, moral as well as social, was the election of corporation attorneys to the Senate the better to represent special and predatory interests whose general retainers they held.

Nevertheless the Senate has been and still is the stronghold of wealth and privilege in our government. It was frankly modeled after the British House of Lords and senators would have been given life terms had the convention not felt assured that the constitution would not be ratified by the people if life terms were given. It was the intent of the framers of the constitution to make the Senate the strategic factor in government, and it was therefore given power to confirm or reject appointments to office. The making of treaties can only be done by the co-operation of the executive officer with the Senate, and it sits as a court in trials for impeachment.

The Senate has ever been jealous for its prerogatives. It has constantly and injuriously encroached upon executive functions. It has construed "advice and consent" to the making of appointments into giving it power to dictate what appointments shall be made, and it has advanced its participation in treaty making to a point where its committee on foreign relations virtually assumes to take the power of making treaties out of the hands of the president. It is not democratic in its instincts. It gives precedence to time of service rather than to ability. Its courtesies are elevated into established conventions and it lords it over the lower house, as much as it dares, in the belief that the House of Representatives is lower in rank and so plebeian in origin as to smother it and be regarded.

And yet public issues are more adequately discussed in the Senate than in the House. It acts with less haste and does, in fact, withstand the evil effects of some of those popular waves of feeling that the framers of our constitution were so fearful might sweep government into the vortex of disorder and revolution.

The subservience of the Senate to, or partiality for, great, and often predatory, financial interests has caused the general public to be desirous of making it more immediately answerable to public sentiment. To this end there has come to be a popular demand to have senators elected by the people directly instead of very indirectly through state legislatures. The Senate has persistently refused to do its part toward substituting a constitutional amendment to that effect to the people for ratification. It wants to hold itself as little responsible to the people as possible and, in taking this view, it is only following out the intention of the makers of the constitution.

We, the People, are therefore striving to accomplish by indirection what the Senate prevents our doing by direct amendment of the constitution. Efforts were made, first, to advise legislatures whom to elect to the Senate through resolutions adopted by state conventions. Second, by advising legislatures through direct primary elections. Finally,

Oregon has gone so far as to exact pledges from candidates for the legislature, with what result is fresh in the public mind. It is not impossible that the Senate may head off this method by refusing to recognize the credentials of one elected that way as being subversive of constitutional methods. If these methods fail of their purpose the only recourse will be another constitutional convention demanded by the legislatures of two-thirds of the states of the Union. If such a convention is held the Senate will come out from thence much less the citadel of property and aristocracy than it now is or than the framers of the constitution intended that it should be.

The rise of the common man has not been brought to a halt. Public sentiment will find a way of making the United States Senate subject to its desires, but until something is devised that will register the purpose of the people better than a delegate convention the election of senators may as well remain with the legislatures.

Do You Hear Well?

The Stolz Electrophone—A New, Electrical, Scientific and Practical Invention for those who are Deaf or Partially Deaf.

MAY NOW BE TESTED IN YOUR OWN HOME.

Deaf or partially deaf people now may make a trial of the Stolz Electrophone at home. This personal, practical test serves to prove that the device satisfies, with ease, every requirement of a perfect hearing device.

This new invention renders unnecessary such clumsy, unsightly and frequently harmful devices as trumpets, horns, tubes, ear drums, fans, etc. It is a tiny electric telephone that fits on the ear and which, the instant it is applied, magnifies the sound waves in such manner as to cause an astonishing increase in the clearness of all sounds, and overcomes the buzz and roaring of noises and, also, so constantly and electrically exercises the vital parts of the ear that, usually, the natural unaided hearing sense is gradually restored.

THE PLEDGE OF CITIZENSHIP

I, a citizen of the United States of America, realizing that a free Republic is an impossibility unless the citizen performs his civic duty, hereby pledge myself upon my sacred honor never to fail to exercise my right of citizenship by voting at every election, primary or secondary, wherever it is possible and legal for me to render that service to my country, my health permitting me so to do.

In taking this pledge it is distinctly understood that I in no way obligate myself to vote for any particular party, any definite candidate or any certain measure. I am binding myself only to my Country, and pledging myself solely to the faithful performance of the duty I owe to her as a citizen.

WHY TAKE THE FOREGOING PLEDGE?

Those taking the foregoing pledge, signing and sending it to this office, will be enrolled upon The California Weekly's "School for Citizenship," which will be a permanent feature of this paper. It will entitle the person sending in his name to have answered, either through the columns of the paper or by letter, an rational question he may have concerning public affairs, and, generally, by the person best equipped to afford the desired information. It will also entitle the signer to such special literature bearing upon the obligations and opportunities of good citizenship as may from time to time be issued. While this pledge is open to persons of all ages it is especially desired that it be taken and sent in by young men lately become voters or who will cast their first votes two years hence. It will take but a moment to clip out the pledge, sign, enclose in an envelope, stamp and address to "School for Citizenship," office The California Weekly, 26 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, and it opens the way for a liberal education in citizenship.

TWO GREAT MEN.

The world commemorated this week the centennial anniversary of two of the greatest men who ever lived—Abraham Lincoln and Charles Darwin—both born, the one in the wilderness, to ignorance and poverty, and the other at the center of the world's learning, to ease and opportunity, on the same day, February 12, 1809. We may assume, perhaps, that without either of these men, the work of each would somehow have been done. But the wreck of the unfinished part of Lincoln's work, after his death, shows that genius is not so plentiful a thing in the world as always to be at hand when needed. The man who does a great work, even in the fullness of time, is entitled to the glory of that work. And what would the world be to-day, without the work of these two men? What would American citizenship mean to-day if what is now this nation were split up into as many units as it could have developed discordant sectionalisms part at least of them based either on human slavery or on the final wreck and decay of that institution? In the light of what we now contemplate, the alternative is almost unthinkable. Similarly, what would be the mental environment of the intelligent man of to-day if Darwin, or some one, had not given the conception of unity to all living creatures? No such change had come into the perspective of life since Copernicus decentralized the cosmos. It is not so much what Darwin taught us to think about the origin of species, as a scientific problem, as the new way he and the other evolutionary thinkers taught us to look at all questions. There is not a question of law, or religion, or medicine, or politics, or teaching, or family discipline, or house-building, or morals, or dress, or personal taste, or social etiquette, which has not taken new form and meaning since Darwin wrote, and because he wrote. To have thus contributed a new foundation to all the thinking of men is a service which it has been given to scarcely a dozen men to render, since the world began.

Abraham Lincoln stands alone in the affections of the American people, and shares only with Washington in their reverence. When Grant said of him that his fame "will ever grow brighter as time passes and his great work is better understood," he may have supposed that he was speaking from the far perspective of history. But the prediction is already fulfilled, while many of the generation still live that personally experienced the bitterness of the terrible war. Over the memories of that conflict the spirit of Lincoln still broods, the only thing connected with it that no one wishes to forget; the soul of the only man, in that dark time, great enough to fight for the Cause without losing his understanding of those who fought for the other cause. The great work of Lincoln is understood already. And the splendid personality of the man who rose from the people to lead the people; who from illiterate antecedents became a supreme artist in words; who in the fire of a moral enthusiasm never forgot a sanity which ranked even with Washington's;

the man of wit and melancholy; the lovely genius and genial democrat, who never forgot a friend and never did a favoritism for one; whose ungainly figure and homely face seem more than beautiful, transfigured by the love of his countrymen—that personality stands without a rival among all the characters which adorned the greatest century in history.

It is of course only a coincidence that the birth of two such dissimilar men as Lincoln and Darwin came on the same day, and only that accident brings us to consider them together. But the story of the final popular recognition of both is so similar as to be almost more than a coincidence. During the very years that Lincoln was misunderstood and hated by the unenlightened part of the population, in one section of this country, as the destroyer of their homes and institutions, men all over this country and England were being expelled from churches and avoided, as tainted with brimstone, for having perceived earlier than their neighbors the now universally accepted truths taught by Darwin. Time and science have added much to the discoveries of Darwin, and subtracted from his theories a little. But the bigotry which made acceptance of the doctrine impossible, before his time, and was its chief obstacle for many years thereafter, is now dispelled forever. It is a new intellectual as well as political world, in which Truth and Freedom no longer have to be fought for—both are axioms.

TRIBUTE OF IMITATION.

Perhaps the most striking tribute to the moral wave of this time of civic revival is the sudden infection of morality in the ranks of the unmoral. Watch Grove Johnson reform, with his Sunday-closing bills, and reprehension of the virtue of department stores. Watch the political machine, tripping over its own toes in its haste to give all the superficial good government it dares. Watch the Royal Arch, closing its own dives in Bakersfield. Watch the wide-open faction in Santa Cruz, stemming the tide of prohibition with high-license and no-gambling measures. And watch the threat of the race-track sympathizers, in the legislature, to pass what they regard as "blue laws," in the hope to disgust the people with an overdose. It is an orgie of "reform," not all of it sincere, but most of it practically useful, even when it is not genuine.

The "blue-law" threat, though, shows a curious mental backwardness. It belongs to the former age of a decade ago, when Sunday-closed saloons sought revenge by closing down the milk-wagons, too. The saloons have long passed that stage of stupidity. Now they are opposing prohibition with genuine reform; themselves imposing the restrictions they so resented only a few years ago, and making a belated effort to make their business in fact what they had always claimed it to be in principle, legitimate and respectable. They have learned that the temperance movement is serious and permanent, and that their salvation lies not in opposing it, but in falling in with it. If the race-track touts, and the political reactionists generally, had as much sense and moral perception as the barkeepers have developed, we should see the performers conducting their reforms with more virsimilitude.

President Jordan would have admission to college fraternities depend upon success in class work rather than upon failure, thus reversing all precedents and turning backward the tide of tendency. Isn't nature to have any opportunity to run wild at Stanford?

If Miss Jane Brownlee, of Toledo, now in San Francisco pushing her "cause" to the fore, has devised a practical method of teaching morals to children in the public schools, she has proven herself easily the premier benefactress of the new century. When she has developed a plan that will inevitably make her pupils keen to discern and appreciate right from wrong in all situations the next step should be to raise the compulsory education age from fourteen to sixty and enforce the law.

There are 93,000 dependent children in all of the institutions of the United States. California's proportion of such children is probably higher than that of any other state in the Union.

FARMERS, MAGNIFY YOUR CALLING.

There is, seemingly, no department of American life, no factor in American industry, no trend of American sentiment, no tendency in American affairs, that has not been under observation by Theodore Roosevelt during his occupancy of the presidential chair. The Russian peasant speaks of the Czar as the "Little Father," and fondly feels that his welfare will be looked out for by the autocratic head of the Russian nation. How misplaced that confidence has been the current history of Russia shows, but if ever any executive head of a nation was entitled to be looked to as an elder brother, if not a father, it is the present executive head of our nation. And he has done this neither paternally nor patronizingly. His latest message to Congress, relating to American country life, is characteristic of him. It is plain and homely, sound and true, and it deserves to be read and pondered at every American fireside, in country or town.

At the outset he puts his finger on the sore spot in American country life. Farmers have not magnified their calling. Despite the complimentary platitudes which office-seeking politicians have poured out upon their devoted heads, or because of them, the farmers of America have come to look down upon their occupation. They have looked upon themselves as bondservants to their farms. They have confessed that they farmed because they did not know anything else to do and, even though they grew rich at it, they have looked upon their station as socially inferior and therefore undesirable. This has sent their sons and daughters to the cities in droves.

This disposed of the President points out the three particulars in which farming in America needs to be bettered, and he warns the farmers that the government is not to do these things for them, but only to show how they may be done. The first is better farming. This the agricultural colleges are teaching. The University of Wisconsin has taken its whole agricultural department into the homes of the people of Wisconsin, and the agricultural schools of other states can do the same thing if the farmers will show an interest in having it done. It has added $20,000,000 a year to the productivity of the farms of Wisconsin and can do equally well in any other state.

The second requirement is better business. Farming is as much a business as carriage making, keeping a store or a bank, and needs business methods as certainly. The agricultural schools, the high schools, and even the grammar schools, can teach what needs to be known of business methods on the farm.

Finally, and more important perhaps than either of the other needs, is that of learning how to make life upon the farm a social and an intellectual life. Farming needs to be a learned pursuit. It challenges knowledge at every stroke of the hoe, every turn of the furrow, and the wonder is that farming has not been the most intellectual of pursuits. It can be made such and the schools of the country must help so to make it. The President's message to the farmers of America is a valuable state paper and likely to be productive of valuable results.

DIVIDE AND CONQUER.

Nearly every great commander has a favorite method of attack or defense, and can use no other with equal success. With Alexander it was the phalanx, with Napoleon it was striking the center en echelon, with Grant it was turning the flank of his enemy back upon himself and enveloping the whole in confusion. With William F. Herrin it is dividing the opposition and making common cause with one of the divisions. He is at his old tricks.

The Lincoln-Roosevelt movement commanded the attention and respect of the moral element in the life of California, and that element, once thoroughly lined up and aroused into action, will control the state. Therefore it must be divided and common cause made with one faction. With which faction the head of the Southern Pacific's political bureau expects to coalesce is not at this time absolutely known, but the likelihood is that it will be with the extreme faction, the faction which, if allowed to have its way, will undo by over-doing. The members of that faction will be children in his hands, but if he can get them into his camp, or get himself into their camp, which will amount to the same thing, he may be able to convince a portion of the people that the Lincoln-Roosevelts have no monopoly of righteousness, no copyright on great moral ideas.

What sort of a moralist this cunning commander is is well exemplified in the enactment of the anti-race-track gambling bill. His "organization" took no part for or against it. "Hands-off," was promised and the promise was kept, with what result is now subject for public gratulation. This form of virtue is not positive in character, but it must have taken a good deal to screw the master of the "organization" to the sticking point, for there can hardly be a doubt, had any California legislature in ten years been left to follow its own instincts unhampered, it would have snuffed out that iniquity as decisively as it did last week. The reason that it was not snuffed out was that the "organization" took it under its protection and added it to the cohorts of redlight districts, deadfalls, battalions of political odd-jobs men and whatever else of moral tatterdemalio goes to make up the personnel of the "organization" push in California politics.

The danger to true reform now is that the "performers" will deliberately overdo the reformatory work with the double purpose of dividing the moral forces of California into two camps and so over-doing good as to cause it to fail of making good. That policy has the merit of acuteness and it has won victory for villainy upon many a well-fought battlefield. Look out for it.

NOT A WET WEATHER PROBLEM.

The reader's attention is called to an article elsewhere in this issue, from the pen of Mr. Rufus Jennings, dealing with the Sacramento reclamation problem. If there are those who have not kept pace with the working out of this problem Mr. Jennings' article will fetch them up to date.

It has been noted that the sound of rain falling on the roof of the Protectors Exchange building in San Francisco was sufficient without a word of advice as to whether or not rain was falling anywhere else, to depress the grain market a number of points. In the upper San Joaquin valley, where agriculture without irrigation is a failure, a stiff drizzle has been found sufficient to so dampen an irrigation meeting as to take all the enthusiasm out of it. We are a people of moods and tenses, of whimsicalities of mind and infirmities of purpose, which is but saying that we are human, yet except we rise above our ordinary selves we shall not solve the problem of the regulation of our rivers and the reclamation of our interior lowlands.

This is no wet weather problem. It is a problem whose solution must be pressed through dry years and wet in the full knowledge that the extraordinary will come to pass and that occasionally there will be the extraordinary to deal with. At Red Bluff the Sacramento has made a new high-water record two feet above what was ever known before, bridges regarded as safe are gone and new areas have been flooded. To say that it will never occur again is folly. The lumbermen on the headwaters of the Sacramento and Pitt can safely enter into a contract with the valley folk to give them new high-water records indefinitely. Their unhindered slashings and burnings of the forests will insure it.

Yet there are tens of thousands of home-lunners waiting for these lowlands to be reclaimed that food may be produced for millions to consume. It is a man's task and should nerve all legislators, executives, financiers, farmers, as well as those who have no other interest than the common welfare, to pour forth their best energies for the regulation of our rivers and the reclamation of flooded lands. It can be accomplished. The power that harnessed the lightnings and made them obedient can harness the waters and make them obedient, not by piece-meal or patch-work. To deal successfully with this problem the power that would cope with it must say to the owner of timber when and how his trees may be cut, and to the land owner when, how and where his levees must be built. At the risk of individual hardship the common good must be subserved. It is a problem that The California Weekly will not lose sight of, and if it presses it upon public attention with seeming iteration, in dry times as well as wet, it will be because of a firm conviction that the problem can be solved and must be. The greatness of California and the happiness of tens of thousands depend upon it.

A FOOL'S PARADISE.

There are those who would have us believe that all that is needed to bring peace on earth and end wars among nations is for the United States to make junk out of its battlements, obliterate its fortifications, disband its soldiers and say to the world: "Let us have peace." De-lightful! But take a look at the status of this world in which our nation lives. Great Britain has a navy as great as any other two nations and 10 per cent margin to go on. Germany and France each have 600,000 men under arms and navies equal to our own, besides 2,000,000 trained men each in reserve. Japan has 500,000 trained men virtually under arms and a navy equal to our own, besides half a million more trained men in reserve. Russia has reorganized its army on a peace footing of 1,200,000 men at arms and is rebuilding a navy. Does it look reasonable that, surrounded by great nations bristling with bayonets and armor-plated battlements, it would be safe for Uncle Sam to forget how to fight? And can we forget the volatile quality of our own population? No, the policy of the big stick behind the back and the olive branch held out in front, the one we have been pursuing, is wisest and safest.

Plenty of Reasons Why.

During her war with Russia Japan sold her bonds to foreign countries to the amount of $540,000,000, and these bonds, owing to the good rate of interest they return, were largely bought in the United States. Here, then, are 540,000,000 reasons why our country wants to get on peacefully with Japan and they are all good reasons, too. There are several million more reasons just as good.

The Gould Roads Looking Up.

It has been an open secret for several years that the Gould railroads were about the worst kept up of any railroads in the country and Wall street began to look upon their securities as being in no better shape than their roadbeds and rolling stock, but later reports show an improved condition. What is of especial interest to California is that $17,500,000 bonds needed for the completion of the Western Pacific have been sold, a substantial indication that the Gould enterprises are looking up.

Supervision of Bond and Stock Issues.

The work of public service commissions in limiting the issue of corporation stock and bonds is something of which we hear little in the West, but in Massachusetts and New York this is becoming an important factor. During 1908 public service companies in the district of which New York city is the center asked permission to issue $155,000,000 of bonds and stocks, but the commission allowed the issue of only $70,000,000. New York is looking elsewhere for its water supply.

The Passing of a Great Opportunity.

A year ago any one who had ready money (that the banks didn't have locked up) to invest could buy the best railroad and industrial stocks at prices which made it possible to get 10, 12 or even 13 per cent. interest, but in the last twelve months money and confidence have returned to their former channels to such a degree that it is possible to make only about 5 per cent. on railroad stock, and 8 per cent. on sound industrial stocks. Good municipal bonds are selling on as low a basis as 3 per cent.

They Are Not Suffering.

Mladison C. Peters is a clergyman and not a financier or statistician, but what he says about the overrated wealth of the Jews in America may be as true as it is interesting. There are over 5,000 millionaires in the United States, according to Mr. Peters, but not to exceed 200 bear Jewish names. In New York city, where one person in every four is a Jew, the millionaires number 1,200, but only 110 of them are Jewish. But Jews run about all the big department stores, and they command a wholesale trade of $1,000,000,000 a year and hold real estate to the extent of $900,000,000. Though the Jewish people may not be as rich as popularly supposed we may rest assured that they are not suffering for any of the good things that fall to the lot of others in this western world.

The Railroad Demonstration Car.

The work the Southern Pacific Railroad company is furthering, by sending the professors of the Agricultural Department of the University of California, and other experts, through the state giving short addresses and object lessons on how to make farming successful, is worthy of all praise. It is the sort of enlightened selfishness that blesses those who possess it and those who are the objects of it. It has both the quality of mercy and of good sense.

If So Why So?

In the new great dry dock at Mare Island is going to be accessible to the great battle-ships of Uncle Sam's navy, then why has Uncle Sam given Mr. Chas. M. Schwab such assurances of patronage for his million dollar dry-dock, to be constructed in San Francisco, as to warrant the investment? It is to be hoped that the floods brought down by the interior rivers are not so depositing their sediment in the channel from deep water to Mare Island docks as to fill up that channel as often as it is cleared out, but if they are doing this whose fault is it that this was not foreseen in advance of the expending of so many millions at that point?

Outlawing the Trusts.

The decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of the Continental Wall Paper company vs. Voight & Sons of Cincinnati, has not attracted the attention it merits. The plaintiff paper company is a trust, confessedly so, and is doing business in contravention of the Sherman anti-trust law. The court held (by a majority of one, however) that the wall paper trust was an outlaw and had no right of action against its debtors in the courts of this land. Once establish the principle that a trust is beyond the protection of the law and there will soon be no trusts. They cannot survive without it. The principle of outlawry of those who disobey the law is a good one to lay down, only it would have been better in this case if Brewer, White, Peckham and Holmes had not dissented from the majority opinion.

Mr. Harriman and the Flag.

Mr. Harriman is quoted as having delivered himself of a touching apostrophe to the American flag. The incident is believable. Why should not Mr. Harriman love the American flag? Why should not Mr. Rockefeller? It has winked at them slyly from many a tall staff while they were gathering other men's dollars into their pockets by agencies which the flag condemns. It winked at Mr. Harriman while he was looting the Alton. It winked at Mr. Rockefeller while his great group was crushing out opposition in certain portions of the country and recouping the loss by charging other portions more than a fair price for its commodities. If there are those who are restrained in their enthusiasm for the flag they are not to be looked for among those who have become richer and more powerful under its protection than kings.

The Cooper-Carmack Trial.

The case of the People of Tennessee against Cooper and son, for the murder of former Senator Carmack, however it may fare before a jury, is likely enough to produce at least one good result. It may make the chivalry of the South see itself as others see it. The street duel is an absurd and wicked survival of a by-gone age and nothing will stop it so quick as hanging a few fine gentlemen for participation in it. If this cannot be accomplished the next best thing is to caricature the notion of honor that this particular form of murder stands for. Ridicule sometimes has more potency than law or religion.

American Goods In France.

France is also revising its tariffs and it is doing it, so far as the parliamentary committee having the task in hand is concerned, in a spirit of hostility to American products in French markets. It will be remembered that President Roosevelt, through John A. Kasson, made reciprocity treaties with France which the United States Senate rejected, at which action France took no little umbrage and her tariff committee is now raising duties on such products as come from America about 20 per cent., while leaving duties on similar goods coming from European countries increased only 5 per cent. It will be a hard blow to us if it really hits.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

It was Zoroaster, some 4,000 years ago, who said: "Reflection is the path to life, thoughtlessness, to death," and it is as true now as it was then, as true of nations as of men. Thoughtlessness is heedless and heedlessness is blundering and blundering brings disaster and disaster terminates in death with half a life lived and little joy had.

France is the banking nation of the world, and it has come to be so through the saving habits of the French people. The Frenchman puts by something every day, week, month, year of his life, saves some little out of his earnings; a wise monetary system makes these little available for enterprise, and so France can lend the rest of the world something like a billion dollars a year. The French people have found thoughtfulness the path to life, for the French live well. They are the best cooks in the world. They set the fashion for dress. They cultivate art and the drama. Their language is the language of diplomacy and polite society the world over, their architecture is repeated in many lands and their love for France is not excelled by that of "The hill men for their hills." The French have found reflection the path to a very enjoyable life.

The greatest benefit conferred by President Roosevelt upon the country he has so ably served for seven years has been his calling attention to the need for conserving our national resources. We of America have thrown away each year more than the French nation has saved. We have not reflected upon the ultimate consequences of our industrial policies. We have been heedless and blundering and have suffered disaster of our own producing and, unless we mend our ways, those who come after us will perish as miserably as the miserable people of Nineveh and Babylon, of the Pharaohs, of the Nile and Euphrates, of the bones of saved millions that whitened the Mesopotamian plain.

But conservation of resources is not merely a national problem. It is an individual problem as well. A spendthrift people will make a spendthrift nation and a nation cannot be made conservative of its resources unless the people who go to make up that nation are conservative of their resources. The policy of conservation, to be effective for good, must begin at the cradle and end only at the grave. This does not mean living hard, scrimped and meagre lives. It means living full and well rounded lives with an anchor always to windward to hold fast to in the event of a storm. A great proportion of the population of England is within ninety days of being dependent upon charity. It is not so in France, yet the Britisher is conservative compared with the American.

The greatness of America depends upon the conservation of the resources of this continent, but the greatness of Americans depends upon the conservation of the energies and substance of the individual man, woman and child. Except the idea of conservation takes such hold upon the imagination and enthusiasms of individual Americans as the idea of saving takes hold of the mind of the Frenchman, or cleanliness of the minds of the people of Holland the fate of India, of China, of Egypt and Assyria awaits the America of not three centuries hence. The press of population against the power of subsistence will pinch hard in this country within the lives of babies born in 1909. Is it no concern of ours what befalls 1909 babies? Is it not the supreme concern? They are our babies or our children's, in which case we love them the more. To the manager of a corporation, bent on paying big dividends, this is a sentimentalism to be it. No truth has value until transformed into sentiment.

THE WORLD AT LARGE

International Conservation Conference.

In another week there will meet at the White House, in Washington, the first international conservation conference in all history. With our own National Conservation Commission there will meet representatives from Canada and Mexico and the subject will be considered, not only from the standpoint of common interest in streams that lie partly in one country and partly in another, but also from the view point of independent action in Canada and Mexico as well as in the United States. As this is someday to be an ocean-bound republic our interest in conservation of the resources of Canada and Mexico is more practical than might appear at first thought.

The British Business Slump.

Working folk are having hard times in Great Britain. During 1908 the exports of manufactured products fell off nearly $225,000,000, and the imports of raw materials fell off $189,000,000. This meant just so much less to do and to do with, and consequently, a falling off in the number of persons for whom employment can be found. The unemployed in the trades unions alone was 9.1 per cent. at the end of the year compared with 2.8 per cent. ten years ago, while the general retail price level of commodities advanced 2.5 per cent. over 1907 and 8.4 per cent. as compared with 1900. The total exports of Great Britain fell off 11.5 per cent. during 1908, whereas those of Germany fell off less than 2 per cent. These facts are giving British economists some hard nuts to crack as well as creating a profound public concern for the future of the working folk of Great Britain.

Progress of Sanitation.

The germ theory of disease, so thoroughly established by Pasteur, is working important results in the French nation. Great impetus has been given to sanitation and, chiefly because of sanitary betterments, there were 58,000 fewer deaths in France during 1908 than during 1907. The vital statistics of France have also been improved by an absolute increase in marriages during 1908 of 8,414 and of births by almost 9,000. The births exceeded the deaths by 11,066 whereas, during 1907, the deaths exceeded the births by 55,007, the first favorable mortality record France has made in many years.

Canadian Banking.

For the first time in the history of banking in Canada the banking assets have come to exceed one billion dollars. There has been a steady flow of investible money into Canada in recent years and an accumulation of surplus, so that the banks are looked upon as being relatively strong, but overburdened with cash deposits. During the whole of 1908 there was a steady decrease in the demand for commercial accommodations so that, by the end of the year, the loans to merchants, etc., were many millions short of what they were a year before. Canada has an asset banking currency and its fluctuations are also of interest. Before harvest last summer the total issue was $66,697,000, but by October 31st it had risen to $83,036,000, but as soon as the crop had been moved the bank notes were returned to the banks in the form of deposits and now stand about where they did in early summer. Canada has secured automatic elasticity in its currency in the only way possible—by an asset banking currency.

Spain Retaking Cuba.

Some makers of figures are disquieting those of us who have been hoping for the speedy Americanization of Cuba. Investigation shows a steady inpouring of immigration from Spain, coming to settle in the country, to take the lead in its industry and, as far as may be, in the smaller commercial activities if not in the greater. The Spaniards understand the Cuban people and, notwithstanding the bitterness of feeling of ten years ago, the two elements are very friendly now. There are 200,000 Spanish residents in Cuba and the number is augmented more rapidly than from any other part of the world. In short, Spain appears to be retaking in peace what it lost in war, but without governmental complications that made Spain so much trouble and caused so great a humiliation to a proud but inefficient people.

As Venezuela Looks At It.

Our minister to Venezuela, acting under instructions from Secretary Root, is pushing American claims upon the attention of Venezuela, but with little better success with President Gomez than with Castro. The American concessionaires agreed with the Venezuelan government that, in the event of differences arising, the matters at issue should be determined by the courts of Venezuela and that appeal should not be taken to the United States government. Differences did arise, the courts of Venezuela decided adversely to the Americans but, notwithstanding the contract to the contrary, an appeal was taken to the United States, but on the ground that it was because of pressure put upon the courts by Castro that the courts decided as they did and that fraud vitiated all contracts. Venezuela holds that it would be a reflection upon the honor of the country to concede the subversivity of its courts to Castro and is therefore standing firm against a reopening of the issues. Technically our American claimants have not a leg to stand on. Practically they have been robbed of millions without other hope of redress than Uncle Sam can afford.

Chicago Milk.

Chicago found its infants murdered and its grown-up population cheated by being furnished adulterated, watered or preserved milk and enacted stringent ordinances to cure the evil. Milk was then, and is now, being furnished at seven cents per quart, of which the farmer producers received three and one-half cents. The large dealers undertook to raise the price to eight cents and were promptly indicted for conspiracy to overthrow the Sherman anti-trust law. The farmers to the number of more than 500 got together and served notice upon Chicago that it can have good milk at eight to nine cents per quart, but if it will only pay seven cents it must not be too particular about the quality of the article, its complexion or bacterial count. There is no more difficult problem than that of municipal milk supply and the controversy at Chicago will repay watching with interest.

The Steel Trade.

There is no better index to the condition of industrial America than that afforded by the iron and steel trade, for this is an age of steel. This trade is at heart in good condition, but feverish and not buoyant. There has been a shading of prices, on the quiet, in order to encourage orders, but only a shading, for the trade is doing its best to hold prices up to the standard. There is a feeling among consumers of steel that the revision of the tariff will be downward and not upward and that by holding off their orders until after Congress has taken action on the tariff better figures can be had. What is true of the steel industry is true of all other protected industries. Business will be on a hand-to-mouth basis until Congress has finished tinkering the tariff.

Electrizing Interurban Traffic.

All over the country efforts are making to electrify interurban railroad traffic and to bring all trains into and out of cities with electric instead of steam power. There are two reasons why this process should be pushed to a speedy consummation. One is that the public good demands an abatement of the smoke nuisance in cities, locomotives being the worst offenders in this particular, and the other is that interurban traffic can be handled more cheaply and more quickly by electric power than by steam. The Illinois Central is likely to be the eastern leader in this reform and to begin its good work at Chicago. It has partly reorganized its engineering department with this purpose in view. As already known the Southern Pacific is moving in the matter on the east side of the bay. When accomplished, as it is likely to be, the municipal atmosphere in all first-class American cities will be much cleared.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN

Died Apr. 15, 1865

THE FIRST AMERICAN.

By James Russell Lowell.

(From the "Harvard Commemoration Ode.")

Such was he, our Martyr-Chief,
Whom late the Nation he had led,
With ashes on her head,
Went with the passion of an angry grief;
Forgive me, if from present things I turn
To speak what in my heart will beat and burn,
And hang my wreath on his world-honored urn.
Nature, they say, doth dote,
And cannot make a man
Save on some worn-out plan.
Repeating as by rote:

For him her Old-World moulds aside she threw,
And, choosing sweet clay from the breast
Of the unexhausted West,
With stuff untained shaped a hero new,
Wise, steadfast in the strength of God, and true.
How beautiful to see

Once more a shepherd of mankind indeed,
Who loved his charge, but never loved to lead;
One whose meek flock the people joyed to be,
Not lured by any cheat of birth,
But by his clear-grained human worth,
And brave old wisdom of sincerity!
They knew that outward grace is dust;
They could not choose but trust
In that sure-footed mien's unflinching skill,
And supple-tempered will
That bent like perfect steel to spring again and thrust.

His was no lonely mountain-peak of mind,
Thrusting to thin air o'er our cloudy bars,
A sea-mark now, now lost in vapors blind;
A broad prairie rather, genial, level-lined,
Fruitful and friendly for all human kind.
Yet also might to heaven and loved of loftiest stars.

Nothing of Europe here,
Or, then, of Europe fronting morrowward still.
Ere any names of Serf and Peer
Could Nature's equal scheme deface
And thwart her genial will:

Here was a type of the true elder race,
And one of Plutarch's men talked with us face to face.

I praise him not; it were too late;
And some innate weakness there must be in him who condescends to victory
Such as the Present gives, and cannot wait,
Safe in himself as in a fate.
So always firmly he:
He knew to bide his time,
And can his fame abide,
Still patient in his simple faith sublime,
Till the wise years decide.

Great captains, with their guns and drums,
Disturb our judgment for the hour,
But at last silence comes;
These all are gone and, standing like a tower,
Our children shall behold his fame,
The kindly-earnest, brave, foreseeing man,
Sagacious, patient, dreading praise, not blame,
New birth of our new soil, the first American.

EULOGY ON LINCOLN.

By Robert G. Ingersoll.

Strange mingling of mirth and tears, of the tragic and grotesque, of cap and crown, of Socrates and Rabelais, of Aesop and Marcus
Aurelius, of all that is gentle and just, humorous and honest, merciful, wise, laughable, lovable, and divine, and all consecrated to the use of man; while through all, and over all, an overwhelming sense of obligation, of chivalric loyalty to truth, and upon all, the shadow of the tragic end.

Lincoln was an immense personality—firm but not obstinate. Obscurity is egotism—firm ness, heroism. He influenced others without effort, unconsciously; and they submitted to him as men submit to nature, unconsciously.
He was severe with himself, and for that reason lenient with others. He appeared to apologize for being kinder than his fellows.

He did merciful things as stealthily as others committed crimes. Almost ashamed of tenderness, he said and did the noblest words and deeds with that charming confusion, that awkwardness, that is the perfect grace of modesty.

He knew others, because perfectly acquainted with himself. He cared nothing for place, but everything for principle; nothing for money, but everything for independence.
Where no principle was involved, easily swayed—willing to go slowly if in the right direction—sometimes willing to stop; but he would not go wrong. He was willing to wait.
He knew that the event was not waiting, and that fate was not the fool of chance. He knew that slavery had defenders, but no defense, and that they who attack the right must wound themselves. He was neither tyrant nor slave. He neither knelt nor scorned. With him, men were neither great nor small—they were right or wrong. Through manners, clothes, titles, rags, and race he saw the real—that which is. Beyond accident, policy, compromise, and war he saw the end. He was patient as Destiny, whose undecipherable hieroglyphs were so deeply graven on his soul and tragic face.

Nothing discloses real character like the use of power. It is easy for the weak to be gentle. Most people can bear adversity. But if you wish to know what a man really is, give him power. This is the supreme test. It is the glory of Lincoln that, having almost absolute power, he never abused it, except upon the side of mercy.

Wealth could not purchase, power could not awe, this divine, this loving man. He knew no fear except the fear of doing wrong. Hating slavery, pitying the master—seeking to conquer, not persons, but prejudices—he was the embodiment of the self denial, the courage, the hope, and the nobility of a nation. He spoke, not to inflame, not to upbraid, but to convince. He raised his hands, not to strike, but in benediction. He longed to pardon. He loved to see the pearls of joy on the cheeks of a wife whose husband he had rescued from death.

Lincoln was the grandest figure of the fiercest civil war. He is the gentlest memory of our world.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

1809—February 12—1909.

By Frederick L. Hosmer.

The prairies to the mountains call,
The mountains to the sea;
From shore to shore a nation keeps
Her martyr's memory.

Though lowly born, the seal of God
Was in that rugged face:
Still from the humble Nazareths come
The saviors of the race.

With patient heart and vision clear
He wrought through trying days,—
"Malice toward none, with love for all,"
Unswerved by blame or praise.

And when the morn of Peace broke through
The battle's cloud and din,
He hailed with joy the promised land
He might not enter in.

He seemed as set by God apart,
The winnepsess trod alone;
Now stands he forth an uncrowned king,
A people's heart his throne.

Land of our loyal love and hope,
O Land he died to save,
Bow down, renew to-day thy vows
Beside his martyr grave!

Centennial Hymn.
Tune:—Hummel.

A BRITISH TRIBUTE.

By Tom Taylor, in "Punch."

You lay a wreath on murdered Lincoln's bier,
You, who with mocking pencil went to trace,
Broad for the self-complacent British sneer,
His length of shambling limb, his furrowed face,

His gaunt, garbled hands, his unkempt, bristling hair,
His garb uncouth, his bearing ill at ease,
His lack of all we prize as debonair,
Of power or will to shine, of art to please;

You, whose smart pen backed up the pencil's laugh,
Judging each step as though the way were plain;
Reckless, so it could point its paragraph
Of chief's perplexity, or people's pain.

Beside this corpse, that bears for winding sheet
The Stars and Stripes he lived to rear anew,
Between the mourners at his head and feet,
Say, scurried jester, is there room for you?

Yes; he had lived to shame me from my sneer,
To lame my pencil, and confute my pen;—
To make me own this hind of princes' peer,
This rail-splitter a true-born king of men.

My shallow judgment I had learned to rue,
Noting how to occasion's height he rose;
How his quaint wit made home-truth seem more true;
How, iron-like, his temper grew by blows.

He went about his work,—such work as few—
Ever had laid on head and heart and hand,—
As one who knows, where there's a task to do, Man's honest will must Heaven's good grace command.

So he went forth to battle, on the side
That he felt clear was Liberty's and Right's,
As in his peasant boyhood he had plied
His warfare with rude Nature's thwarting mights,—

The uncleared forest, the unbroken soil,
The iron-bark, that turns the lumberer's axe,
The rapid, that o'erbears the boatman's toil,
The prairie, hiding the mazed wanderer's tracks.

So he grew up, a destined work to do,
And lived to do it: four long-suffering years'
Ill-fate, ill-feeling, ill-report, lived through,
And then he heard the hives change to cheers.

The taunts to tribute, the abuse to praise,
And took both with the same unwavering mood:

Till, as he came on light, from darkening days,
And seemed to touch the goal from where he stood,

A felon hand, between the goal and him,
Reached from behind his back, a trigger prest,—

And those perplexed and patient eyes were dim,
Those gaunt, long-laboring limbs were laid to rest.

The Old World and the New, from sea to sea,
Utter one voice of sympathy and shame!
Sore heart, so stopped when it at last beat high:

Sad life, cut short just as its triumph came.
A deed accurst! Strokes have been struck before.

By the assassin's hand, whereof men doubt
If more of horror or disgrace they bore;
But thy foul crime, like Cain's, stands darkly out.

Vile hand, that brandest murder on a strife, What'er its grounds, stoutly and nobly striven;

And with the martyr's crown crownest a life,
With much to praise, little to be forgiven.

SHALL MAN OR RIVERS RULE?

By RUFUS P. JENNINGS,

President of the River Improvement and Drainage Association of California.

About five hundred miles of navigable streams, with their valleys, drain some thing more than $300,000,000 acres of fertile land on the floor of the great interior valley of California, and are a potent factor in the commercial possibilities of 52,000,000 acres of land valued at nearly $1,000,000,000, immediately adjacent to this valley. The products of the agricultural region influenced by the Sacramento and San Joaquin rivers amounts in value annually to more than $200,000,000.

It is well in discussing California's waterways and their needs to realize the facts set forth above, for through these facts we come to understand the relative value of this territory to the state and the nation. California's waterways are not local in any sense of the term except as to geographical location, for the markets of the entire world are influenced by the production of the vast area influenced by these rivers and their tributaries.

Grants Provided For Reclamation.

Hundreds of thousands of acres of land along the Sacramento and San Joaquin rivers came to the State of California through the Swamp Land Act with the understanding and special proviso on part of the national government that these lands should be reclaimed. When the state parted with these lands to the individual holders it was with the further understanding that each individual should carry out the provision attached by the nation. Individual work of reclamation, however, where the area in its entirety is so vast, must, of necessity, be limited and inadequate, and it is only through extensive co-operation of all those who are interested and affected by such reclamation together with active co-operation of both state and nation to properly conserve the interests of navigation and commerce, that perfect and complete control and reclamation can be effected.

Nature of the Problem.

Through the operations of those interested in the mines of the mountains surrounding the great interior valley, vast quantities of debris have been washed down, choking up the channels; through the devastations of lumbermen in the forests of the mountains and hills surrounding the valley, snow and water conservation has been eliminated, causing periodical floods to overflow the floor of the valley; through diversion of water by irrigators during periods of low water navigability of these streams has been reduced hundreds of miles.

Through this combination of circumstances and of forces has arisen a problem which has engaged the minds of men in all ranks of life, for many years, and the solution of which is engaging the active co-operation of state and nation. It is evident that before a satisfactory solution can be arrived at all of the varied interests which go to make up the sum of causes must be brought into harmony for the general good. Just what shall be done, and the details of the necessary work to be consummated in order that perfect conditions may obtain, must be left to those who have devoted their lives to the solution of engineering problems. In other words present physical conditions must be overcome by physical means.

Mental Problem Greater Than Physical.

But there is something more than physical conditions that have to be eliminated before this great problem shall be solved. There is a mental condition, or rather a series of mental conditions which are in conflict with each other, because of the diverse interests which are affected by the various phases of the problem.

From an engineering point of view the correction of existing conditions, the solving of the entire problem, is simply a matter of sufficient money to do the necessary work along lines laid down in carefully matured plans, this to be followed by such restrictions as will prevent a recurrence of the conditions which have brought about the necessity for this great work. Physically there is nothing in the way of complete reclamation, conservation and protection except the necessary money to carry out plans.

Delay Through Conflicting Interests.

The mental divergence of interests affected by river conditions, for it has really been more of a mental than an actual divergence, has been instrumental, for a long time, in preventing co-operative work toward alleviating the trouble which has injured agricultural, mining, lumbering and commercial operations in thirty-four counties of California. Many efforts have been made to bring about a co-operation between these interests, such efforts being of no avail through misunderstandings and misconceptions of true conditions. It has been fully realized that until such co-operation could be brought about all efforts toward perfect reclamation and conservation would be nullified, even though complete and absolute plans for the physical end of the problem might be formulated.

The several interests which have been working faithfully for complete and harmonious action have had a double task and while efforts have been directed constantly toward the unification of those affected, they have not neglected the solution of legal difficulties which have stood in the way of the work. The first step in this respect was the Caminetti Act which restrained the miners and prevented a continuation of filling river channels with debris. Numerous efforts at reclamation and flood restriction came through other acts which were ineffectual owing to their limitations, and it was only when the Sacramento Drainage District Act became a law that the initial step was taken toward a progressive plan for reclamation and conservation.

The "Dabney Plan."

In 1904 a convention was called to meet at San Francisco of all those interested in river matters, and as a result of that convention the River Improvement and Drainage Association of California was formed, composed of men representing all interests affected by river conditions. At this convention it was recommended that a commission of five engineers be appointed to make a complete and exhaustive study of the situation and to formulate a plan of rectification. This commission, composed of Maj. T. G. Dabney, Henry B. Richardson, Maj. H. M. Chittenden and M. A. Nurse, entered upon its duties and formulated a complete plan, which is now known as the "Dabney Plan."

This plan provides for the complete work of reclamation and restoration of the Sacramento and San Joaquin rivers, and has been generally accepted as an adequate solution of the problems which have vexed California for so many years. The first step toward carrying out this plan was the passage by the State Legislature, in 1905, of an act creating the Sacramento Drainage District and providing

By A. J. WATERHOUSE.

The Frog Chorus.

Residents of South Pasadena and Garvanza are protesting against the frog chorus which booms in their vicinity these damp nights. The batrachians, however, do not seem to mind, but keep right on with the chorus.

It's all a matter of one's taste; at least, I judge 'tis so.

For some folk like that nightly choir and some do not, I know.

But as for me, I'm free to say, I love that chorus deep.

A sort of goblin lullaby that lulls me unto sleep.

The night is tranquil; through the pane on we star winks at me.

As if to say, "You might wink, too, could you see what I see?"

All silent, through the halls of space the round earth onward spins.

Till of a sudden, as by note, the midnight choir begins:

"Oomp oomp oomp,

Oomp oomp oomp,

Here's fun that beats your sleeping.

Oomp oomp oomp,

Oomp oomp oomp,

Fie, if your bed you're keeping!"

Then, quickly as the song began, ensues the reign of quiet:

No single croak, no lonely voice, of all that midnight riot.

But silence, silence, till a frog grown old, rain-proof, non-porous,

Lifts up his voice inquiringly in one brief croak of "Chorus?"

Then all respond, the great and small, Miss Froggie and her lover.

Bass, alto, tenor, air are sung, and Echo sings it over:

And, though Garvanzas do not like that midnight chorus ringing,

I just lie there, with soul at rest, and listen to the singing:

"Oomp oomp oomp,

Oomp oomp oomp,

There's nothing like our chorus—

Oomp oomp oomp,

Oomp oomp oomp,

'Neath star-gemmed heavens o'er us."

Primer Lesson for Willie.

Do you see the man, Wil-lie?

Yes, you see the man.

Is he a nice man?

Yes, he is a nice Man. He be-ongs to leading clubs and is a High-er-Up.

What has the man in his hand, Wil-lie? Is it a sack?

Yes, it is a sack. Can you read the word on the sack?

Yes, you can read the word on the sack. It is B-O-O-D-L-E.

Can you guess why the man is stand-ing still, Wil-lie?

No, you can not guess why he is stand-ing still. He is wait-ing to be held up.

Does the man like to be held up?

No, he loathes, de-spis-es and ab-hors to be held up.

Why, then, does he wait, Wil-lie?

He waits be-cause there are mil-lions in it, and mil-lions soothe his tor-tured, held-up feel-ings.

Is he not a nice man, Wil-lie?

See what good clothes he wears.

Also, he is a Prom-i-nent Cit-i-zen.

Let us take off our hats to the man, Wil-lie.

To One I Love.

To one I love, to one whose eyes

Are wells through which my cares are drowned,

Whence I may drink and grow more wise,

Since in sweet love is wisdom found;

To one—there may be fairer maids,

But, ah, our hands in love entwined

When home I go in even's shades—

I fain would write this valentine.

* * *

She may not be so very wise;

I doubt if she be wise at all,

But, faith, the luring of her eyes

Doth hold my very soul in thrall.

Her little hands have power to soothe

The murmur of the daytime care,

And all my homeward path to smooth.

With thought of love that waits me there.

* * *

I'm somewhat old and somewhat gray

My Valentine's sweet love to hold,

And yet it cheers me on my way

To know I never will be so old

But she will still my coming greet

With tender eyes all love-ashine.

Ah, be your days all fair and sweet,

My little one, my Valentine.

I Know the Place.

I know the place where everything happens just as we wish it to, where Fortune has favors for jubilant chaps, and nothing at all to rue;

Where right in the mouth of every wee mite a spoon of pure gold is found, and people on street-cars are wholly polite, and working-girls richly are gowned; where the glitter of gold no whorship lures, and "higher-up" honesty's clear; where never a doctor kills off his cures, and whisky ne'er follows a beer.

No sunshine is hidden by upper-land mists, and nothing but gladness you'll find, and if you would know where that country exists, of course I will tell. In my mind.

I hate to think it, but I'm afeered I've punished my boy sometimes fer bein' too much like his pa. 'Spose you never did sech a thing, hey?

What we want depends on circumstances. F'rinstance, what earthly use could a alarm clock be to the proud pa of a waterprisin' baby?

I ain't pertusin' 'gainst fashion's hipless women, but sometimes it almos' seems to me that 'praps the Almighty knew best.

I've saw folks use up so much force in halluycurin' fer heaven that they didn't seem to have any energy left to do work fer it.

When I hear a man sayin' mean things 'bout women I can't help feelin' that prob'ly he was unforchint in selectin' a mother.

They may be prettier sights in life than a couple lovin' each other more an' more es they grow old, but I haven't seen 'em.

We may be a Christian people, but while Wall street and Fifth avenue almos' surround the East Side of New York you can't make me b'lieve we're overworkin' our Christianity any.

They Average Fairly White.

I have had my fling at our "statesmen" queer, at the legislative crew;

I've given them many a bitter beer, and, faith, they deserved it, too;

I have mentioned oft, as I well might do, some bill which we all could see

Was duly engrossed by the entry clerk when tagged by the coy S. P.;

I have written of Parker and Hatton, too, by Herrin with might endowed,

How they issued their orders that laws be made, while the "statesmen" all kowtowed;

But I wish to say, and I say again, for it giveth my soul delight,

It is pleasant to write of our statesmen now, they average fairly white.

* * *

Of course there are some of the old, bad gang, the scalpers for William F.;

Whose cars unto all save an S. P. toot are really exceedingly deaf;

There are some who object to a Lobby maintained if it's of the Popular kind,

For they somewhat suspect the style of the goods that sort of a lobby might find;

There are scurvy knaves, as there oft have been, but they hold no balance of power,

And they prove "good dogs" and a shelter seek when Pluvius forecasts "shower,"

But, taking them up and taking them down, I judge it is only right

To say of the statesmen who now make laws, they average fairly white.

* * *

No word's retracted of all I said in the fragrant days of yore

Concerning the rascals by Herrin fed, who nosed at the trough for more,

But it's good to feel, as we all know well, that the men who make our laws

Are not called out by an S. P. bell to weaken the same by flaws;

It is good to feel that decent men in the capitol have a say,

And that the sound of an urgent toot can't summon them all away,

And that's why I've written as best I may this anthem of pure white

To say of the statesmen who now make laws, they average fairly white.

Sic Transit Gloria Mundi.

Sic transit gloria mundi; so the visions come, and the visions fade.

The hope that we cherished is lying low, And our feet press deep in the vale of shade;

Yet, Knights of Discouragement, break your bars:

O'er shades of the night is the glory of stars.

I dreamed a dream, and it passed away Just as the breath of the morn was near;

I walked where the specters in waiting lay, But the bright sun rose, and the day was clear.

Though hope and ambition sink down to dust, In the day that cometh I place my trust.

Sic transit gloria mundi. When The night creeps down on a world un-stilled; When Doubt, the mocker, doth leave his den To whisper his message to hearts refilled, I heed not, I reckon not—O'er vaporous bars Still gleams and glistens the glory of stars.

("Man or Rivers?"—Concluded.)

means for the election and appointment of officers for the district and defining their powers. Through a decision in the superior court of Sacramento county this act was declared constitutional, and the commission has proceeded along lines laid down in the report of the Dabney Commission.

State and National Co-operation Necessary.

In order that the Dabney plan might be carried out it is necessary that the three parties at interest work in harmony. These are the nation, the state and the land owners along the rivers. Preliminary work toward rectification of channel, as provided in the Dabney plan and sanctioned by the United States engineers, requires the expenditure of $800,000 and to provide this sum Congressman McKinlay introduced in the Congress of the United States H. B. 3892, calling for the appropriation of $400,000 by the United States to be available when a similar sum shall have been appropriated by the State of California. A bill appropriating $400,000 by the State of California, known as the "Boynton-Hewitt" bill, has been passed, and now efforts are making to have the Congress pass the McKinlay bill as an emergency measure, as there will be no rivers and harbors bill this session.

It may be seen that the physical features of the problem have been overcome, so far as ways and means is concerned, for the Dabney plan has been accepted by government engineers to be the physical solution. But the solution of the mental phase of the problem is a matter of much greater difficulty than that of the physical phase. It is essential to a complete carrying out of the plans which have been devised for the reclamation of land and rectification of the rivers, that every party at interest shall use every endeavor to assist in the great work that is before us. Neither the national nor the state government can be expected to carry on this work alone, nor should it be expected that they carry it out together. There is a third party at interest even more responsible for the work than either state or nation, and that is the land owner who will receive the actual and direct benefit through vastly increased values of his land and through safe and continuous crops.

Private Interests Now Harmonized.

Through constant effort the conflicting interests of agriculturists, irrigationists, miners and lumbermen have finally been brought into harmony, and at a meeting held in Sacramento on January 11th, all these interests were combined in a joint committee formed by the Sacramento Valley Development Association, the River Improvement and Drainage Association, the Sacramento Drainage Commission, the California Miners' Association and the irrigation interests, and this joint committee is the harmonious result of these conflicting interests getting together to work for the good of the state.

With this first step toward solution of the mental phase of the problem it is believed that the succeeding steps will be easy. The property owners along the river must come to a realization of the fact that their benefits will be such as to demand from them their share of the necessary expense attaching to the reclamation and protection of their lands. The people of California must realize that the successful restoration of the rivers and the reclamation of the adjacent lands will mean millions upon millions of dollars additional to California's products. The commercial interests of all the people of the state must realize that such a consummation of the long-desired plans will bring increased prosperity to the whole state and consequently increased business to them.

WITH EYES AND
:: EARS OPEN ::

Some speculation there has been among mankind, from Eden onward, regarding human happiness. What is it? Eve thought it would be found in the possession of knowledge; Solomon, in wisdom; Omar, in the oblivion-bringing fires of wine; Napoleon, in power. The author of our Declaration of Independence felt that he must recognize this universal longing, but asserted only that humanity's unalienable rights included the pursuit of happiness. Most of us are still pursuing. Norman Hapgood has declared that the supreme happiness is to lie on one's back on a sunny hillside in the spring and talk about God.

But I saw a happy man the other day. He was a mechanic, resting from labor after his mid-day lunch. He had quit drinking, quit smoking cigarettes, and his wife had said he was a model husband. Maybe he was as close to the secret as anyone has gotten.

Women take amazing pains to conceal the motives of their simplest acts. There were three of us waiting our turn in the reception room in a doctor's office—two ladies and myself. One of the two was a most matter-of-fact person, but the other was distinctly feminine. She feigned absorption in a book—but did not turn one page in twenty minutes.

Another man came in. Miss Matter-of-Fact glared at him and resumed her magazine. Feminine did not flutter a lash. The man passed Miss Practical by with a glance, and fixed his eyes, eyes of honest admiration, upon Miss Demure. Her fur pressed too closely upon her cheek, she raised her eyes to guide her hand as she removed it, turned them casually to take in the newcomer with a sweeping glance, and dropped them to the book, to rise no more. She was "dying," as she would have said it, to see what he looked like, but she took five minutes to conceal the fact.

What mysterious things have women to conceal? Nothing, literally nothing. But which of these two got the attention of the men? Exactly. Which is what I started out to say.

Our printer has lost his "devil." He was too much of a real boy to last in the sober shops of industry. Shrewd, quick-witted, with abounding spirits, he whistled himself gaily out of a job. He did his work fast, and put in his spare time working off the animal energy of him in mischief. The "ad" setter's black eye is a result of his pleasantry; the elevator man has a few more gray hairs following the descent of a bundle of paper down the elevator shaft to the cage above his head; the printer is out a lot of work and many explanations since the young rascal turned on the fire hydrant to see if it really worked. It did, and the "devil" is now rollicking in new fields of labor. But watch out for him. As a celebrated author once said to me about his son-in-law, whom he cordially disliked, "He has the gall of seven men; but, after all, I'd rather a boy should have energy enough to be impudent than be a spineless gentleman."

I walked down the street with an advertising man. A lady passed and the white ruffle of a spottish petticoat slightly showing around her ankles. "Honi soit qui mal y pense," I murmured. He did not heed me: "Say," he exclaimed, "wouldn't the man make a fortune who could buy all those lines of white ruffle for advertising space?" He did not see the joke, when I said that he was no poet. He was only an advertising man.

The manager of a firm that collects bills had figured out to the fraction of a per cent, the effect of a study day upon his collections. Another friend—one of those blessedly "sentimental" nature lovers—revises the old saying to read, "He hasn't sense enough to go out into the rain." What Nature means to a person is all in the point of view.

Complaint is often made of ministers that they meddle with things they do not understand. I think they do—when they preach theology.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN.

The Silly Season At Sacramento There is a feeling abroad in Sacramento that a great deal of nonsense has been talked, and many foolish things done, in relation to the Japanese issue. On the one hand the affected fear of war with Japan is not taken seriously and, on the other, most of the anti-Japanese legislation proposed is looked upon as being purely demagogic and wholly mischievous. It is surmised that the President has believed that nothing short of a war scare would bring the Legislature of California to its senses and that he has allowed that kind of a scare to creep into the open although with no better foundation than hocuspocus. The real reason why there should be no fool laws enacted by this session, or any other, are good enough within themselves, and certain enough to prevail, without resort to bugaboo. This is the feeling at the capitol.

One Rational Assemblyman There has been just one rational anti-alien measure before the Legislature and that was Drew's alien bill. At first it was aimed at the Japanese alone, but because of its probable conflict with the Japanese treaty, and because of opposition at Washington, it was so amended as to apply to all aliens. That killed it. In the Legislature there are many real estate dealers, and the speaker of the Assembly being one of them, and these gentlemen had no notion of cutting off a possible European demand for American real estate, even at the risk of allowing Japanese to become as well rooted in California as Johnson grass is in the San Joaquin. This phase of the issue affords a double standard for measuring the statesmanship and patriotism of our stem winding legislative vociferators.

Character Sketch of Assemblyman Drew Here is a man in earnest. In his sleeping hours he sees the Pacific shores swarming with incoming Japanese like a plague of locusts, scaling the mountains and spreading over the inter-mountain district in such resistless force that by and by they fix the frontier between Orient and Occident at the serrated edge of the Rocky mountains instead of the three-mile limit off the Pacific Coast. Whether waking or sleeping he wishes to be the humble instructor in the hand of the Almighty to withstand this tendency, and, even at the cost of missing sales of Fresno real estate to remittance men from Europe, he hopes to prevent Asiatics digging their toes into the soil of California with intent to have them take root there. Mr. Drew is sincere, patriotic and earnest, but up against a "demonstration" hard proposition.

That Pestiferous Grove L. Johnson Here is a human puzzle for you! Possessing one of the most keenly alert mentalities ever ensconced in a cranium this man is as useful in the Legislature as a swarm of bees in a prayer meeting. What he means by crowding through the Assembly his pestiferous anti-Japanese bills only Grove L. Johnson will ever know, but of one thing the Legislature may assure itself in advance. He does not mean what he pretends to mean, for he never did act a perfectly sincere thing in his life. Metaphorically speaking, he is always trying to turn jack from the bottom of the deck and generally makes out to do it. He has kicked up a good deal of a hub-bub, and that may be all he had in view from the first. If so he will retire to his closet in the lone watches of the night and laugh himself within an inch of apoplexy. Grove L. Johnson's one, supreme, irremediable, ineradicable misfortune was his being created sharper-witted than other men has made a pest of him. Governor Pardee kept him out of the legislature during his term of office and thereby escaped years of thorn-in-the-flesh. If Governor Gillett had profited by Pardee's example he would have found gubernatorial life better worth the living.

Give Praise To Gillett Through this disagreeable anti-Japanese nightmare Governor Gillett has conducted himself with dignity and discretion. He has worked cordially with the administration at Washington to prevent California making an ass of itself and forfeiting the good opinion of the rest of the Union. He has probably succeeded. There is a principle at stake that is vital to our civilization and not a Californian of us all would stop at any limit save that of open rebellion against the United States government, to preserve this Pacific Coast for the Aryan race. But sober-minded patriots dread nothing so much as the vociferous marplots who would exhibit us to the rest of the nation as a commonwealth of jabberwocks. President Roosevelt and Secretary Root perceive the danger to our institutions as well as we do and we can trust them to avert that danger if it can be averted through diplomacy. If it cannot, then war must come and the frontier dividing orientalism and occidentalism must be fixed where it might can place it. Governor Gillett has done wisely. Let him have full credit for it.

The State Board Of Education School legislation is in evidence at every session of the legislature, but this time there are comparatively few bills which propose changes of importance in the school laws. One of the exceptions is the proposition to reorganize the State Board of Education by reducing the representation of the five normal schools to a single member from the whole five and to substitute representatives of the common schools, high schools and colleges, through appointment by the Governor. This is somewhat in line with a constitutional amendment which was voted down last November, but is a bit more rational. There may be some politics in this, too, and probably is.

Taxation Without The Payer's Consent Another school bill is in evidence at every session of the legislature, but this time there are comparatively few bills which propose changes of importance in the school laws. One of the exceptions is the proposition to reorganize the State Board of Education by reducing the representation of the five normal schools to a single member from the whole five and to substitute representatives of the common schools, high schools and colleges, through appointment by the Governor. This is somewhat in line with a constitutional amendment which was voted down last November, but is a bit more rational. There may be some politics in this, too, and probably is.

Is Railroad Policy Shifting to New Lines? The most satisfactory explanation given for the "hands off" policy of the political bureau of the Southern Pacific company relative to the race track is that the manager of that bureau is developing never less of a political policy. Mr. Herrin has always been given credit for great acumen and deserves it. He is not stupid. What can be more natural, therefore, than that he should break away from old, raw methods of subverting free government and seek to employ newer methods to the same end. There is an awakened spirit throughout the country and California is participating in it. Mr. Herrin does not have to be told this nor be reminded how close Theodore Bell came to defeating Mr. Herrin's man for governor. The revolt of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League in 1908 was not lost on W. F. Herrin. Whoever else belittled that movement he did not. What is this new railroad political policy to be? Mr. Herrin is not telling, but unless Mr.

Herrin's supporters are stone blind and adder deaf they will pay him to let Californians govern themselves, and as Mr. Herrin works for pay, and for pay only, he can probably be hired to shift his policy to that line.

The Plaintiff of the Herrin Performers While Mr. Herrin is not telling what his future policy is to be there are straws which show the way that wind blows. Through the hired mouthpieces of the "organization" he will say to the people of California: "My handy men are performers. I can hire the rascals to be honest, or do any other good thing I want them to do, rather reluctantly perhaps, but none the less effectively. As for the reformers, they can't be hired to do anything and there is no foreknowing what they may do. Therefore, good people, let me know what you want real bad and I'll see that you get it. My boys are the fellows to get it for you. As for those Lincoln-Roosevelt chaps, I can prevent their accomplishing any good thing for you, and I will. Trust me. That is the substance of the new S. P. political policy. It is smart and it has the advantage of keeping the "organization" in possession of the jobs and the chief of it in a position to turn a trick now and again for his employers, for Mr. Herrin always earns his wages. But is that free government? Well, not quite. For that reason, if for no other, it is a good policy to fight.

Mr. Herrin's Last Stand The one thing that might make Mr. Herrin's new policy as ineffective as the old is a really workable primary law. That means democracy in the saddle, and, if it required nothing more, it would compel a thorough reorganization of the Herrin political machine. Therefore the last stand of the Herrin cohorts in this legislature will be against the primary bill as it came from the Direct Primary League. It is not impossible that the anti-Japanese rampus was kicked up for the purpose of withdrawing public attention from this issue. Moreover, the League's representative in charge of the bill in the Senate is a recognized "organization" man. Unless the public speak in no uncertain tones it is likely to go hard with the direct primary law at this session of the legislature.

The President And Perkins Senator Perkins is just now shining with a dazzling radiance as the personification of Christian meekness in that he protests his love for the President, no matter what the President does to him, and renews his fidelity to the Roosevelt policy as a good record for himself notwithstanding. When the President bites a piece out of him, a pained look steals over his visage to be sure, but he does not bite back. With tears glistening in his eyes he directs attention to his record and suffers that to suffice. The Senator is a good record. It is like the record that Thomas Jefferson left, which equally encourages the soft-money man and the hard, the protectionist and the free trader, the little American and the greater, Republican and Democrat, Populist and plutocrat. It will be of no use for the President to try to get around the record of the senior senator from California. His only recourse will be to apply a number ten boot to it if he finds it in his way.

Why Not the Chinese, Too? The plea to the President, made by the Chinese Six Companies, to have Chinese accorded all the consideration which government and diplomats are according the Japanese is a hard one to resist on the fact that it is the only possible answer to it is that the Japanese shall be accorded no consideration or privileges, diplomatic or residential, not accorded to the Chinese. If we cannot make flesh of one and fowl of the other there will be nothing for it except to make fowl of both.

The following story of Lincoln's enduring friendship and love of old associations is told of his leaving Springfield to take up the duties of President. He was about ready to leave for Washington and went to the dingy little law office which had sheltered his saddest hours. He sat down on the couch and said to his law partner, Herndon:

"Billy, you and I have been together more than twenty years, and have never 'passed a word.' Will you let my name stay on the old sign till I come back from Washington?"

The tears started to Mr. Herndon's eyes. He put out his hand.

"Mr. Lincoln," said he, "I will never have any other partner while you live"; and to the day of his assassination all the doors of the firm were in the name of "Lincoln & Herndon."

On the evening of the Baltimore Convention, Mr. Lincoln and a few friends were seated in his room and he was telling that on that afternoon he had heard the news of the nomination of Andrew Johnson for Vice-President before he had heard of his own as President. The dispatch telling of his nomination had been sent to his office from the War Department while he was at lunch. Directly afterwards he went to the War Department without having gone to the official chamber.

While there a telegram came announcing the nomination of Johnson. "What," said he to the operator, "do they nominate a Vice-President before they do a President?"

"Why," responded the astonished official, "have you not heard of your own nomination? It was sent to the White House two hours ago."

"It's all right," replied Mr. Lincoln. "I shall probably find it on my return."

DARWIN FIFTY YEARS AFTER

By DAVID STARR JORDAN.

Just one hundred years ago, on the twelfth day of February, 1809, Charles Darwin was born in a wealthy manor house, at Shrewsbury, in Shropshire, in western England. On the same day, in a poor log cabin in Kentucky, was born Abraham Lincoln. These two, more than any other men, have given to the nineteenth century its color, its individuality, its place among the ages.

In 1859, just fifty years ago, and fifty years from the date of his birth, Charles Darwin published the "Origin of Species." One year later than this Lincoln became president of the United States, and his unique personality began to stamp itself on the nation of democracy, and on the world, which is in turn a democracy in proportion as its people are competent units, fit to take care of themselves.

The Altered Face of Science.

The "Origin of Species" has changed the entire face of the science of life and of the philosophy of life, which must ever be the outgrowth of science. It showed to scientific men, with its demonstration of the natural origin of living forms as natural descendants of pre-existing forms, the first clear explanation of the phenomena of orderly change. It did not convince men of the truth of all this. It did far more than this. It showed men how each one who studied must convince himself; and by that process modern biology is built on Darwinism.

Before Darwin, biologists had catalogued, compared and classified, but to their questions of "Why? Why?" no answer could be given. The simple problem of the meaning of likeness in animals and plants seemed without possibility of answer, or only of such answer as, couched in the language of metaphysics, was devoid of actual meaning. That the world of life was divided into multitudes of species, that these species could be classified into groups of various grade by their structure, that long-enduring strains of likeness were traceable among them, that species themselves though long-persistent were not immutable, all these were facts known to every scholar. But that the mighty differences among living things were derived through minor changes, in slow processes of divergence, very few dared to believe.

Those who for one reason or another speculated in this direction were one and all unable to show any adequate causes behind such mighty effects. Hence scientific men, following the fashion of the unscientific, settled down to the idea that each species of animal and plant had risen to begin with by a process called special creation. The scientific world never believed in "special creation." The phrase was recognized as meaningless and the process itself beyond the possibility of definition or of imagination. But anything else was also non-sensical and most modern science kept on with their special work and let it go at that.

Revelations of Nature's Harmonies.

Darwin showed us, what we all had known before, that the unit of variation is lower than the species, and that the species has no kind of permanence different from that of the race or the genus or the family or the tribe. In the world of life, there are no two individuals alike, nor is the same individual quite the same through any two successive periods. If more than two individuals are quite the same, there must be a reason for it. If the members of a group, having a common origin, change in time, and change in space, diverging as they spread over the globe, there must be a reason for this also. That every kind of animal and plant fits the environment whatever it is as the "dough fits the pan" or the river its bed, is also evident, and for this again there must be some reason. That with time and space all forms seem to divide and to divide into branches, is also evident, and this also must have its causes. That again all variant forms we know in all the earth are reducible to a very few types, is also evident. It is plain that in whatever image man was made, the monkey, the dog, the cat, the bear, the mouse, and even the bird, the turtle and the fish are made in substantially the same image. And behind all this it is the duty of science to insist on knowing the reason why.

"One of the noblest lessons left to the world by Darwin," says Cramer, "is this, which to him amounted to a profound, almost religious conviction, that every fact in nature, no matter how insignificant, every stripe of color, every tint of flower, the length of an orchid's nectary, unusual height in a plant, all the infinite variety of apparently insignificant things, is full of significance. For him it was an historical record, the revelation of a cause, the lurking presence of a principle."

The Clue of Natural Selection.

The clue to all this was found by Darwin in natural selection, the survival under any conditions of the individuals best adapted to these conditions, and the persistence through heredity of the traits of those to whom survival and adaptation were possible.

Darwin showed that thousands or millions of seeds were cast for every plant that matured, hundreds or thousands of eggs were laid for each animal that survived, tens or hundreds of animals were born for each one which came to maturity. He showed that the destruction of the mass with the preservation of the fit was not all the operation of chance, but went on under definite rule. Competition is at work everywhere and favors the individual who can best make headway as young or as adult in the conditions that actually are. The struggle for existence is ever present, is ever varied, the struggle of like with like in a congested district, the struggle of like with unlike, the struggle of all with the varied conditions of life. Out of all this, by natural causes, arose the variety in life as we know it today, the variance of individuals, the differentiation of species, and the fitting of some living forms to all conditions from the snows of Orizaba to the abysses of the deep sea.

Artificial Selection.

Darwin found that species could be altered, divided or modified by conscious and purposeful mating with the destruction of the undesirable. This represents the art called "Artificial Selection," the magic wand by which the breeder effects his creations. For the cognate process in nature, unconscious but none the less efficient, he chose the term "Natural Selection." In his mind "natural" or actual was balanced against supernatural or imaginary, for to him an actual result must ever be associated with a tangible cause.

Animals and plants vary, and in all directions nature selects those whose variations are most favorable for the continuance of the species. More exactly, those individuals unfavorably suited or unfavorably placed are first to die. Those who are left determine the future of the group. Like produces like. Like the seed is the harvest. This is the law of heredity, and the inheritance of our generation is from the individuals which survived in the generation which came before. The bonds of unity among living forms find their explanation in heredity. Homology or fundamental likeness of any sort means blood relationship.

Essential Factors in Evolution.

The essential factors in the procession and divergence of living forms which we call "Organic Evolution" are therefore (1) Variation, which Darwin took as a fact without explanation, (2) Heredity, which he also took as a fact, with an attempt at explanation, as nearly adequate as the scanty knowledge of histology in his day would permit, and (3) Selection. Heredity and Variation are innate, or intrinsic, causes. They are involved in the nature of organic life. Selection is extrinsic, or extrinsic, causes affecting the development of life. The finer analysis of later times detaches from selection another factor indispensable to it, the "räumliche Sonderung" of Moritz Wagner, the condition known as separation, segregation or isolation. It is separation always that renders selection effective. Without some form of separation, the chosen fittest are lost again in the mass. Without geographical separation, we could account for the actual origin of very few of our actual species of wild animals or plants. Without artificial separation, the work of the animal or plant breeder would be without result. So with the process of selection in nature. But all these facts were more or less clearly recognized by Darwin, and to detach natural "separation" as a friction-factor in Organic Evolution from the broader term of natural "selection," is but to cloud Darwin's terminology, without changing the essential meaning of Darwinism.

Since Darwin's time a half century is passed. This is the period of the greatest activity in research yet known in the history of man. Explorers, experimenters, discoverers, observers, philosophers, debaters of all ranks and grades have been busily at work, clearing the air and obscuring the outlook. What now is the status of Darwinism? What today is our conception of Organic Evolution?

Darwin's Basic Hypotheses All Sound.

When a new land is opened to exploration, its first map, sketched from some mountain peak perhaps, shows the general features of the land, but without special detail, unless it be about the mountain peak itself. Such a new land was opened by Darwin in his survey of the methods and processes of Organic Evolution. In a large way, the salient features of the latter were sketched with amazing truthfulness. The rivers run where he placed them. We have his word for valley, forest and cliff, and in all these larger features fifty years have wrought no very material changes. Men have sought to change the map. Shrill voices from every civilized nation have arisen in criticism. Here a forest would be moved, here a lake and there a river. But better studies have shown the largeness of Darwin's vision. These critics could not see the landscape for the brush. Or, dropping the allegory, already too cumbersome, we may see that our knowledge of Organic Evolution has grown by leaps and bounds, but largely along lines laid down or foreseen by Darwin.

The Corroboration of the Microscope.

Since Darwin's time, the compound microscope has opened the secrets of histology. We have given meaning to the "physical basis of heredity." We have learned the process by which two germ cells from two different individuals unite to form a new individual, and we have followed this process through many complex and unforeseen ramifications. We have settled many difficult questions, and we have raised a thousand more, which may yet in turn be settled, but with the same result. We have found reasons why no two germ individuals can be alike, why no two germ cells can ever be alike, and we have some hint as to why characters will be latent in one generation to reappear in the next.

With the microscope and its accessories, we have traced the life history of thousands of species, from the germ cell to adult life, thus adding the third of Haeckel's "ancestral documents," which define for us the actual nature of any animal. These are Morphology, the knowledge of the animal's actual structure, Paleontology, the history of its ancestry, and Above are the names, vocations and addresses of the twelve jurors who have been secured in the Calhoun case, so far as they may be said to have been secured while every one of them is subject to peremptory challenge. During the week John H. Powers, an architect, who had been passed, subject to peremptory challenge, was excused from the jury on account of sickness.

Thus a first step in the trial of Patrick Calhoun may be said to have been taken, but it is only a step, for after the peremptory challenges have been made there will be other venires, other examinations of prospective jurors and other wearisome and prolonged contentions.

Thus far 770 talesmen have been called into court, 458 have been excused for sufficient reasons, 312 have been examined and cross-examined by the lawyers, and twelve have been provisionally accepted. That is to say, of every sixty-four called, and of every twenty examined, one was chosen, and some of the ones thus chosen will go by the peremptory mandate route.

Under these circumstances, it is impossible to say when this case will be presented in evidence to the jury, but it is a fairly safe guess that it will not be before some more weeks have passed and the total number of talesmen has exceeded a thousand.

The trial jury in the case of M. W. Coffey, the former supervisor who is under indictment for accepting a bribe of $4,000 to vote for the overhead trolley franchise, was secured last Saturday, and the presentation of evidence to the jury began on Monday. At this writing former-Supervisor James F. Gallagher, the main witness for the prosecution, is on the stand. As he has done in other cases, he has testified to the bribing of the former supervisor in the abstract and, concretely, to the payment of $4,000 to Coffey for his vote for the overhead-trolley franchise. Gallagher has been subjected to a long and rigorous examination by the attorneys for the defense, the apparent object being to show that somebody—not too directly Patrick Calhoun—was "held up" by the hoodling former supervisors. But far, however, Gallagher has consistently held to the story told by him either in this or other trials.

At the rate thus far maintained the conclusion of the trial should be reached within another week or two.

The most startling event connected with the graft cases, during the past week, was the statement made by Henry Stauff. Stauff was a cellmate of Peter Claudianes in the Alameda county jail when the latter was being held for trial for dynamiting the home of James L. Gallagher, of which he later was convicted. Stauff was under imprisonment for robbery, and, according to his story, he and Claudianes became friendly. He says, in part:

"It was some time before Peter opened up to me. When he did he told me that he had been given money by Tom Gibson, head of the detective bureau of the United Railroads, and that this money was to pay him for getting Gallagher out of the way."

Later Claudianes gave Stauff letters (now in the hands of District Attorney Donahue of Alameda) to Gibson saying, according to Stauff's story, that "he (Gibson) would fix me (Stauff) up all right and that I could go ahead and get Gallagher." When Stauff visited Gibson, however, the detective failed to respond, and so Gallagher was not "got."

Stauff has no character, and his story must be accepted with hesitation, but, on the contrary, it must be remembered that somebody paid Claudianes for dynamiting the residence of Gallagher, and it is not impossible that this statement, even from such a source, may furnish the clue leading to the detection of the guilty, though the guilty in Oakland's dynamite outrages.

The Stockton grand jury has been investigating alleged grafting operations in connection with the police department of that city, and, if rumors are well founded, its report, when brought in, may seriously affect not only certain policemen but one of the city councilmen as well.

The cases in San Mateo county against District Attorney J. J. Bullock, Sheriff Robert S. Chatham, Supervisors John H. Coleman and J. C. Eickencropper, and former Supervisors J. Debenedetti and D. E. Blackburn, all indicted for grafting operations, were called for a hearing last week Thursday. They were set for trial next Tuesday, February 16th.

The prosecution consenting, Judge Lawlor has given Abraham Ruef until next Tuesday to perfect his bill of exceptions. Ruef has added James Pemberton to his line of lawyers.

("Darwin"—Continued.)

Embryology, the history of the stages by which the individual is made up.

With the development of Histology, Morphology and Embryology, we have developed the physiology of all sorts of organisms. We have learned what organs of all sorts can do, and experimental physiology is getting nearer and nearer the meaning of the condition we call life. But with all our increase of knowledge, we are no nearer the end of the problem.

Altered Phases of Darwinism.

The human belief in the heredity of results of use and disuse, and of the impact of environment, accepted by Darwin without question, has been practically eliminated from Darwinism. Inheritance of acquired characters in kind may not take place. The evidence seems all against it. But the thesis that external conditions do not cause germinant reactions is not yet clearly established. The discovery of Gregor Mendel as to dominant and recessive characters has proved a fruitful investigation in the methods of heredity. But no change in the theory of Darwinism is made necessary by it.

The investigations of Dr. De Vries have proved of great importance in suggesting fruitful lines of investigation. With all admiration for the painstaking and illuminating work of De Vries, I do not think that the question of the origin of species has been affected by it. Species in general do not arise through mutation, or the abrupt separation of one individual from the rest of its kind. If any single species should be shown to have arisen in this way, and this is yet to be done, it would not change the general relation of the recognized factors in Evolution, for a mutation, like any other variation, is dependent for preservation on heredity, on selection and on separation or isolation.

Extreme Views of Selection.

Since Darwin's time, natural selection has been exalted as all-powerful by many writers who went, as Darwinians, far beyond Darwin himself. In reaction, other authors have denied to selection, not merely Allmacht, or all sufficiency, but any sufficiency or reality at all. It is enough for our discussion to disclaim these extreme views. Selection must find its place. We know no other cause for the myriad adaptations of life to its environment. We know no other reason for specific adaptation.

The study of the geographical, faunal and geological distribution of life on the earth, which has been pursued with such energy and

LYRE AND LOOT

RAILROAD POEMS BY BURDETTE.

The Brakeman's Sweetheart.

My love is like a parlor car,
Perfection all her graces are;
Smoothly, without a frown or jar,

She runs by smiles;
Would she but couple on to me,
How happy then our lives would be,
And east or west—ah, wouldn't we Make sunny miles!

Her eyes electric lamps eclipse;
To think of running daily trips
With orders from her rose-bud lips—

It makes my head-light!
But sand and steam I seem to lack;
When I'd suggest a double-track,
Her lightning eyes they set me back
Quick as a red light.

I know she dearly loves to tease,
For once when on my bended knees,
I told her with what warmth you please,

How I adored her,—
With gauzy, perfumed fan outspread,
She lightly tapped her lover's head,
And bending over, softly said,
"Shoo, Joe, had order!"

Getting Even.

If I were a railway brakeman,

I'd call out the stations so plain

That the passengers booked for Texas

Would go clear through to Maine,

I'd open the door of the smoker

And give such a mighty roar

That the people back in the sleeper

Would fall out on the floor.

For I couldn't afford a tenor voice

That would murmur, and sigh, and speak,

In the soft, low tones of Aeolian harps

For eleven dollars a week.

If I were a baggage-master,

I'd rattle the trunks and boxes

I'd stand them up in the corner,

And shake their cargoes out;

I would pull the handles out by the roots,

I would kick the bottoms in,

And strew their stuffing around the car,

And make them jank and thum.

For I couldn't afford to wear kid gloves,

And put pads on my feet.

And fondle things gently, when all my pay

Just kept me in bread and meat.

If I were a railway conductor,

As through the train I'd go,

I'd have for every question asked—

This ready reply, "Don't know."

I'd miss connections for lots of men,

I'd run lone passengers past;

I'd tell them 'twas eight, when I knew 'twas ten.

And declare their watches fast.

For I couldn't afford to be civil

When I knew every man in the load

Would look at my watch and ring, and say:

"He stole them things from the road."

TRUE LINCOLN STORIES.

While many were clamoring for the execution of the Rebel leaders, especially Jefferson Davis, Mr. Lincoln said, a few days before his death: "This talk about Davis tires me. I hope he will mount a fleet horse, reach the shores of the Gulf of Mexico, and drive so far into the waters that we shall never see him again." And then he told perhaps his last story—of a boy in Springfield who saved up his money and bought a coon, which after the novelty wore off became a great nuisance.

He was one day leading him through the streets, and had his hands full to keep clear of the little vixen, which had torn his clothes half off him. At length he sat down on the curbstone, completely fagged out.

A man passing was stopped by the lad's disconsolate appearance, and asked the matter. "Oh," was the reply, "this coon is such a trouble to me." "Why don't you get rid of him, then?" said the stranger. "Hush," said the boy; "don't you see he is gnawing his rope off? I am going to let him do it, and then I will go home and tell the folks that he got away from me."

At the White House, one day, some gentlemen were present from the West, excited and troubled about the commissions and omissions of the Administration. The President heard them patiently, and then replied: "Gentlemen, suppose all the property you were worth was in gold, and you had put it in the hands of Blondin to carry across the Niagara River on a rope; would you shake the cable, or keep shouting out to him: 'Blondin, stand up a little straighter. Blondin, stoop a little more. Go a little faster. Lean a little more to the north. Lean a little more to the south?' 'No, you would hold your breath as well as your tongue, and keep your hands off until he was safely over. The Government is carrying an immense weight. Untold treasures are in their hands. They are doing the very best they can. Don't badger them. Keep silence, and we'll get you safely across.'"

To Governor Morgan of New York, shortly after the Emancipation Proclamation, the President said: "I do not agree with those who say that slavery is dead. We are like whalers who have been on a long chase—we have at last got the harpoon into the monster, but we must now look how we steer or with one 'flop' of his tail he will yet send us all into eternity."

Being asked at another time by an "anxious" visitor as to what he would do in certain contingencies—provided the rebellion was not subdued after three or four years of effort on the part of the Government—the President said: "There is no alternative but to keep pegging away."

THE WORK OF

Allen's Press Clipping Bureau FOR PUBLIC MEN

Allen's Press Clipping Bureau has now had experience in six National and five State Campaigns. In this time it has had the honor of serving hundreds of public men, including members of the Cabinet, U. S. Senators, Congressmen, Governors, State Senators and Assemblymen, Mayors, and State and County Central Committees.

It has aided these men by bringing them quickly, easily, and cheaply, what the entire press has to say of them or the measures in which they are interested.

A thorough clipping service discloses the state and trend of public opinion, brings to attention false charges that should be denied, true charges that should be parried; shows what editors need argument, and what editors need encouragement—in short, aids in handling the most powerful and important of political engines, the Press. Having three offices, a staff of thirty people, and reading 2,000 coast papers per week, we have now unsurpassed facilities for very high-grade and thorough work.

We can cover counties, districts, the State, or the Pacific States.

Rates will be furnished on application.

PERSONALIA

Maxine Elliott's winter home is at Ocean Park, California.

Gelett Burgess is finishing another Goop book, to be called "Blue Goops and Red."

Madison Gwinn, the Kentucky poet, regretfully denies that he is also a successful broker.

Miss Sara Dean of San Francisco, author of "Travers," a story of the great fire, is in Australia gathering literary material.

Jack London is sick in Sydney, and may call off his trip around the world in the Snark, and come back to San Francisco.

Mrs. Gertrude Atherton expects to remain in California for a year or more to complete the literary work she has now in hand.

Arthur Stringer, the poet, claims that the idea of "The Vampire," George Sylvester Viereck's play, was stolen from his novel, "The Silver Poppo."

Mrs. Frances Hodgson Burnett has written a play, "The Dawn of a To-morrow," in which Eleanor Robson has made a success at the Lyceum theatre in New York.

Emperor William has conferred the decoration of the Order Pour Le Merite on J. S. Sargent, the American artist, in recognition of his pre-eminence as a portrait painter.

Broughton Brandenburg, the writer who was charged with forging the famous "Cleveland letter" of the last presidential campaign, is now charged with having one surplus wife.

President John H. Finley, of the University of the City of New York, is one of the thirty-seven original and only proponents of the name, "The World's Work," for that magazine.

George Ade's latest is "The Fair Co-Ed," with Elsie Janis in the title role. The scene is Bingham College, the hated rival of the Atwater College that figured in "The College Widow."

Doctor Waldstein, Slade professor of fine art at Cambridge University, England, declares that women used false hair 5000 years B. C., and that false teeth, rouge, and razor-date back to 400 B. C.

Next Monday Dr. John B. Deaver, chief surgeon of the German hospital in Philadelphia, will be banqueted by 125 brother physicians and surgeons whose appendices have been removed by Doctor Deaver.

George Gray Barnard is probably America's foremost sculptor and he is so poor that he has lately suffered almost for the necessities of life. The Pennsylvania capitol grafters wiped him off the slate financially.

Horace Fletcher, whose theory of masticating food has achieved world-wide fame, used to belong to the Olympic Club in San Francisco. He has the further distinction of being one millionaire who has a digestion left.

Miss Olga Nethersole believes that Rudyard Kipling is the author of "An Englishman's Home," a war play about which all England is talking. The play was produced in London two weeks ago with no author's name given.

John W. Alexander, the great American portrait painter, once escaped being kicked off General Grant's porch by the general himself only by jumping first. The reason was that Grant hated "Harpers," for which Alexander was then drawing illustrations.

On the occasion of Lina Cavalieri's recent appearance in opera in New York she received a telegram of congratulation from the rival artist, Mary Garden. It was in French and read: "Je vous embrasse avec tout mon coeur." The Western Union operator was not familiar with the idiom and what Miss Cavalieri received was a message that concluded with "I embarrass you and tout my ear. Mary Garden."

SHEAR WIT

The German people have merely handed Emperor William a sort of reign check, as it were.—Yonkers Statesman.

In charity let it be remembered that Mr. Willett is a newcomer to Congress. It was only the gentlemen's inaugural bawl.—Pittsburg Gazette Times.

"Aren't my measurements the same as they were three years ago?" proudly inquired the fat man. "Yes, sir, about the same," replied the tailor. "Chest a little lower down, that's all, sir."

A boy rushed up to a policeman and said: "Say, there's a man around there what's been fightin' with my father for almost an hour." "Why didn't you call me before?" asked the policeman. "Well," said the kid, "paw was gettin' the best of it up to a few minutes ago."—Bartlesville Enterprise.

"No one understands me!" he groaned; "no one on earth." It is the old story wrung from many a tortured, youthful heart. The sufferer is generally mistaken, but the pain is no less poignant. Yet in this instance the man's complaint was true. Nobody on earth could understand him. For he was an announcer of trains at the Union Station.—Cleveland Leader.

The other-people's-business man persisted in trying to extract information from a prosperous-looking elderly man next him in the Pullman smoker. "Mow many people work in your office?" he asked. "Oh," said the elderly man, getting up and throwing away his cigar, "I should say, at a rough guess, about two-thirds of them."—Everybody's.

Eggs-actly—"Why don't a hen lay eggs at night?" asked little Tommy Wood. "Because, my son," his pa replied, "At night a hen's a rooster."

Each in Season.—In winter dogs leave off their pants. In spring the lambs are dressed. And in the good old summertime The lover's suit is pressed.

A Blunderbus.—He kissed the lady by mistake. She raised an awful fuss. And now he's driven from her side By his own blunder-buss.

Bacteria.—In France they're known as "Parasites," in Germany as "Germs" in Ireland they're called "McCrobes," in Wurttemberg, plain "Worms."—Yonkers Statesman.

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

The Presidential Office.

One of the last things that the makers of our Constitution of the United States did, before they looked upon their work and pronounced it good, was to put the finishing touches to the provisions fixing the status of the presidential office. The conviction was that, in the Senate, property had been sufficiently safeguarded, the "first characters" (the aristocracy) assured of the ascendancy, the power and autonomy of the small states preserved against being overwhelmed by the big states, and the sovereignty of all the states protected against encroachment on the part of the national government. It was felt that in the House of Representatives a field sufficiently broad had been afforded for discussion of public affairs and popular representation given as much of a voice as was prudent.

But, it was felt, nowhere in the scheme of government had the nation found a champion able and willing to defend the interests of the nation as a whole. It was to meet this requirement of national unity that the presidential office was established as it was.

Nevertheless, the people of the nation as a whole were not directly trusted by the convention to nominate and elect their president. Another one of a long series of compromises was entered into whereby divergent views were converged upon a policy, quite as disastrous to those who gave as to those who received concessions, and electors were ordained to make the final choice. It was felt that public safety required that the electorate be placed at least one remove from the selection of the executive head of the nation, but "we the people," changed all that without going to the trouble of changing the constitution. We did it by instructing the presidential electors whom to vote for. They have no more discretion in the premises than the steam cylinder in a locomotive allows the piston rod.

Once again it is necessary to recall attention to the fact that we have a government on paper, and a government not on paper. It was intended by the makers of the constitution that the presidential office should represent the interests of the nation in a far-reaching way, but it was not intended that the presidential office should be especially responsive to the popular will, yet such is the fact. There is a reciprocal relation there that would have frightened the constitution makers half out of their wits had they suspected its presence.

Not only is the presidential office more directly responsive to public sentiment, but the president can appeal to, and arouse into active support of his policies, whatever power there is in public sentiment more readily than any other department of government.

Well it is for this reason, notwithstanding the fear of the "man on horseback" who, we have been taught to fear, might, with the support of a militant but erring rabble, subvert popular liberties and establish a dictatorship on the ruins of representative government. The enemy of representative government has not proven to be the man on horseback or the rabble, but special interests entrenched in Senate and House, in courts and legislatures, in conventions and party control. If ever the dreaded "man on horseback" is forced into action it will be these special and selfish interests that will do the forcing by reason of their cunning devices for causing representative government to fail of representing.

A continuous thwarting of the will of the people begets a resistance that is first disheartening, then stubborn and finally vindictive and careless of consequences. It is only when president and public stand together, as they have stood for the last seven years, that the public interests are well considered and predatory interests, entrenched in Congress and the organizations of political parties, successfully withstood, and yet this stupendous fact never entered into the calculations of the constitution makers. They built far better than they knew.

The presidential office is the greatest within the gift of any people on this earth, but it is not always that great men have filled it. Of two dozen men who have filled the office, not more than one-third can lay claim to greatness, but if great men have not been uniformly selected for that office it has been the fault of temporizing and timid politicians, rather than the fault of the people, that big men were not selected.

The constitution does not contemplate the executive office having more to do with shaping legislation than calling congressional attention to the needs of the country and vetoing measures deemed to be injurious, but it is written in the law of necessity that important legislation must be prepared in advance by executive agencies and submitted to congress for action, as in the government of Great Britain. There have long been measures known, sub voce, as "administration" measures. Ere long important legislation will originate in this way and will better fit the need by being so prepared. It will give the nation, as a whole, a much needed initiative.

Do You Hear Well?

The Stolz Electrophone—A New, Electrical, Scientific and Practical Invention for those who are Deaf or Partially Deaf.

MAY NOW BE TESTED IN YOUR OWN HOME.

Deaf or partially deaf people now may make a trial of the Stolz Electrophone at home. This personal, practical test serves to prove that the device satisfies, with ease, every requirement of a perfect hearing device.

This new invention renders unnecessary such clumsy, ungainly and frequently harmful devices as ear trumpets, horns, tubes, ear drums, fans, etc. It is a true electric telephone that fits on the ear and which, the instant it is applied, magnifies the sound waves in such manner as to cause an astonishing increase in the clearness of all sounds. It overcomes the buzzing and roaring ear noises and, also, so constantly and electrically exercises the vital parts of the ear that, usually, the natural unaided hearing itself is gradually restored.

THE PLEDGE OF CITIZENSHIP

I, a citizen of the United States of America, realizing that a free Republic is an impossibility unless the citizen performs his civic duty, hereby pledge myself upon my sacred honor never to fail to exercise my right of citizenship by voting at every election, primary or secondary, wherever it is possible and legal for me to render that service to my country, my health permitting me so to do.

In taking this pledge it is distinctly understood that I in no way obligate myself to vote for any particular party, any definite candidate or any certain measure. I am binding myself only to my Country, and pledging myself solely to the faithful performance of the duty I owe to her as a citizen.

Address:

WHY TAKE THE FOREGOING PLEDGE?

Those taking the foregoing pledge, signing and sending it to this office, will be enrolled upon The California Weekly's "School for Citizenship," which will be a permanent feature of this paper. It will entitle the person sending in his name to have answered, either through the columns of the paper or by letter, any rational question he may ask concerning public affairs, and, generally, by the person best equipped to afford the desired information. It will also entitle the signer to such special literature bearing upon the obligations and opportunities of good citizenship as may from time to time be issued. While this pledge is open to persons of all ages it is especially desired that it be taken and sent in by young men lately become voters or who will cast their first votes two years hence. It will take but a moment to clip out the pledge, sign, enclose in an envelope, stamp and address to "School for Citizenship," office The California Weekly, 26 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, and it opens the way for a liberal education in citizenship.

A COLOSSUS OF RAILROADS.

Whoever cares little for his own reputation will care little for the reputation of his state, but whoever cherishes a solicitude for the cleanness and dignity of his own repute will care greatly for the fame and name of the state in which he resides, for the city in which he lives. With what humiliation of spirit, then, must every true Californian, who saw the article, have read what the New York Evening Post had to say under the editorial title: "A Colossus of Railroads."

The New York Evening Post is anything but a reformer. It is conservative to the verge of being old foggy, and representative of conservative moneyed interests. It has persistently opposed President Roosevelt and his policies. It has deplored all manner of muck-raking, and yet the spectacle of the political subservency of California to the "Colossus of Railroads" moves it to pity, and pity is a harder thing for a brave people to endure than hatred. Pity is seldom far from contempt. California, under the domination of Mr. Harriman and his hired man, is looked upon by the Post something as the civilized world looks upon the Congo Free State under the domination of King Leopold. What could be more humiliating than that?

But the Post wisely sees that unless California can free herself from this injurious domination the fate of California awaits many another commonwealth in this union. In control of nearly one-third of the railroad mileage of the United States, the power in Mr. Harriman's control assumes such proportions as this country never saw before, and the advancement of Mr. Herrin, one of the most cunning political manipulators our political system has developed, to second in command is fair warning to other states of what they are soon to face. It means that Mr. Harriman is not to be content with the pre-eminence in American railroading, but in statecraft also.

The concern of the New York Evening Post is not primarily for California, nor yet for other states about whom the tentacles of this octopus are entwining. That paper is the spokesman of conservative capital, of capital that has been carefully accumulated and wishes to be wisely, lawfully and safely employed. This sort of capital, not predatory in its instincts, foresees a titanic struggle between lovers of freedom and seekers after despotic power, and it knows that in that contest conservative capital is as likely to get hurt as predatory. It is this that has prompted the mouthpiece of conservative capitalism to give warning of an evil that portends.

It should be plain to thoughtful persons, no matter in what walk of life, that the battle the Lincoln-Roosevelt League is waging to make California a free state is not being waged for California alone. It is being waged as certainly for Oregon, for Nevada, Arizona, Texas, for all the states west of the Mississippi river and south of the northern tier of commonwealths, for Illinois and south to the gulf and, with no small probability, for New York itself, hitherto governed by the New York Central which Mr. Harriman is now to govern. It is a great danger that threatens free institutions in the rise of this "Colossus of Railroads." California, more than any other commonwealth in the union, is out on the firing line.

The present is no time for civic slothfulness. The freemen in the legislature, battling for a workable direct primary, for efficient control of railroads within the state, for the initiative that will permit the people to make laws when their representatives refuse to obey the popular will, need help and need it now. Allied with these forces in the legislature are the devoted men who are striving, under the handicap of a technical and unsympathetic appellate judiciary, to convict men of crime who have not the hardihood publicly to deny their guilt.

Does not the heart of every man worthy to be called a man burn within him when he takes these things to heart?

THE RECALL.

The wrestling match Los Angeles is having with the recall of her mayor will be watched with great interest all over the country. The recall has yet to prove its utility. It has been given a place in many city charters, more because it was felt that it would not be a bad thing to include than because of its practical, positive good that was to be expected of it. Its enemies have looked upon it as a mischief-maker, its friends as a club to hold suspended over the heads of officials who might otherwise grow careless of their responsibilities. Los Angeles is performing a real service by testing the recall. Of one thing we may rest assured the American people are going to govern and if they cannot govern without the recall they will govern with it.

THE TARIFF COMMISSION CONVENTION.

It is too early to say what, if any, good thing is likely to come out of the national tariff commission convention in Indianapolis. There are reasons for fearing that many delegates went there for no other purpose than to support the commission idea in the hope of thereby postponing tariff revision that they may longer enjoy the benefits of special privilege. This element should not dominate. The extra session of Congress should effect at least a provisional readjustment of tariff schedules.

But it is impossible that Congress, so unwieldy as to numbers and so ill informed as to facts, can make a tariff schedule that will bear the test of a discriminating criticism. The result is not what ought to be but what can be effected. It takes the direction of the impacts of innumerable selfish interests, all striving for advantage. It is as much a bargain counter as a political convention composed of delegates out for the best trades that can be made with little concern for the common good.

The commission idea has long been in the public mind, but it has not taken shape because no one has undertaken to shape it. It is for Congress to say what principles shall apply, whether tariff shall be for protection with incidental revenue, or for revenue with incidental protection, but the working out of the schedules by the application of accepted principles should be the task of trained men constantly at work. If the Indianapolis convention shall be the means of establishing such a commission of expert tariff adjusters it will prove itself to have been splendidly worth while.

Judge Graham's idea of a special divorce court is not half bad, but why not make the juvenile and divorce courts one? It is out of the broken family that the juvenile delinquents come.

Last summer's direct primary in Kansas cost the several counties all the way from twenty-eight cents for each vote cast up to three dollars and fifty cents, owing to whether or not the voters turned out. The next reform should be to assess the cost of voting upon those who do not vote in the form of fines. Compulsory voting is coming.

NEW FORESTRY LEGISLATION.

There is no other state in the union so concerned for the preservation of its forested areas, its watersheds and the water-carrying capacity of its rivers, as California, yet, so far as the state itself is concerned, barely a beginning has been made in this work of construction and that beginning had to be made in the teeth of the opposition of the political powers in this commonwealth.

It is time that the true history of this situation were told. About five years ago the California Water and Forest Association appealed to the United States Forestry Service for aid. That service prepared a perfected bill for a forestry law for California. The association approved it and recommended it to the legislature.

As soon as the bill reached the legislature the Southern Pacific political bureau had it pocketed. It meant expense to the company in patrolling its timbered lands, and in safeguarding from fire lands not its own, and the session was far advanced before the fact of pocketing became known. Whereupon a few friends of the measure appealed to Governor Pardee and he exerted executive influence for taking it out of pocket and bringing it up for discussion. Powerful influences were exerted against the measure and those who should have rallied to its support were inactive. Hence the contest narrowed down substantially to the governor and his official family in support of the measure, and the "powers that be" opposed, the governor being aided by a few enlightened enthusiasts from southern California.

Concessions had to be made or defeat sustained, but Governor Pardee was determined that at least a beginning toward a forestry policy for California should be made at that session. Fortune so favored the contest that a beginning was made, but only a beginning. Enough was accomplished, it was thought, to carry on a work of education among lumbermen, timber owners and county officials throughout the state, for the promotion of a mutual understanding between all interests and harmonious effort for the common good. Such hopes have been more than realized. A clearer understanding and better feeling exists among all interests than ever before.

Two years ago a new governor took office, a governor who knew all about forestry from the ax-man's point of view and nothing at all from any other. He early announced his hostility to the whole movement, whereupon he found himself the focus for such emphatic protests from all parts of California as soon changed his attitude and he is now believed to be in sympathy with up-to-date forestry policies.

Elsewhere in this paper will be found an article on proposed forestry legislation from the pen of G. B. Lull, State Forester. Mr. Lull is all right. This paper will vouch for him, but the State Board of Forestry could be improved, though not in the way proposed by Senator Holohan.

There is no need for a state board of forestry, certainly not for one composed of men who know nothing of forestry, but a great deal about politics. The need is for a forestry department in the state government with a state forester in charge, answerable to governor and legislature and to no one else. The state board idea is bad wherever applied. It makes for inefficiency, for lack of responsibility, for increase of political patronage, but there is no pressing need for change at this time. When California comes to its senses it will abolish all its commissions and substitute departments therefor, but until that happy event takes place the state board of forestry may well remain as it is. The need is for more money, more men and more efficient control of forested lands, public and private. Mr. Lull presents the case fully. Every true Californian should read and ponder well what he has to say. Then he should write to his assemblyman and senator to push the good bills through and kill the bad one—the one that Holohan is working for.

AS OTHERS SEE US.

The New York Outlook, of the 15th instant, contains an editorial entitled, "Hetch-Hetchy Valley Again." It is whimsical and so weak as to ill behoove so valuable a periodical, and yet it fairly voices easterners' attitude toward San Francisco. Our city is looked upon as having in it no moral health. We have ourselves uncovered a putrid mass of internal corruption and exposed the unsightly sore to the observation of all the world, but we have neither cut the cancer nor purged our municipal system of the rottenness. Until we do San Francisco will not be able to command the sympathy, co-operation and respect of the rest of the nation.

The Outlook demands to know why, if the Spring Valley Water company has been a corrupter of our courts and municipal legislature, San Francisco has not herself swept out of office corrupt judges and supervisors instead of asking permission to wash herself clean in Hetch-Hetchy. It also expresses the fear that if Hetch-Hetchy valley is placed in the custody of San Francisco, for the protection of the purity of the water supply, some new Schmitz or Ruef will make merchandise of the situation and extort injurious tolls of those who would make use of one of the nation's playgrounds.

Who is responsible for the existence of this eastern attitude of mind toward San Francisco in particular and California in general? There are those who will answer very promptly: "Those who uncovered the mass of corruption." Those who say this are themselves corrupt and deserve to be shunned by all men as unclean. These are they who are now preventing the administration of justice in this city. But for such as these the graft cases would long since have come to an end and guilty men would now be expiating their crimes against this otherwise splendid city. More than all else failure to convict and punish confessed bribers and grafters is standing between San Francisco and the procuring of a healthful and sufficient water supply for all time.

The East is too far away to perceive with what heroism, patience and persistence the relatively few are striving to enforce the laws and to uphold the integrity of San Francisco. Not many eastern people adequately know that at every test of manhood the majority of San Francisco's adult men vote right. All that is seen is that graft is not punished, that technical courts sacrifice substantial justice to immaterial procedure, that a venal press flourishes and that the enemies of San Francisco, within San Francisco, flaunt their infidelity in the faces of all and are not brought to book.

If public sentiment in this city were what it ought to be, if we could see ourselves as others see us, face to face, an aroused public sentiment would overwhelm corruptionists and their apologists in one speedy, condign ruin, and the city by the Golden Gate would stand forth radiant, asking no good thing of the nation that would not be given her.

LEARN AND UNLEARN.

It has been said that the average longevity of an accepted truth is only about eighteen years, by which time we discover that what was supposed to be true was not true, but, at best, only a glimpse at the truth. The longevity of error is much greater. Untruths regarding Washington, very many of them, are a century old and are still doing injury to the character and influence of a man who deserved better things of his country. It is well enough to make statues of Washington, but not wooden Indians, for if ever there was a flesh and blood man it was the Father of his country.

Elsewhere in this paper will be found an article upon Washington the man in a setting befitting a human being. It should help those who read it to get the wooden image out of the mind where it was implanted in childhood and put in its place a living image of a great personality. No one thinks of Lincoln as a manikin and no one should think of Washington as a manikin, or allow his children to form such a conception of him.

Is there not a duty here which patriotism can perform—the rescuing of a great reputation from a false and stilted existence in the minds of men? If we are to do this we must set about it by deliberately unlearning much that we have learned. We must forget that Washington was immaculate, for he was not. He gave way to transports of anger and depths of melancholy and he went on sprees of hilarity and fun-making out in the "quarters" where his negro slaves entertained him and he them. He loved his own case and was a good liver, but never did times or circumstances demand of him that which he was inadequate to supply. He was as far seeing as Lincoln and his judgment was as sound. He was self forgetful only when the good of his country required self-forgetfulness of him. He was the one great English-American—soldier, patriot, and statesman—and we who now live owe it to him to recover his fame from a wooden imagery and make of it a living presence in a land that has no more true heroes than it needs to have in order to keep the nation's aspirations above the muck of mere money-getting.

Once we, in California, had the party designation at the head of our ballot. We took it off and then we put it on again. Now it is proposed to take away the circle for voting a party ticket straight. Let it alone. Cannot our statesmen play thumbs-up and thumbs-down with anything except our ballot? This thing of trying to make men independent who are not independent, discriminating who are not discriminating, is wasted effort. Besides, the right of fumble-fingered and fuddle-brained electors to stand up and be counted is not to be infringed with safety to the public. If they are forced to be independent against their wills they will vote around just for luck and will make the ship of state unsteady on her keel. If the died-in-the-wools are told off and counted out, the balance of power is like enough to be held by persons with balanced minds, as fortunate a condition as may be hoped for. Let the party circle alone.

Paradise Ridge.

Three thousand and seven of the sons of the compatriots of Andrew Jackson were summoned into court and forced to confess their unfitness for the performance of a high duty of citizenship by reason of their having taken an intelligent interest in human affairs. A pronounced compliment to the intelligence of Middle Tennessee was a demonstrated detriment to the administration of justice. But for the existence of Paradise Ridge it might have proven impossible to secure a jury before whom to try the Coopers for the murder of former Senator Carmack. One can picture in his mind Paradise Ridge up among the stunted pines where the people live on cone pines baked in a dutch oven and by stealing one another's mast-fed hogs. San Francisco possesses a Tar Flat and a Barbary Coast, quite too intelligent, but no Paradise Ridge, and therefore may have to try the graft cases before packed juries. Either our laws should be so amended as to permit intelligent men to sit on juries or sheriffs should be permitted to summon jurors from Tailholt, Grub Gulch or Hardscrabble.

Quite Characteristic.

It is reported from Chicago that "Skinny" Madden has been caught in the act of taking a bribe from employers for preventing a strike, Madden being a representative of organized labor. The Chicago Federation of Labor is pressing at Springfield the enactment of a law making it a felony for any person to give or receive a bribe in the course of any labor dispute. The Contractors' Council and the Illinois Manufacturers' Association laugh this proposal to scorn and, per contra, have introduced a bill providing fine and imprisonment for any person convicted of demanding or receiving money for ordering or calling off any strike. As for the briber, nothing is proposed to be done to him. Will somebody please pass around the apple from the tree of knowledge of good and evil that employers, as well as employed, may eat of it and learn that there is no difference in morals between the briber and the bribed?

Grand Prizes Few.

The year 1809 was notable for the birth of great babies. In this particular it stands out conspicuously among all the years of the nineteenth century, a veritable year of jubilee, and yet in all Europe and America, there were born that year only ten babies who afterwards took front rank among the world's great, and not all of these will prove of imperishable memory. They were Lincoln and Gladstone among statesmen; Tennyson, Poe, Holmes, Fitzgerald and Elizabeth Barrett Browning among poets; Chopin and Mendelssohn among musicians, and Charles Darwin, man of science. How many blank babies, or babies that proved to be capital prizes only in their own households, were drawn in the baby lottery that year there is no means of knowing, but there must have been many millions. Nature is prodigal of everything except of geniuses.

Justice Gone Wrong Again.

Major Harvey W. Salmon, of Clinton, Missouri, did bad banking. He was indicted, convicted and sentenced to prison for three years. There was no question as to his guilt, but at the request of the grand jury that indicted him, and by the consent of the court, a stenographer was allowed in the jury room to take down the testimony. The Supreme Court of Missouri could find no law authorizing the presence of a stenographer in a grand jury room and therefore quashed the indictments against Salmon and he is now at large. Two years having gone by, it is not believed that he can again be indicted, tried and convicted.

What will the Lord God Almighty do to that supreme court by and by?

An Index to Jewish Sentiment.

Unkind things have been said and written about the attitude of Jewish people in San Francisco toward the prosecution of graft, and it cannot be denied that there are Jews whose love for money blinds them to higher considerations of morality and public policy, but a good indication of Jewish sentiment toward civic righteousness was lately furnished at St. Louis where Rabbi Leon Harrison addressed a great audience at Temple Israel on "What Lincoln Would Do If He Were In St. Louis." After analyzing conditions in St. Louis, and charging that the responsibilities lay not far from the synagogue where his hearers were then sitting, his audience, unrestrained by considerations for the time and place, broke out into vigorous clapping of the hands. The status of no man toward civic right is to be accounted for by race, creed or color. The issue is one of moral perception and, heaven be praised, there is no church, temple, congregation or club in which the new gospel of a moralized industrial, commercial and political life is not being heard with increasing approval.

Worthy of Special Consideration.

Charles W. Morse was no ordinary male factor. He played the game with millions, wrecked a whole chain of banks and ruined confiding depositors by the thousand. Therefore he is deemed worthy of special consideration. The pillars and pastors of all the churches he ever attended, the high financiers of Wall street, the Guggenheims and other great names with which financiers are wont to conjure, have joined in a petition to admit Morse to bail while the higher courts take their guess at whether or not the proceedings in the case which resulted in his conviction, and sentencing to prison for fifteen years, were according to Hoyle. Backed by such influences it is to be doubted if even a United States court can keep its grip on Morse, and yet he brushed aside all the laws enacted for the protection of banking as though they had been so many spider webs stretched across his path of a spring morning.

How Miscegenation Works.

In Mexico there are Mexicans, in language, complexion, habits of thought, mental and moral character who bear Latinized forms of such names as McManus, O'Neil, Flaherty. Adventurous sons of Erin stray below the Rio Grande, married and reared families, died and left half-castes to succeed to their fortunes. These married Mexican men or women and their progeny was only quarter-blood Irish, these in turn married in the neighborhood and their children were only one-eighth part Irish and so on until nothing Irish remained except a latinized form of the Irish name. So it would be with us if only now and again a Japanese or Chinese married an American. In four generations almost the last vestige of Mongolian strain of blood would be extinct, and no great harm done, except to the immediate descendants who would suffer embarrassment, and, possibly, ostracism, because of that which was no fault of their own. But permit Asiatics to come to us in large numbers, so that intermarriage would become common between the races, and we should rear up a half-caste population of such large proportions as to constitute a grave social problem. This is a principal reason why the many should be kept out and only the few allowed to land, for the few can be swallowed up and, in time, lost sight of. Intermarriage there will be if Mongolian emigrants prosper and grow rich among us, as they are certain to do.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

Myth has played a great part in the childhoods of races, as great a part, perhaps, as in the childhoods of individual men and women, but as there comes a time when men and women put away childish things, so is it with nations in regard to the peoples with whom fables has filled the air, the hollows in the trees, the caves in the rocks. They are banished.

When one thinks on the universality of belief, in former times, in sprites, elfins, goblins, ghouls, and gods, he is inclined to ask himself if there may not have been some basis for that belief. Paul found the Athenians somewhat superstitious, but he did not try to banish from their minds belief in supernatural beings. He rather added to their store an unknown god that they should come to know. When Jesus took little children upon his knees and blessed them, he told those who had gathered near that the angels of these living children were ever before the face of the Father. What did he mean by that if not that children have invisible watchers and caretakers?

What would the literature of Ibsen be worth but for his mischievous trolls that cause sane persons to do insane things, or that of Hauptmann but for his trolls, or of Goethe without his Wolpurgis nights upon the Brocken? And how shall we commune with the saints, in whose existence we weakly reaffirm our belief, if there are none with whom we may commune? God is spirit. Does it not follow that the world of spirit must be a very real world, and only our world subject to unending change and incapable of perceiving spirit, unreal? Is not belief in an unseen world rational, rather than irrational and whimsical, a world no great way from any of us and which we are likely to step into any day? Even as materialistic a writer as Henry Maudsley, the physiologist, confesses that it may well be that unseen presences, whether of substances or of mind through the half conscious, sleeping ear.

Of course we all know in a vague way that the all-seeing eye of God is ever upon us, but somehow we come to feel that God must be pretty busy elsewhere and that we may be able to slip out of sight if we are real shy. The omnipresence of God is accepted something as we accept wise old axioms, not to be questioned, but not realized as a positive, awesome, never-failing, daily and hourly fact. If the idea of that majestic presence were borne in upon us until we were fairly "up against it," so to speak, it would frighten half of us half out of our wits.

But suppose that we believed, in some vital way, in the possible presence of those who have gone before, or that we also, as well as little children, have our angels before whose faces we stand as they stand before the faces of the Father, how would it be with us then? What would be the walk through life of the young man who felt the presence of his dead mother, elbow to elbow, at his side? How would it be with us, if we were sure, that we are never alone, but have ever at our sides some presence, seeing though unseen?

And what is more likely? Suppose that the world has 2,000,000,000 human beings, with an entire change of personnel three times in a century, and sixty centuries since the dawn of human history, 360,000,000,000 of them, to say nothing of unnumbered centuries struggling out of the mists up to that dawn! An innumerable host of departed spirits surely! And to what better service can a part of them be devoted than to tell us, if perchance they may catch us off our guard and so whisper some good suggestion into our subconscious ear?

The moral of all this is that it is a rational presumption that there is and can be no such thing from cradle to grave as being alone, unwatched and unwarded. If a consciousness of this probable truth could bear in upon us until it touched us at every point and always, it would save our feet from many a slip, our walk through life from many a stumble.

THE WORLD AT LARGE

Workman Capitalists.

The United States Steel Corporation found it hard to induce its workmen to take stock in its enterprises, even upon the most favorable terms, but persistent effort won success and now $21,000,000 of the capital stock of that corporation is held by its employees. Upon this stock, $12,000,000 in dividends has been paid. There are relatively few industrial enterprises in America that the laborers working therein could not own in ten years if they were to husband their resources carefully, combine them trustfully and use them honestly. A main trouble is that we are a hard-nosed nation of savers and we distrust management whether in our own hands or others.

A Difficulty in Regulation.

The Illinois legislature is striving to make the lives of trainmen safer and, with that end in view, is considering a bill limiting the number of cars in a freight train to fifty and requiring three brakemen to every such train. The Chicago, Burlington and Quincy railroad objects to this measure and for the following reasons: It has just expended $4,000,000 in reconstruction work in order that it may haul cheaper grades of Illinois coal to the blizzard states in competition with higher price coal from farther east that can stand heavier freight charges. Great sums have also been expended in powerful locomotives and big freight cars controlled by air brakes so as not to need any "braking" at all. This merely emphasizes the difficulty of legislating intelligently with regard to railroad control. A transportation commission, with discretionary power, seems indispensable.

The Waters-Pierce Ouster.

The Waters-Pierce Oil Company was convicted of violating the Missouri anti-trust law, fined $50,000 and required either to sever all connection with the Standard Oil Company or cease to do business in the state. It has paid its fine, but asks the court to permit it to do business without ceasing connection with the Standard but under the supervision of the court and in such a way as to guarantee legitimate conduct on its part. That is, the court is to have power to fix the price of oil and to prevent price cutting in one locality in order to crush out competition, then recouping losses by raising the price somewhere else, a policy the Standard Oil, and all of its branches, have employed incessantly from the first. This would prove a dangerous precedent and a step toward state management of commercial business not necessary to be taken, the more especially as Missouri courts are little better to be trusted than Missouri corporations.

Diaz to Run Again.

Porfirio Diaz first became president of the Republic of Mexico in 1877 and held office for four years, after which he held office another four years by proxy, he being the power behind the presidential chair. He was elected president again in 1884 and has held the office ever since, and now petitions are being circulated asking him to run again next year. He is getting to be an old man and not very strong in body, but his hold on the Mexican army and political machinery is so strong that he can hold the presidential office for life if he wants to, and he seems to want to. The commercial interests will want him to continue in office for, in all its history, Diaz has been the only ruler (for that is what he is) able to give Mexico a stable government. Long live Diaz! May he succeed himself again and yet again. But to call Mexico a republic is a joke.

The Jewish Review Coming.

The Jewish Review is one of the highest-class magazines in the world. It has long been published, quarterly, in London, and circulates all over the Jewish world, but it is about to be removed from London to New York and for the reason that New York has become the world's center for Jewish culture, wealth and influence. One-fourth of the population of New York is Jewish. This incident is significant in showing the advancement of the Jewish race upon American soil. Its predominating portion is in America, not Europe.

Bigger Ships, Deeper Water.

Ship builders see no limit to the bigness of ships that may be successfully constructed, launched and sailed over the seas if only the harbor channels can be made, and maintained, deep enough to float them. French builders desire to construct, French investors to own and French merchants to furnish cargoes for a 35,000 ton merchantman, but the harbor of Havre will not allow so great a vessel to pass in or out over the bar. The French senate is disposed to come to the rescue of the big ship by expending $20,000,000 in securing a 40-foot channel and it is believed that the other departments of government will coincide with the policy, but to what other port can such a ship take its way? What other harbor has a 40-foot channel?

A Layman's Movement.

The general tendency of the common man to assert himself in all affairs that concern him is manifesting itself in nearly all parts of the United States, in laymen coming to the front in church affairs, assuming a share of the hitherto heretofore imposed upon clergymen and women members, and proceeding to do things for the church and, through the church, for society. The progressive laymen are not inclined to "take orders," as it would be called in politics, but insist upon helping to determine what should be done as well as to do things after agreeing to a program. Some of the older ecclesiastics are a little dubious about letting go of the reins, but the younger ones welcome the new tendency heartily.

Another Transcontinental.

The Canadian Northern railroad started across the continent some years ago, up where the world is small around and where the snows lie deep, but it is pushing ahead and is now laying its plans more definitely to reach the Pacific ocean. Its terminus is now at Edmonton in northern Alberta, but it will push on through the Yellow Head pass and down the North Thompson river to the Fraser and thence to Westminster and to Vancouver. While it will compete mainly with the Canadian Pacific it will be a factor in trans-Pacific commerce as well as transcontinental and will prove a factor to be reckoned with even in California.

The Danger From Dust.

Chicago, in its warfare against tuberculosis and pneumonia, has been making a careful study of the dust problem. It has found that, in the down town streets of that city, twenty inhalations of air will bring into the system from as few as eleven to as many as 370 disease germs, and that during the operation of street sweeping by machine the danger is increased seventy times. The best safeguard yet found is a hand patrol with hose washings into the gutter from which the wet dirt can be removed in wagons. This will cost one-half more than machine methods, but will prove important in life saving, and Chicago seems likely to enter upon the reformed, though more costly, method of keeping its streets clean and preserving its citizens alive.

Liberia.

The attempt to found a prosperous Negro republic in Liberia has not turned out well, even with Uncle Sam's benignant winking at the enterprise from time to time, which is about all he has done for it. It has between 40,000 and 50,000 civilized inhabitants, largely the descendants of American Negroes, and they are poor and shiftless and, although in a country of great agricultural resources, they have done nothing worth while. It is now proposed that the United States shall take a renewed interest in Liberia and, as a beginning, an appropriation of $20,000 is asked for to defray the expenses of a commission to go there and make a thorough investigation into conditions.

Liquor Legislation in Indiana.

Indiana has had uppermost in its legislative mind this winter the control of the liquor business. One influence stood for prohibition; one for county option; one for city, ward and precinct option and, as a compromise measure, what is known as the Proctor-Tomlinson bill has passed the lower house and seems likely to become a law. It will give incorporated towns city and ward option, but prohibits the sale of liquor everywhere outside of incorporated towns. This should not prove a bad example for other states to follow.

A Jewish Revision of the Bible.

A new translation of the Scripture is being prepared under the joint auspices of the Jewish Publication Society of America and the Central Conference of American Rabbis. This new version will be a careful revision of the Authorized, or St. James's, Version, with a view to bringing it more closely into the form in which the synagogue has handed down the original text. Errors of translation will be corrected, but the classic English of the old version will be kept intact except where absolutely unintelligible words mar its force.

WASHINGTON IN HIS TRUE SETTING

By J. D. GALLOWAY.

Not many days have passed since I walked along a brick paved pathway among white oaks at Mount Vernon and stood at last alone before the tomb of Washington. I had stepped from the present into the past; from the life of the struggling city which bears the name of the great president to the quiet of his home on the bank of the majestic river. The single group of visitors which had come with me on the same mission I had allowed to precede me. I had turned off into the garden and in this way succeeded in being alone. A visit to such a place as the home of Washington, where memory should be allowed full play and where sentiment should be given the freest range, is marred by the comment of even the most intimate friends. So by a simple ruse I was enabled to wander at will and without interruption along the paths of the garden and the surrounding lawns and to pass by myself through the house where had lived one to whom the verdict of history has without error awarded the title "great."

They were kindly hands, the hands of women, that restored the estate of Mount Vernon to the form that it held in Washington's time. It is not my intention, however, to add to the numberless descriptions of the place. I lingered in the house long enough to note most of its contents, the key of the Bastille, the furniture, all the little objects which great care has gathered to make complete this place without a visit to which no American's education is complete.

Associations of Mount Vernon.

The summing up of the associations of Mount Vernon is the lesson learned. It is not that we have seen the table at which the president wrote the Declaration of Independence or the library in which he read or the bed in which he slept. It is of no moment to remember that there is a sundial in the garden, that this or that tree was planted on a given date or that the bricks of the stable were brought from England. You purchase from the quiet old lady in charge of the kitchen a book of pictures which tell you all this. What should be found at Mount Vernon, the sense and memory of which should be carried away, is the fact that here dwelt in a time long past, a man to whom was paid the tribute of the greatest part in the history of men and that he played his part well. You have seen the home in which he dwelt, your eyes have looked as his eyes once looked out over the great river and the wooded hills and you have stood, perhaps as I stood, in front of the simple tomb and read the raindrops fell, "Within this enclosure rest the remains of General George Washington." The house and the furniture, the garden with its walks, all the accessories of the place are necessary to recall the memory of the man who lived there, but if the material things alone have filled your thoughts your time has been poorly spent. The material things are necessary, but their value lies only in that they enable us to give a personal interest to a man upon whom the efforts of the nation seem to have been concentrated to render into a false abstraction devoid of personality and life.

Apexes of History.

To the eye of history, viewing the progress of humanity through long periods, the course of advancement presents a uniform aspect. But a close examination reveals a less uniform appearance. The line of advancement, while generally pursuing one direction upward, has parts where the upward tendency is strongly marked and at other places it may run level or perhaps decline downward. Such upward strokes we designate the defense of the Persians at Marathon and the administration of Pericles, the Reformation and the Renaissance of Europe or the Revolution and the American Republic. A downward stroke would be the decline of Rome and the Dark Ages. Be this as it may, the time seem to be times relatively short in the history of humanity into which are crowded events for which past ages seem to have been preparing.

The Revolution Such an Apex.

Thus it was that the long history of the colonies, with its interrelation with European history, finally culminated in the record of the Revolution and the formation of the Republic. A few men in England saw the signs but a dull king and a people willfully ignorant knew nothing of the changes which had quietly taken place. The Revolution came as a period of violent change. The final release of the stored energy of the clouds was made evident in blinding flashes and when the storm had cleared there was brought to view the wreck of many an old opinion and of many an outworn tradition. The world was clear, however, for the growth of a greater and better harvest.

It is not given to the people of any one period to realize to its full import the events in which they have taken part. The span of human life is too short an epoch with the cycles necessary to complete an epoch for an individual to grasp entire the changes which have passed before his eyes.

The life of America has not yet reached a permanence, is yet in a state of flux, and time alone can tell what the result will be. This much, however, is clear. Given liberty of action untrammelled by imposed authority the members of the white race are capable of realizing not completely, but completely as human efforts go, the dream of ages for the happiness and well-being of the individual. Democracy is the sole solution of the problem of the undeveloped race. In the twilight of the race growth, kings and rulers may have been necessary but the goal to which all human development tends is towards equality, not of mentality, but of opportunity, under self government.

Men engaged nor by the stage upon which the play is acted. The white race suffered but a momentary check when a million Russians met defeat at the hands of a million Japanese while the whole world looked on. The few thousand rollers who surrendered to General Washington at Yorktown represented not at all the strength of England and hardly any note was paid to the event except as it affected a British or a French king. Yet of the two events, one is remarkable only for the numbers engaged which appeal to the imagination. The other, trivial in numbers, was the culmination of a series of events the effects of which we feel and which will be felt for ages. It established democratic America which, by reaction, will in time make Europe democratic.

The Dominating Personality of His Time.

Hence it is that America of to-day may stand with bared heads before the tomb of the man who was the dominating personality of the time. Nothing is taken from the fame of his contemporaries by the admission of his preeminence. A long roll of heroic names associated with the forming of the republic is the heritage of the Americans. Others, more brilliant in debate or in knowledge of the detail of fundamental law, may claim attention but, in the varied events of the closing years of the eighteenth century, the name of Washington stands out clear and distinct as that of a great man.

As given in chief of the continental army he carried to a successful conclusion a long war against a powerful enemy. The errors and failures sink into insignificance before this one fact—that of final success in the field. Without this success all else would have been as nothing. Then as leader in the congress which formed the fundamental law of the land he held together the opposing factions when at times the forces of integration seemed weaker than those of disintegration. As the first of the present the monotony of the record of the time attests the merit of his administration. "Happy are the people whose annals are at times like this."

When Washington turned from the scenes of his labors and his triumphs, the nation was an accomplished fact. To use an old simile the ship had cleared the harbor entrance and with sails set was pointed toward the open sea. The pilot could then give into other hands the care of the vessel and with a sense of work well done retire to his temporal rest which soon passed into rest eternal.

An Aristocrat Fighting for Democracy.

The supreme merit of Washington lies in his recognition of the spirit of his time and his guidance of the people in the path of democracy. He was an aristocrat by birth and he was one of the richest men of his time. His home at Mount Vernon is that of a cultivated gentleman. It is in arrangement and in the decoration which he supervised an example of a style the simplicity and elegance of which the present is glad to copy. He owned slaves and was of the dominant race. Democracy was but a memory of Greece or Rome or the theme of French writers under the patronage of a despot. In his own land and in England was there a semblance of the rule of the people and to this he could have been antagonistic by birth and surroundings. Yet with his clear conception of the tendency of the age and an appreciation of the benefits of liberty to all classes he led a successful war against aristocratic government, rebuked the people who would have made him king and assisted in founding a democracy which has endured. In this he stands almost alone in history.

His precepts and his example have at a distance of over a hundred years the force of laws. The world knows how well he built and the effects of his labors cannot yet be estimated, for the forces which he helped to release and to which he gave direction still continue as the dominating influence of to day.

Foolish Tradition Around His Name.

It is to be regretted that a foolish tradition has grown up around the name of Washington due to the efforts of the generations which succeeded him to make him almost a god. He is represented as a man almost without passions or human frailties. He is placed before children as the summation of all the virtues, and silly stories are told to emphasize his goodness. Therefore to children he has become tiresome for children do not care for such characters. To men he appears as a cold and austere personage eclipsed in brilliancy and in talents by his contemporaries.

The race is still troubled by an admiration for the spectacular and Washington was not spectacular. In the endeavor to make him a god we have only succeeded in making him tiresome. Both conclusions are equally false. Personally he must have been everything but cold and austere, for such a personality could not have held together the many men of diverse opinions in his time.

The tradition should be revised. A man of human attributes should be substituted for the colorless abstraction which we have brought into being and children should be taught, not some silly story of his personal life, but rather of his services to mankind. Of these, search may be made of the records of history without finding any of equal merit.

An Imperishable Memory.

Washington sleeps at Mount Vernon. The great river upon which his eyes rested to the last flows on in summer sunshine or winter storm. It typifies one way the stream of human life passing on its way and leaving no record while the memory of a great man remains a fixed and certain fact which endures. Changing the simile the river becomes the people of this nation, changing as to individuals but continuing to be the same, watched over by the spirit of its great founder.

SELF GOVERNMENT AT SAN JOSE

By AN OLD RESIDENT.

(The problem of self-government in America has got to be worked out in our municipalities. The town meetings were the kindergartens of Democracy. Our municipalities must become our common schools of free government, because it is there that people come together in multitudes immediately concerned for interests common to them all. We may liken state governments to high schools of democracy and national government to the university. It is therefore the purpose of The California Weekly, from time to time, to analyze and make clear the status and tendencies of municipal government in California in the hope that each may learn from the other.)

Since the recent defeat of the charter amendments in San Jose the politicians have been speculating concerning the probability of the Hayes brothers resuming control in that city after the next election. As is known to most readers, San Jose has had about as hard an experience with boss rule as any town in the state. For many years it was dominated by James W. Rea, whose methods of control were brutal in the extreme. Afterwards Rea was supplanted by John D. Mackenzie, who had been his lieutenant. Mackenzie's methods were a little more refined than those of his former master, but they were no more uplifting, and eventually he came to be as thoroughly detested as his predecessor had been.

Enter the Hayes Brothers.

Then came the turn of the wealthy Hayes brothers, who bought the two leading newspapers, and, in the name of reform, entered upon a systematic and successful campaign for capture of control of the county and city. The Hayeses and their faction had the city for six years and gave it a government which it is only fair to say was immeasurably superior to that of the preceding twenty years. But they gathered around them the usual number of camp followers and small-souled politicians; it was inevitable, therefore, that they should try to conciliate by being easy with the offenses of the saloons and the gamblers. The best that can be said of the rule of the Hayeses is that it was free from graft, with which the city had reeked before their time.

Bad State Affiliations.

In state politics, a field which the brothers were tempted to enter as soon as they had established control of the city, they did pretty nearly everything which was bad and foolish—did it without intending to be bad and without knowing they were foolish. For several years there was offered the peculiar spectacle of successful municipal reformers being in practical alliance with Abe Ruef in state politics. In San Francisco Ruef was a politician; in the state he was never anything but an understudy for Herrin and the Southern Pacific. The lure with which Ruef drew the Hayeses into his schemes and those of the railroad was the promise to make "Black" Hayes Governor; there was never any sincerity in this promise, but eventually Herrin did arrange the nomination and election to Congress of E. A. Hayes.

Reenter Old Machine via Labor Vote.

The downfall of the Hayeses in San Jose city politics came about a year ago, when the opposing politicians made a deal with the trades union people; it is whispered that Justice Lorrigan of the supreme court and John D. Mackenzie, who is now State Labor Commissioner, were the political engineers who arranged this deal, and it was shrewd enough to be their work. According to agreement, the unions nominated for mayor C. W. Davison, a popular young man who had held a minor judicial position, and then filled out the ticket as they pleased. The push politicians formed their part by backing the movement with all their might, and they were followed by a strangely assorted combination of the disaffected; it is said that both the saloon and the anti-saloon voters rallied to the support of Davison; so did the railroad and the anti-railroad people, the preachers, the labor unions and many others.

Having won the election, the Davison party proceeded to remove the police and fire commission, the health board and other officers. Some of the victims of this proscription resigned when they saw the axe swinging, while others stood their ground and forced trial of their cases to their own justification and an unceremonious removal. Several of the best policemen were dropped, especially those who had been diligent in prosecuting petty offenders.

Davison Administration Rebuked.

Mayor Davison's appointments mostly bore the marks of Mackenzie, though some of his selections were good. The city council was made up of labor union men, and soon the ways of the mayor and the councilmen began to diverge; they are now far apart. What the mass of voters think is shown pretty well by the late election held to ratify some seventeen charter amendments. Public feeling perverted this election from its real purpose and turned it into a vote of want of confidence in the administration. San Jose is again in rebellion against its municipal government, and this outcome was foreshadowed by the county convention and election of last fall.

To a certain extent the Hayeses will profit by the blundering which has brought the combination to grief so quickly; but there is a strong element, including some of the real reformers, which would gladly dispense with both Mackenzie and the Hayeses. The future of the local labor movement in politics is another question of interest, though it looks a little as if when they make their next effort the Hayeses and the labor unionists will join forces.

A COMMUTER'S GARDEN.

By Ray C. B. Brown.

The sun shows o'er the eastern hills,
Transmuting to gold the leads;
I drink the morning's bracing thrills
And pace my garden beds.

The sparrows twitter 'neath the eaves,
Nest-building, flit about;
Wistaria waits not for her leaves
But boldly blossoms out

Shy poppies doff their green nightcaps
And show their sleepy heads;
No shame for opiate naps
Brings forth those golden reds.

The narrow yard is packed with bloom
In colors spectrum-wide
From rose with red, romantic gloom
To violets pale-eyed.

Each flower weaves a potent spell
To hold me from my task,
But vainly, for no man may dwell
Without a business mask.

Look! Yonder o'er the yellow bay
The city beckons my gifts,
And up in April's turquoise sky
A smoky finger lifts.

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE.

Say This For Him.

Say this for him:
He walked an errand, doubtful way,
From Duty's path turned oft to stray
Where blood-red buds in Passion's dale
The passer lured unto that vale;
Yet, far astray, he still looked back
To where God's light shone down his track,
And, stumbling oft, still strove amain
The best, right path once more to gain—
Say this for him.

Say this for him:
Although he walked in darkest night,
Still turned his soul unto the light.
Still heard in dreams a mother's prayer
Low whispered through the silence there,
And, hearing, turned from Evil's fen,
Again to rise, to fall again,
Once more to rise. God knoweth best
The story of his soul's unrest—
Say this for him.

Say this for him:
There is no depth by him untrod,
There is no height that leads to God
To him unknown. In weakness he Has felt the might and mystery
Of One eternal, and he has seen
How beauty blossoms from the mean,
As he has cried, "Thee will I trust Thought sevenfold curse be on my dust."
Say this for him.

Say this for all:
Oh, brother, sister, know you not
That we do share his errant lot?
There is no one so wholly pure
That he may walk with footsteps sure,
Nor is there one so low and base
He is beyond redemption's grace.
For him or her, for you or me,
The need of needs is charity—
Say this for all.

An Oriental Fable.

Sitting in her satin-lined boudoir, Fatima, the beautiful maiden, first sighed heavily, then she rubbed the ring which graced her dainty finger.

Immediately the jinn appeared, but Fatima, being used to spooks, was not alarmed.

"What wilt thou?" the jinn inquired.

Fatima pursed her ruby lips haughtily and in silvery accents vociferated:

"Bring me a man."

(For the heart of a maiden, is it not the same, whether it be found in Orient or Occident?)

"You didn't mention his plans and specifications," the jinn remarked.

"He must be tall, handsome, rich, of irreproachable character but a dark, dark past, and he must be content with part of one drawer in the bureau and considerable of one nail in the closet, loving, yielding but firm—in short, he must be perfectly lovely. Minion, why lingerest thou? Bring him at once!"

"He'll have to be made for the occasion," the jinn muttered as he departed, but shortly he returned with the man, such as he was.

"Why, he is just perfect!" Fatima cried, and fell at once upon the man's neck.

Sixty days later the jinn was sitting in his cavern pondering the subject of mental healing, when a violent shock indicated that Fatima again had rubbed her ring.

"That girl!" the jinn grumbled, "now I'll have to go just as I was beginning to appreciate how easy it is to make a man think he isn't sick when he isn't sick."

He found Fatima in tears, and, "What wilt thou?" he asked.

"The m-man," Fatima sobbed, "ta-ta-take him away!"

"But I thought you said he was perfect."

The poor girl broke down.

"That's the t-t-trouble," she moaned; "he—he—alas—he is!"

Moral:—Girls are not the only ones who sometimes discover that a dream of perfection may have rusty joints and may not fit our little idiosyncrasies so well as we had anticipated.

A Simplified Spelling Proposal.

A youth who strove to simplify
Our English spelling, error-rife,
Once wrote unto a little maid,
And asked her thus to be his wife:

"Dear Sue," 'twas thus the letter ran)
My rivn soul hath sobd for yu,
And thru the vista that I scan
'Tis yu alon that meetst my yu.
Oft when I've napt I've kist thy lips,
Then wakd and sobd, my soul agrieved
To no it wakld in doomd elcips,
Ily that dashd dream despoiled, deceived.
And thoroly my hart hath sung,
As boroly I rode along:
Yur name was sweetst upon my tung
As actively I sweld that song.
Then rais, O, rais this sadnd hart,
And bles the life yur los wud dam!
Togethr, and no more to part,
Be yu my own, my litl lam."

"Dear sir," the maiden wrote, "I fear
To read your note were too much task,
But pa says if you come 'round here
You're sure to get the 'lam' you ask."

Gentle Woman and the Temperature.

The young woman came into the office glowing, warmed by a rapid walk of half a mile.

"Whew," she announced, as soon as she was fairly in the room, "it's awful close and warm in here!"

It was neither close nor warm, but she threw the window up, and sat down where she could secure the full benefit of the free ozone of the outer air.

Within ten minutes the ozone had become too free. It stirred up her fluffy hair and, for aught I know, reached chilling fingers down her spinal column.

"My!" said the young woman, "ain't this room awfully cold this morning?" and down went the window.

It never occurred to the gentle, feminine mind of her that the alleged closeness of the room when she arrived was due to the fact that she was warmed by exercise, or that the day was no cooler at 9:10 a. m. than it was at 9 a. m.

I have watched the nicer sex until I know that the young woman was representative of her sex, and the questions at once arise, Why does our beloved mother, sister, wife or daughter do this manner of thing? Why does she possess no temperature judgment? Why? But what's the use? It is partly because of a multitude of such inconsistencies and absurdities that we love her and would not be without her, and so we joyously let it go at that.

Justice Complains.

"I am so glad," said Justice, suiting the action to the word, "to remove this bandage from my eyes."

"I should suppose the light of Truth outside would blind you," Equity remarked.

"It does sometimes, but that is a less trouble than the tendency toward being cross-eyed which wearing the bandage gives me. You see, one eye is blinded all the time when the bandage is on, and frequently I have to shift the fold from the other eye, and the strain—"

"But why do you have to shift the fold from the other eye?"

"So as to have a chance to wink at some of the indicted Higher-ups."

Der Kaiser Kissed Him.

Kaiser Wilhelm kissed King Edward, first on one cheek and then on the other, when the two monarchs met in Germany.

Aha, der Kaiser kissed him!

Ring out, ye merry bell,

And say this thing for Edward:

He stood it very well.

Traloo, der Kaiser kissed him!

He kissed him on each cheek,

And Edward bore it nobly,

Though he was feeling weak.

Whoop-la, der Kaiser kissed him!

Ring, bells, and let 'er go,

For Edward ne'er protested—

They say he's fadin', though.

Great guns, der Kaiser kissed him!

I'm gladdest when I sing,

To think, whate'er befalls me,

I was not born a king.

The Other Side.

I jested at kisses an emperor gave,

As a jester e'er may do,

But I saw 'neath the kisses their purport grave,

And I turned to the wider view.

I see them stand in their doubting lines,

Briton and Tueton bold,

Watching their lords for the faintest signs

Of a purpose yet untold.

Shall it be war, or shall it be peace,

Of the pregnant future born?

The red, red flow

Of a tide of woe,

Or the dawn of a sun-kissed morn?

Brothers are these, of the Saxon race,

Nursed at one mother's breast.

Yet each of them views the other's face

With a doubt one-half expressed;

And so they have stood in the doubting lines,

Waiting a monarch's heft.

Shall it be war,

And its red tide, or

Such peace as the gods love best?

They wait and they watch, while the world is still,

Its clamorous voices cease,

Waiting a sign of the kingly will.

'Tis given: The kiss of peace.

BOOK NOTES.

"Jorn Uhl."

This is not a just-out book, but it is a book widely read in its own country, growing in favor on this side of the Atlantic, and deserves to find new friends. It has been by many pronounced the best German novel and Gustav Frensen, its author, has gained a snug place in the hearts of his countrymen. Wherever people are interested in other people, there will be readers who will warm to him because of his keen and sympathetic interest in his kind. He writes whereof he knows.

The scene of the story is the lowlands of Holstein, bordering the North sea where the semi-barren heath breaks down upon the rich marshes, dyked and drained, and reclaimed from overflow. The characters are humble folk, having the virtues and faults common to humanity, but in settings new and strange to those not acquainted with that portion of the Fatherland. It is a good story well told, yet not told according to rules laid down by the critics, who have dealt harshly with the book while the German people have welcomed it as coming from the hands of one who understands the souls of them. The book is so clean that it can be put into the hands of any child, and yet it deals, in part, with primeval sin and its direst consequences.

What startles those of us who have been led to believe that in Germany, where everyone uses liquor, no one is drunken, is that the tragedies of the story revolve about a besotted condition depicted as characteristic of the country, the sufficient cause for the downfall of many a landed gentleman and the beggary of his family. If Jorn Uhl be a true picture of North German life, then the recent rise of the temperance movement in Germany is not without its abundant justification.

But it is not disagreeable truth-telling that alone makes the book a valuable contribution to literature, if not for all time, then certainly for our own. It is its subtle interpretation of German life and feeling. Their half belief in the reality of the realm of shade, the spirit of dark despair which makes adult (not race) suicide more common among Germans than among any other Aryan people, the common, homely, hearty thrift with which they bend to their work and rise superior to the hard conditions among which many of them live.

Gustav Frensen understands the people among whom he has lived and for whom he has toiled, and he has made Jorn Uhl a living, breathing, moving picture of North Germany as it was and is. Dana Estes & Co., Boston.

WITH EYES AND
:: EARS OPEN ::

I know a little girl who, out of her baby consciousness, evolved the vegetarian theory of living.

"I'm not going to eat any more meat," she calmly announced to her father one day at dinner, "and I shouldn't think you would want to."

"But why not?" her astonished father inquired.

"I think the animals like to live, and I don't want them to be killed for me."

Bless her wee, tender heart, what would you have said if you had been that father? Wiped the blood from a rare steak from your lips and assured her it was all right? Probably, but about how many pounds of meat do you suppose it would require to offset in value the all-comprehending love in that late-fledged soul? Assured her that pain and streams of gore and killing were essential to our lives? But how about hundreds of thousands of strong and healthy vegetarians?

The eastern dreamers say of the animals, "These, too, are my little brothers," and treat them with loving kindness. Sometimes I wonder if these dreamers are not in some respects a few rounds higher on the ladder than we.

Did you remark that I am a crank? No, I am as smugly self-satisfied and callous as you: I eat meat.

Now, what would you do about it?

The other day, on the street, I passed a woman who was about to lose an evidently valuable comb. Feeling that she would wish to be aware of the fact, I said to her, as courteously as I knew how:

"Pardon me, madam; you are losing your comb."

First, she clutched at the comb and replaced it.

Second, she glared at me, and continued to glare, while I felt myself growing smaller and smaller.

You see, I had violated the conventionalities, and hers being a soul with conventional boundaries, she felt that I should not be forgiven.

So again I ask you, What would you do about it?

It was an Oakland banker who recently said that President Roosevelt gets drunk every week. You remember what Abraham Lincoln, of revered memory, said of General Grant when that great commander was similarly accused: "Where does he get his whisky? I want to order some of the same kind for my other officers." If Theodore Roosevelt gets drunk every week, let us, in the light of the splendid things he has done, trust that many prominent American citizens will hunt up the brand of whisky he patronizes and make free use of it.

But President Roosevelt does nothing of the kind. Whether the banker manufactured it on the spot, or whether he merely passed it on, the story is false in its inception and untrue in its every development. And to this fact a host of witnesses might be called to testify.

Not long ago I read that short walking-skirts are going out of fashion and that soon women will wear only long skirts upon the streets.

I don't believe it. When I see women, even on rainy days, walking unhampered along the streets, uncompelled to clutch and raise dragging skirts, and, for the first time with my memory, apparently at ease and comfortable, I really do not believe it.

That is, I do not believe it until I take a second thought of the sacrifices woman has made and burdens she has borne at the dictate of fool Fashion, but when I have done this I am not so assured in my disbelief. I have seen woman make of herself a balloon, a winged cherub, a camel, a straight line, and almost anything that is not human, all at the behest of this same frivolous old Dame Fashion, and, having seen these things, how can I be certain of what else she may do?

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN.

The Three Big Issues The three really important legislative issues of this session of the legislature are the direct primary, railroad regulation and the reform of criminal procedure. All have made rather slow progress, as might have been expected. All are being hard-fought, and although the direct primary may perhaps win out on the original lines, compromises on the other two are all but certain.

Axing the Primary Bill The contest over the primary bill is, so far, all in the Senate, and it is now centered around the proposition to exclude from its operation the whole matter of the selection of United States Senators. This is what the organization is contending for, and Senators Wolfe, Leavitt and others are making the fight. They would have been glad to go much further in emasculating the bill; at one time they proposed to exclude, for the next election at any rate, the nomination of state officers, leaving only county and some district officers to be chosen at direct primaries. They also stood out for a majority vote, instead of a plurality, to nominate, a convention of delegates to be called if no majority nomination should be made for a given office at the primary.

Changes Too Raw This was so raw that it provoked a revolt, and the more patriotic Republicans in the Senate decided to band together, and take in Democrats who were like-minded, in order to prevent the Southern Pacific defeating the will of the voters after all parties had pledged themselves repeatedly on the subject of primaries. This Republican-Democratic combination appears to command the situation and to insure the passage, so far as the Senate is concerned, of the primary measure. One of the lines of the bill drawn by the Direct Primary League. The organization, seeing it cannot make ducks and drakes of the whole measure, is now trying to keep out the United States Senator feature, but should it succeed in pulling down a few senators, it would be emboldened, perhaps, to go back to its original program.

Revolt? Horrors! Of course certain Republican newspapers which wear the S. P. collar are appalled by the wickedness of the Republicans in combining with Democrats to secure the fulfillment of Republican platform pledges, but we have reached a tide in political affairs when the public good outranks party advantage in the eyes of the people. Where sincere Republicans and sincere Democrats stand together for the common good inside the legislature, sincere Republicans and sincere Democrats outside the legislature will find no occasion for offense in either of them.

All Sorts of Railroad Bills The fight over the railroad bills, of which there are three notable ones, is interesting. Senator Stetson introduced the bill prepared by Attorney General Webb, which is sometimes called the Governor's bill, because he is supposed to have assented to all its principal provisions. This bill was the outcome, so far as the Attorney General is concerned, of the investigation of railroad rebate practices made by the State Railroad Commission after Federal Commissioner Lane had uncovered the facts showing that within the state, the Southern Pacific and other railroad corporations had been granting rebates to favored firms on oil and many other commodities. There was no punishment of the guilty corporations, and the Attorney General took the position that there could be no punishment of these practices until the laws were tinkered up. Senator Campbell, a Democrat from San Luis Obispo, introduced a bill which follows the lines of the New York railroad law, with the Texas car demurrage law as an added feature. Senator Wright of San Diego, rather closely identified with the organization, introduced a bill of his own which differs considerably from the other two.

Espee For Maximum Rate Peter F. Dunne, counsel for the Southern Pacific company, argued before a joint meeting of committees against these bills, but more particularly against the Stetson bill. His main point was that the state constitution only grants the Railroad Commission the right to fix maximum rates and that below these figures the railroads can charge as much less as they please; only he does not, ostensibly, claim the right for the railroads to charge one rate to one shipper and another higher rate for the same service to another shipper. Dunne's argument, fairly well backed up with legal citations, especially from the California Supreme Court in the Fresno passenger case, made considerable impression, and the present tendency seems to be to pass only a maximum rate bill. This is what Wright contends for, and Democrats like Campbell and Miller, in the Senate, are disposed to agree with him. The outlook just now does not appear good for Stetson's bill, but he is putting up a hard fight for it.

Resent Commonwealth Bills The bills of the Commonwealth Club were bound to excite the opposition of a large share of the lawyers in Senate and Assembly. Not all lawyers are reformers—far from it—but all lawyers have their own ideas, and usually very set and positive ones, concerning both civil and criminal procedure. They regard this as a subject peculiarly their own—an interest to be looked out for from the point of view of their own comfort, convenience and safety. On other subjects the lawyer in the legislature may be disposed to give the people what he thinks the people want; but when it comes to legal matters he says: "That is my province; I know all about that, and the mass of the people know nothing. Besides, this is the business by which I make my living, and my interests are entitled to be considered. You must show me."

Better Luck for Bar Association It is in the nature of doctors to differ, and all the lawyers are doctors when it comes to reforming court procedure. While some of the members of the Senate and Assembly Judiciary committee may have been favorable to some of the Commonwealth Club bills, the majority sentiment was strongly adverse. As soon as the situation was understood by the representatives of the club they withdrew a considerable part of the bills, leaving in, however, the more important ones. Then it appeared that the bills presented by the San Francisco Bar Association covered some of the same ground, and these bills, being less thoroughgoing than the club bills, and being offered by a body representing the profession, naturally were preferable in the eyes of committee members. It looks now as though some of the Bar Association bills will pass, and also, probably, some of the Commonwealth Club bills. Among the latter, there is reason to hope, is the bill to put an end to the legal farce of trying the grand jury after it has found an indictment, to find out whether or not any member of it had a bias.

Jurors Who Won't Acquit In general, the attitude of many of the legal members of the legislature is indicated by the remark of a prominent lawyer on the Senate Judiciary committee when there came up the bill to cut down the number of challenges allowed the defense from twenty to ten. He said: "There are men in my county who often serve as jurors and who have not acquitted a defendant in twenty years."

Use For the Initiative The lawyers in the legislature control the legislature. Not more than one amendment to our criminal procedure proposed by the Commonwealth Club was to be taken into most, and yet many of them should be. Given the initiative, the Commonwealth Club could take these amendments directly to the people and have them enacted into law at the next election. The public mind, not the legal (which is a different type of mind) could easily be educated within the next two years. Wanting the initiative the reconstruction of criminal procedure on rational lines is likely to prove a ten years' task.

Good For Mr. Kingsbury! An important fight in the legislature is being waged over proposed changes in the state land laws that regulate the sales of lands granted to the state for school and other purposes. For many years the Hydes and Bensons have been having things all their own way in the state land department, but at last they have a Surveyor General who wants to reach better results. He has already headed off the sharks from some of their accustomed raids, thereby earning their enmity and bringing on himself a few hundred suits at law. He has a bill before the legislature intended further to improve conditions, and the fact that the sharks are all fighting it is evidence that it is a pretty good bill. It is currently reported that Walter Parker and Jere Burke are doing all they can to beat the bill, though so far as known the railroad company has no direct interest in the business. A singular and interesting feature of this matter is that Surveyor General Kingsbury, when he was nominated, was looked upon as Walter Parker's candidate, and he was set down by those who gave the subject any thought as one who would be thoroughly dishonest, the son of his predecessors. But his record tends to disprove this presumption and to reveal him as an honest man.

Centralizing Building Work Speaker Stanton has presented to the Assembly an important bill to amend the state building law. It is important because the state is now spending $2,000,000 a year in construction work of various kinds. Under the old lines of policy, the local hospital, prison, and school boards picked out the architects, received bids, let contracts, and assumed and performed all the other duties of management of the building work. With the establishment of the State Engineering Department two years ago came some degree of centralization, but the present proposition virtually sweeps away the local boards so far as concerns building operations. Building operations are to be conducted from any one office, if this bill passes, by the Engineering Department. This is one of the most vigorous measures of centralization which has yet been proposed in the state government.

Bay Cities, Take Notice Of unusual importance to San Francisco and the other bay cities is the municipal water district bill which Assemblyman Pulifer of Oakland introduced a few days ago. The scheme is to let a number of cities or incorporated towns decide by popular vote, on the initiative of any one of them, whether they wish to go into such a district and co-operate in the procurement of a water supply for all of them. Such a district is to have a governing board made up of the mayors or presidents of the boards of justices, and a general board of members in proportion to the number of voters in each municipality. To purchase water supplies and construct works and pipe lines, bonds are to be voted. Each city or town is to be left free to own and manage its own districting system, and the general board of directors only controlling the sources of supply, main works and pipe lines.

Friday a Pike, Pete had an experience at Blanco, a few miles from Salinas, which came near turning his hair to match the name of the station.

He arrived at Blanco just at dark and finding no convenient car, went to the river bank and "made down" under a willow.

At daybreak he was awakened by the splash of water and sat up to find himself on the only dry spot in sight—but the water was still rising.

He had no knowledge of his surroundings—didn't know how deep the water was, how fast it would get deeper, nor how long it would stay deep—so he climbed the tall tree to its tip top and waited.

After waiting there in the rain and frost for two more days and nights, and without anything to eat, a rescue party was attracted by the man's shouts and came down within speaking distance of his island.

"What are you up there for?" asked a new comer. "Why don't you come down?" yelled another.

"I can't swim," yelled the poor fellow.

"Swim? Swim! Why man that water isn't six inches deep—and it hasn't been any deeper; don't you see it's only a swale? Come on down, and wade out."

Sure enough the tree was in the center of a little hollow which had been filled by the overflow from the river, but the man didn't know it until two days of anguish were passed.

their appeal is directly to the heart. The stories are well worth reading. ("Dragon Stories," The Pacific Presbyterian Pub. Co., San Francisco, 50 cents.)

NEW STATE FORESTRY LEGISLATION

By G. B. LULL, State Forester.

The State Board of Forestry is making a strong effort to secure from the present legislature an equipment for better work in the future along the lines of forest extension, protection and management. To this end it is asking, first of all, for an increase in the appropriation. Two years ago the legislature made appropriations for the State Board of Forestry, to last for two years, as follows:

Salary of State Forester	$ 4,800
Salaries of two assistant State Foresters	4,800
Support of the State Board of Forestry, including field and traveling expenses	10,000
Printing, binding and ruling	2,500
Improvement and maintenance of California Redwood Park	10,000
Printing	100
Total	$32,200

The amounts requested to serve for the next two fiscal years are:

Salary of State Forester	$ 6,000
Salary of Deputy Forester	4,800
Salary of Assistant Forester	4,800
Support of State Board of Forestry	30,000
Printing, binding, etc.	3,500
Improvement and maintenance of California Redwood Park	20,000
Printing, binding, etc.	100
Total	$68,400

It may be said in explanation of the increases requested that the support fund of the State Board of Forestry during the past two years has been wholly inadequate to meet the rapidly increasing demands for forest work. This is particularly true of the work in planting. The planting of eucalyptus has assumed a prominent place in California and indeed is attracting people from all over the United States. No less than thirty-eight companies have been formed in California and two as far east as St. Louis and Kansas City, to propagate eucalyptus in California. All this has occurred during the past two years and has made demands upon the office that were wholly unanticipated. This has necessitated expenses beyond what the appropriation made when the office was doing almost nothing but routine work could be expected to cover, consequently at the present time the appropriation for the balance of the present fiscal year is almost exhausted. The increase requested will no more than meet the demands for the next two years if the work of the office does not increase over what is being done at the present, a condition which may not be expected to exist.

Salaries Inadequate.

The salary of the State Forester was placed at $2,400 when the office was created four years ago. This is less than that of the head of any other office of the state. The increase is asked because it is believed that the office has demonstrated its value to the state and that a state forester who fulfills the qualifications demanded by the law performs the duties incumbent upon such an officer should be paid not less than $3,000 per year.

The increases asked for assistant state foresters are larger, relatively, than asked for the state forester. This follows from the fact that the assistants have been kept at $1,200 a year for four years. This salary is less than that paid to clerks and even stenographers in most of the state offices and is not sufficient compensation for men qualified to be assistants in this office. The law does not require that the assistant state foresters shall be trained in forestry but in order to carry on forestry work in an intelligent manner it is essential that they shall have at least a rudimentary education along forestry lines. As it happens the present incumbents are both college bred men and both have had before coming here, considerable experience as employees of the Federal Forest Service. It is essential to hold these men in state employ and in order to do so they must be compensated as well as other officers of equal standing.

Improvements for Redwood Park.

The amount requested for improvement of California Redwood Park is $20,000. This is the amount biennially appropriated for the maintenance and improvement of the park until two years ago when the legislature cut the appropriation exactly in two. This forced retrenchments in every direction at a time when it was absolutely necessary for the protection of the property to be conserved by fencing it with fire lines, and forced the letting of a contract for the removal of fire-killed timber to a private party when, if the appropriation had been sufficient, the state could have handled it on its own account. It is necessary now, and will be for several years to come, to have an appropriation of at least $10,000 per year to properly equip the park for the proper use of the people who visit it. The park is a high-priced property. Originally it was purchased for $250,000 and in the short time it has been the state's property its value has increased to not less than $450,000 or $500,000. It is essential from every standpoint to protect this property from fire and to preserve it for the best use of this and future generations. To do so properly it will be necessary to continue the opening of fire lines from which back-firing may be done and to keep the fire lines free from vegetation. In addition to that it is at least desirable that the roads and trails should be extended and kept in passable condition. These improvements cannot be done on an appropriation of $5,000 per year. All these appropriations are carried by the general appropriation bill.

Bills Affecting Personnel of State Board.

Aside from this bill several forestry bills of more or less importance have been introduced. Senate Bill No. 455, by Senator Holohan, aims to change the personnel of the State Board of Forestry. Instead of the present board, which is composed of the Governor, Secretary of State, Attorney General and the State Forester, he would have a board composed of five members appointed by the Governor. Each of three of these members would be either the president or a member of the faculty of Berkeley and Stanford universities and Santa Clara college, the other two, citizens of the state whom the Governor might select. The argument of the proponent of this measure is that the present Board of Forestry is a political one and that the cutting of the fire-killed timber in California Park was in violation of the principle under which the park was purchased, viz.: that it should be preserved in a primeval condition for the enjoyment of the people of the state. It will be noted that the author of the bill has not taken into account the fact that in order to preserve a tract like California Redwood Park it is essential that fire menaces shall be removed. To accomplish this the Board of Forestry has encircled the park with a fire line to prevent the invasion of outside fires. Following the construction of this line it started the removal of fire-killed timber from that section of the park burned over four years ago. It is well known by every one in California that the cutting of fire-killed timber is a dead tree is the greatest menace to a standing forest because fire will run to the top of it and from there be blown a long distance into the forest. When such conditions obtain it is practically impossible to stop a fire by fire. The only way to stop a fire is by removing dangers of this kind a portion of the trees killed by the fire four years ago have been removed from the park and the balance of them should be. Moreover, the presence of the standing dead trees is a detriment to the growth of young trees on the burned area because limbs are constantly falling and breaking the young trees down, and in the case of coppicing trees like the redwoods the coppice growth could never hide the unsightly burned trunks of the old trees.

Park for All Generations.

Because the Board of Forestry took the point of view that the park is to be preserved in its present condition for all time, and that its welfare one hundred years from now depends upon the removal of menaces now, it has been accused of commercialism, lack of sentiment and political chicanery. All these conditions S. B. 455 would change. By looking over this bill it can be readily seen that if the Governor should desire to appoint politicians on the State Board of Forestry, under its provisions, he would have the greatest freedom to do so because he is not restricted in his choice to any particular member of the faculties of the institutions mentioned but may appoint any member, even though the most plant, should he so desire. It is hard to see how this bill could remedy conditions even if they were as bad as charged.

Senate Bill 820, by Senator Bills, is one that will meet with no opposition. Mrs. Annie E. K. Bidwell, owner of Rancho Chico, Chico, California, wishes to donate to the State of California for public park purposes, certain lands comprised in her property. These are made up of three streams and their bordering banks. Along the banks of the streams are many large trees which it is her desire to preserve for their beauty and shade value. Furthermore, she wishes that the conditions of streamflow shall be maintained as at present and believes that the state is more able to maintain these than any other party.

Senate Bill 278, by Senator Birdsall, makes an appropriation of $5,000 for the construction of a water and sewer system in California Redwood Park. Up to the present time the water for domestic use in the park has been obtained from an uncertain supply or carried from the stream. It has become necessary, on account of the great number of visitors to the park, to have a dependable source of water.

Sewage for Redwood Park.

None but the most primitive conditions as regards the disposal of sewage have ever prevailed in the park. This problem has become more and more important as the number of visitors increased until now it seems unsafe to continue longer under the present conditions. If one or two more summers pass without the proper system of sewage disposal the camping grounds may be expected to become disease-infected. At the request of the Board of Forestry the state engineer made a survey at the park last fall and has reported that systems for a dependable supply of water and proper disposal of sewage can be installed for $5,000, the amount asked for.

Senate Bill 822, companion to Assembly Bill 1006, appropriates $30,000 for better protection against forest and field fires. It provides for the appointment by the state forester of a county firewarden in each forested county who shall have a monthly salary of seventy-five dollars during such part of the year as he is employed, and for the payment of not exceeding twenty-five cents per hour to the assistants called out by the county firewarden to put out fires. It provides that not more than $500 shall be expended in any one county in one year and that the expenditure of any money in any county is contingent upon an appropriation by the county supervisors of an equal amount to be expended for the same purpose. This is a very important bill. It is well known that forest fires destroy many hundred thousand dollars worth of property every year. This bill is a remedy for this loss, to a large extent, by the expenditure of only $15,000 per year. It is largely an experimental measure and is patterned after the plan followed for two years by the Washington Forest Fire Protective Association.

THE GRAFT CASES

Last Wednesday the jury brought in a verdict of guilty against Michael Coffey, the former supervisor charged with accepting a $4,000 bribe to vote for the overhead-trolley franchise.

As outlined in this department last week, the main evidence against Coffey was given by James L. Gallagher, who testified positively that Coffey accepted the bribe, as charged. More indirect was the testimony of officials of the United States mint, of the United Railways company and of Ruef's stenographer and office boy, by whom it was shown that the United Railroads had in the mint the sum of $200,000 which, at about the time of the alleged bribery, was turned over to Abe Ruef.

The defense introduced no testimony, and all that the jury had to do was to decide whether that presented by the prosecution was sufficient to demonstrate the guilt of the man who before the grand jury acknowledged that guilt—and the jury did it.

The slow work of securing a jury for the trial of Patrick Calhoun suffered a delay of four days last week—from the 10th to the 13th inclusive—on account of the illness of Francis J. Heney, which was due to grip and a threatened nervous breakdown. However, Mr. Heney again was "on deck" last Monday, as was a special venire of eighty talentsmen. Another venire of sixty has since been summoned, making a total of 910 up to last Wednesday.

Forty-eight of the first eighty talentsmen were excused by Judge Lawlor for various sufficient reasons, leaving thirty-two to undergo the test of examination by the lawyers on both sides. The net result of these proceedings was an actual loss of two jurors from the twelve subject to peremptory challenge, Walter J. Rock and Walter L. Baskette having been excused for cause, and Charles H. Syddam, a wholesale grocer on 2201 California street, having been accepted subject to peremptory challenge.

A notable feature of the case has been the approach of friends and relatives of prospective jurors by unknown persons who endeavor to obtain a "line" on the feeling of said prospective jurors anent the case. A curious development of this sort related to Talesman Nordquist, to ascertain whose views a stranger called on the wife of Assistant District Attorney William Hoff Cook last Friday. When Mrs. Cook informed him whom he was addressing he departed in haste. A right-minded public is entitled to hope that some one or more of these busy but anonymous gentlemen yet may be apprehended and compelled to explain his activities.

It is quite safe to say that spring will be well on its way before the Calhoun case will go to the jury.

Last Monday the setting of the case against Adolph S. Newburgh for trial was postponed until Saturday, the 20th instant. At the same time, his attorney, Bert Schlesinger, announced that he then would ask that the case be not tried within three weeks, as another important case would demand his attention during that time.

The trial of the San Mateo county graft cases began last Tuesday before Judge M. M. Dooling of San Benito county. The prosecution is represented by Raymond Benjamin of the Attorney General's office and Assistant District Attorney Robert Harrison of San Francisco, while the attorneys for the defense are Ross & Ross of Redwood City and Walter J. Linforth of San Francisco.

District Attorney J. J. Dullock, of San Mateo county, is charged with misconduct in office in drawing up a secret contract for $2,992 in favor of the O'Brien Construction company; Sheriff Robert S. Chatham with wilful neglect of duty in permitting a prisoner to leave jail and vote at the general election last fall. The charges against Supervisors John H. Coleman and J. C. Eikenkotter and former-Supervisors D. E. Blackburn and Joseph Debenedit are based upon alleged fraud in connection with the O'Brien contract.

The defendants have pleaded not guilty, and have attacked the indictments on the grounds of prejudice, improper drawing of the grand jury, failure of all the members of that body to vote for the indictments, etc. In brief, San Mateo county evidently is to have a specimen of that variety of administration of law with which San Francisco is so familiar. A motion for the appointment of an elisor in the place of Sheriff Chatham will be argued next Saturday.

("Forestry Legislation" Concluded)

Reforestation Measures.

Senate Bill 1054, by Senator Willis, will have a companion in the Assembly by Mr. Melrose. At the present writing the assembly bill has not been introduced, consequently its number cannot be given. This bill aims to perpetuate the valuable species of forest trees on cutover lands by requiring those who conduct lumbering operations to leave five trees per acre to serve as seed trees. The bill is fathered by the Tri-counties Reforestation Committee of Riverside. It was first suggested by resolution of the National Irrigation Congress at its meeting in Sacramento, 1907. Since that time the state of Maine has submitted to the supreme court the question as to whether such a bill would be constitutional and has received an unanimous answer in the affirmative. It is clear that it will be incumbent upon the state to take action in this direction at no distant date and it would seem nothing more than good business to begin now before the virgin forests are irreparably damaged.

CALIFORNIA.

By D. S. Richardson.

There was a summer land which dreaming lay
Between the purple mountains and the sea;
And, in his rounds, the knowing sun looked down
Upon no spot so fair. It was the last
Untrodden space of that great western arc Which restive man had followed round the world
Since in his heart the wander-lust was born.

In tawny beauty, league on league, it poured
Its languorous, impenetrable golden coast.
Or stretched away in verdant splendor where
The hills to mountains stepped and forests brushed
Their finger tips against the jealous stars.

As yet, through fertile vales, the crystal streams
Went singing to the sea; and on the plains
Where crimson poppies flashed like torches in
The tangled grass, the yellow mustard plumes
Bent stately heads to all the scented winds.
And big-eyed deer looked upward unafraid.

It was a virgin land, unexposed by plow
Or woodman's axe or stir of toiling men
With lust of Mammon in their eyes. No cry
Of iron monster, roaring down the vales.
Its primal stillness broke; nor clang of forge.
Nor hum of wheel in busy haunt of trade.
Asleep it lay; nor waked the echoes of Its drowsy steeps to other sound save that
Of waters falling and the siren song
Caught by the pine trees from the distant sea.

And so, as waits a bride her coming lord,
And sleeps, meanwhile, unconscious of her charm,
Or aught of human destinies within
Her virgin womb concealed, the fair land slept
The age-long sleep, awaiting still the call
To life and passion, through her valleys heard When Marshall touched the golden chime of dawn.

* * * * *
O land beloved! What time mine eyes have seen
Thy morning to splendid noon advance, and mine
Of empire start the grizzly from his lair,
Behold, the Earth brings tribute; and thy sons
In beauty stand there, pledged to make
The promise of thy natal hour the rich
Fruition of a glory yet to be.

THE sonata died away into the wailing of the wind about the ranch house walls, and Charteris turned from the piano to light a cigarette.

The stranger in the deep arm chair across the room stirred slightly, and uncrossed his legs.

"I suppose you know you play magnificently," he suggested, with an affected indifference.

"Only so so," said Charteris, cheerfully. "I thought the same myself once, until I was told on the best authority that there was something vital lacking—technique or something."

"I don't see it," protested the stranger. Charteris shrugged a pair of broad, round shoulders.

"No, you wouldn't," he said, bluntly. "You're not of the elect; you can appreciate but not appreciate; you know when a thing pleases you, but you never pull it to pieces to see if its charm is produced correctly. For instance, you would deal in exactly the same way with these pictures," his glance indicated the walls of the room, "they're all fair; quite good men have said they're fair."

The stranger rose from his chair, and made a slow detour of the room, examining each painting in turn, while Charteris watched him from the piano stool with a quizzical half-smile.

"You think they're pretty good?" he queried at last.

"I think they're uncommonly good," said the other, with a touch of asperity.

"I thought you would," laughed Charteris, exultantly, "but they're not, they're average. So are the two novels I have written, which I daresay you have half-read at some time and thrown aside." He broke off with a short laugh. "You must bear with a hermit's egoism; this is the first time for over a year I ever have talked with anyone who has a thought beyond a cow or a horse. I have only entered on my novitiate to the prairie; give me another two years, and I shall have adapted myself."

The stranger slowly paced the room. "It's nothing to do with me," he said, "I don't know what I did. I think you would rather annoy me—but why—all this?" His gesture embraced the log walls of the room, the dreary glimpse of driving snow through the tiny, double-framed window. "It seems such infernal waste. Here are you, with capabilities most of us would give our eye teeth to possess, burying yourself in a wilderness to raise horses—or is it cattle?"

"Cattle," replied Charteris, "shortorns. I find that with a little care I can raise good shortorns—far better shortorns than pictures, books, or music, and that's something."

The stranger stopped in his stride, and regarded him fixedly. Charteris smiled meadly. "Yes," he said, "you probably think me mad; perhaps I am, but I was sick of it—sick of going just so far and no farther without anything I touched. I did. I think you satisfy themselves with it; others never realize it, but to a few mediocrity is a curse, a direct dispensation, and I am one of these. Never to do anything that matters; never to leave the rut; to feel instinctively but surely that you never will, try as you will, can struggle on the treadmill of life, climbing, climbing, and then to look back and find yourself exactly where you started; oh, I tell you I was sick of it! It's worse than failure; you can at least distinguish yourself by going to the bottom in record time."

Charteris flung the dead cigarette beneath the stove, and continued more slowly—

"One day I realized that I had never done anything big, or strong; that I never showed in the cramped life I was then living, so I left it, and came here where there is room, and sometimes—very especially—I believe I have put one foot over the dead line. I built this ranch from my own plans, and riders have told me it is the best appointed in the West. My shortorns—but I'm doing an unconscionable amount of talking; I'll fill your glass."

The stranger ignored the suggestion. "But surely," he said, "surely there was something else; this absurd conviction of yours was not all that brought you here?"

There was a pause, so prolonged that the stranger was on the verge of a hasty apology.

THE MEDIOCRITY OF CHARTERIS

By RALPH STOCK
(From Black and White.)

"Perhaps not," said Charteris, at last, "I'm not altogether sure myself. Sometimes I think it might have made a difference, at others I am sure it could have made none, but now—it is beside the question—she has been married a year, and is, I believe, happy."

"I thought as much," said the other, quickly, "this is a mood, prolonged, but a mood; it will pass, believe me, and you will go back where you belong."

Charteris' gaze was centered on the white square of window. It was now quite dark, and the cold outside had increased, for the snow clung to the glass without melting. He shook his head slowly, squared his rounded shoulders, and rose from the piano stool. "I don't think not," he said, quietly; "do you feel like bed, and can you sleep between blankets? I'm afraid we don't run to sheets."

They entered a tiny bedroom off the sitting-room, and Charteris carried the lamp to the dressing table. When he turned, the stranger was leaning over the bed examining an oil portrait that hung on the wall. It was a clever piece of work, for the woman's face it depicted was not physically beautiful—the features were too irregular for that—yet the lighting and treatment had given it a mysterious, almost ethereal effect. The stranger's magnetic gaze still examined it intently, his lips parted, his eyes fixed; the tenseness of the attitude arrested Charteris' attention.

"You think it better than the others?" he suggested. "You're right, it is."

"Is this," said the other, without turning his head, "is this what might have made the difference?"

"Yes," said Charteris. "Good-night."

His hand was on the door. The other turned abruptly.

"You must pardon me," he said; "I had no wish to intrude—you see, she is my wife."

Morning broke with the storm still raging. The thermometer registered ten below zero, and the snow fell and drifted in ceaseless clouds.

"A three days' blizzard," commented Charteris at the breakfast table, "straight from the worst quarter. I shall never adapt myself enough to forget my poor devils of riders in weather like this, though they would be the first to resent pity. The cattle will drift south all the way to wire; the wire will be cut, perhaps, and they'll go further south, and the men with them, and on, and on, until the storm is over or they drop. Excuse my grumblings," he added, reaching for the other's cup, "to me there's nothing quite so depressing as a prairie blizzard."

The stranger went over to the window, and stood looking out at the cruel white clouds of driving snow.

"It's very wonderful," he said, slowly, "it makes one feel small; I find myself respecting it inordinately. How long would it take to get to town?"

"Thirty miles, against this," reflected Charteris, "and with a livery-stable horse—about eight hours, if you got there at all; but don't talk of such things."

"I must go," said the other, firmly. "It is good of you to suggest my staying, but I must get back somehow to-day."

"It would be madness," Charteris protested, "you don't know the country, and you don't know these blizzards; I have no one to send with you."

There was a set abstraction in the other's eyes.

"I know," he said, with quiet insistence, "but I must go. She is in the town waiting, and I said I should be back. She will be anxious."

Charteris rose abruptly, and took down a fur coat from behind the stove.

"Put this on," he said, "you can leave it at the hotel; and remember—if you get off the trail, let the horse take you; don't try to take him—he knows his stable."

Outside, the chill of death was in the air, and the men caught their breath in gasps as they plunged knee-deep through newly formed drifts on the way to the stable.

Presently the stranger leant down from the saddle and held out a fur-mittened hand.

"Good-bye," he said. "It is hardly likely I shall ever have a chance of repaying your kindness, but if you come East—"

"Good-bye," said Charteris, and turned towards the house.

He closed the door, flung his cap behind the stove, and crossed to the window, where he stood restlessly drumming his fingers on the frozen pane. Then he drew a crumpled letter from his pocket, and read it for the second time:

"We are on our way to Japan for the winter. I heard you were here, and made him stop off. I treated you abominably, but I have paid. He is all that he should be, and I have tried so hard to live the mistake down that he has never guessed, but it is quite impossible. I have reached the end, and must see you somehow, somewhere, if you will come. I am at the hotel. . . ."

Charteris sank into the armchair, and gazed stonily into the glow of the huge box-stove, his thin, strong fingers mechanically tearing the sheet of paper into narrower and narrower ribbons, then he opened the door, and thrust them far back among the coals.

The rest of the day he busied himself with the stock, and by ten o'clock that night the storm had cleared. The wind dropped, and a pale moon struggled intermittently through the dispersing cloud rack, shedding a sickly brilliance over the interminable snow plains.

Charteris stood at the open door, heedless of the cold. For the hundredth time he told himself that he had followed the only path of a strong man; but then he knew he was not a strong man. What further proof was needed? That morning he had thrust the disjunct appeal of a disillusioned girl from his mind with splendid finality, and now—he was voluntarily recalling every sentence, every word; dwelling on them, weighing them.

A coyote howled somewhere out in the white night, and others answered. To Charteris' over-wrought brain there was something prophetic in the desolation about him. He slammed to the door with an oath, and half an hour later was in his toughest cow pony on the trail for town.

The faint whinny of a horse floated over the snow, followed by another, and yet another before Charteris found his own beast answering, and brushed the rime from his eyelashes to look about him. Nothing was visible but the same endless expanse of moon-bathed snow, and far off to the right of the trail a solitary stunted tree that he knew to be the "lone pine," a well-known landmark for miles around.

He sat for some time straining his eyes out over the snow, then suddenly turned his horse's head and looped towards it.

In a wide circle round the tree a hard path had been tramped in the snow. Inside it was a horse tethered by the bridle line to one of the lower branches, the remains of a pitiful attempt at a fire, and a heap of snow-covered fur. Charteris knew what lay beneath this last.

The man was alive but unconscious; the cold had penetrated to the skin. Charteris shook him violently, buffeted him with his clenched fists, hurled him from side to side in the snow till the perspiration streamed from his forehead. Then he took a box of matches from his pocket, struck one and applied it to the arm just below the elbow. Nothing was visible but the man's lips; the eyelids fluttered and closed, and Charteris fell on him afresh, rubbing, rubbing, until his arms were numb from shoulder to wrist.

("The Mediocrity of Charteris"—Concluded.)

"Wake up, man," he yelled, "d'you hear, wake up!"

A dazed comprehension came into the man's eyes, and a twinge of pain distorted his face.

"Ah, it's you, Charteris; stop, man—stop—you're hurting damnably!"

Charteris sank back exhausted.

"Wonderful thing a blizzard," the other rambled on. "Makes a man feel small. Deceptive, too—"

A cackle of muffled laughter came from behind the high fur collar, "I thought this infernal tree was a house—think of it! Then I walked round it. God! how many times did I walk around it?"

Suddenly he sat up and looked around him. Charteris was sitting in the snow, still gasping.

"You're played out," said the stranger. "What have you been doing; when did you come?"

"Can you stand?" said Charteris, "No—then don't get excited; they'll put you right in town. Let me give you a leg up."

He lifted him with difficulty and thrust him into the Mexican saddle.

"Sit there," he commanded, "and try not to go to sleep, and for God's sake don't talk."

The town was asleep when they came to a steaming halt outside the hotel, but the night porter came out to them, and others were soon astir. The stranger sat huddled in a deep leather chair, as far from the stove as it had been possible to wheel him, but the warmth of the room had taken effect, and when the doctor came he was sleeping soundly.

The manager in shirt and trousers ran his finger down the register.

"Call room fifteen," he ordered tersely, "tell the lady her husband is here—that there's been an accident—nothing serious."

Charteris, who was warming his mitts at the stove, turned quickly towards the door. The manager followed and touched him on the shoulder.

"Where are you off to?" he demanded bluntly.

"Back to the ranch," said Charteris.

"What, at this hour? You must be crazy."

"No," said Charteris, "I'm unusually sane, that's all; good night." And he passed out through the swinging doors just before a blue kimono appeared at the head of the stairs.

At the ranch the foreman rode out to meet him. His thin, strong face was grave, and he leant down, flicking his riding boot with his quirt as he rode.

"And the losses?" queried Charteris.

"Nasty snap," jerked the foreman, "and they got tied up in the four mile coulie like a lot of sheep; near spring too, they were weak all right. Fifty per cent, I guess."

Charteris stared away towards the white horizon.

"Ah, yes," he commented absently, "about half, eh?"

Gov. Harmon of Ohio is the latest celebrity to express himself in favor of the six-cylinder car. The Governor looked over the exhibits at the Cincinnati automobile show and decided on a Winton six for his personal service. The car will be delivered at the executive mansion in Columbus this week.

A challenge has been issued by the Buick Motor company to match the model "17" Buick, which is rated at 30 horse-power and listed at $1750, against any regular or colored five passenger stock car selling for less than $2500 to a combination hill-climbing speed and power test.

One entire year's output of all the automobile factories in the United States six years ago amounted to forty-six four-cylinder cars. The Cadillac Motor Car company on January 30th turned out seventy-four four-cylinder Cadillac 30 touring cars.

An automobile passenger service which has been running for several years at San Juan, Porto Rico, has proven so satisfactory to the people of the section through which the cars have been run that they are thoroughly converted to this means of transportation.

Automobile Notes.

Mr. Chester E. Weaver, vice-president and general manager of the Studebaker Bros. company of California, who returned recently after several weeks' absence in the East attending the big automobile shows, has the following to say about the permanence of the automobile:

"It seems certain that the automobile is not destined to lose in popular favor as did the bicycle. There is a wide difference between the bicycle propelled by human power and the automobile propelled by a powerful gasoline motor. The bicycle carries but one and requires great muscular exertion, while the automobile takes the entire family out with much greater speed than can be attained by any other means of private conveyance. Besides, it gives the luxurious ease which is so desired by all classes, especially when they are tired from the present day strenuous life."

"All manufacturers have become alive to the fact that one of the essential features in an automobile is construction in such a way as to save fuel, wear and tear and much attention is now being given by these manufacturers to the feature of economy of operation. This necessarily means as light a car as is consistent and has resulted in scientifically considering the question of carbody construction and reducing to a minimum the question of friction."

"The greatest number of sales by any one manufacturer during the show was by the Studebaker E-M-F '30' company and the greatest number of sales consummated on high-grade cars was divided pretty equally between three manufacturers, one of which was the Studebaker company."

Gen. John T. Cutting declares the great popularity of the Oldsmobile comes from the prestige which ten years of building on logical lines by the Olds Motor works has given to it. Oldsmobiles are not made to break world's speed records, but built to negotiate the worst American roads in safety and comfort.

Announcement has been made to all dealers in Pierce Arrow cars of the plans for the 1909 school of instruction conducted by the Pierce Arrow Motor Car company of Buffalo. The plans for the present year include not only classes for chauffeurs and garage men, but also a special period during May for owners exclusively and one during April for colored men.

Forty thousand eight hundred and seventy-two miles on one set of tires with no trouble beyond two punctures is the record claimed by J. L. Martin of Fowler, Ind. They are the largest figures for a single set of its product ever reported to the Diamond Rubber Company.

The Goodyear Tire and Rubber company of Akron, Ohio, has just completed a new vulcanizing room of concrete and turret construction, built over the Cuyahoga river. A modern vulcanizing plant with eight presses, each of which will vulcanize at one time fourteen of the largest tires made, has been installed in this room. In combination with the old vulcanizing rooms this is said to give to the company the largest vulcanizing capacity in the world.

Mrs. K. R. Otis of Cleveland says that although she has driven the Stearns car bought by her a year ago more than 1,300 miles her repair bills have amounted to less than one dollar.

The magnificent reliability and remarkable endurance of the Studebaker automobiles under the most trying conditions in which it is possible to test the qualities of a machine, were again demonstrated in the recent mid-Winter 200-mile endurance run. All Studebaker entries finished with perfect scores and the run going and coming was made without the slightest mishap. The prize winning cars were selected at random from the stock and sent on the journey. Duplicates of these machines are constantly on display in our salesrooms. Demonstrations at your own convenience.

PERSONALIA

The New York magazine of Charlotte Cushman, the great tragic actress, is now a household name run by a nephew of the same name.

A reason advanced by Speaker Cannon for refusing a bribe of $100,000 cash once upon a time was his disinclination to sleep with a thief all the rest of his life.

The author of the "Elsie Dinsmore" books, Miss Martha Finley, recently died after forty years' continuous chronicling of the adventures of that impossibly pious child.

Mrs. B. M. Carson, of California, is the author of "From Cairo to the Cataract," a collection of letters describing the Nile region as seen by a "personally conducted" tourist.

Perhaps as picturesque a name as any in letters is Miss Otilie Adaline Liljencrantz. Suggestions for pronunciation solicited. Author of five books. Address, Chicago, Chicago!

G. E. Acheson, the inventor of carborundum, lost a fortune from that product by losing control of the company organized to manufacture it, and has made another from the invention of a new method of making graphite.

After Edison, the most prolific inventor in America is Emile Berliner, of Washington, D. C., who invented the Victor talking machine, the microphone transmitter in ordinary use in telephones, and several hundred other valuable patents.

All Harvard men, who have chanted the verses about "Professor Shaler, scientific mountain scaler," etc., will be glad to know that his autobiography, together with supplemental memories by Mrs. Shaler, will be published in April.

Edison declares that he is "done with business." He doesn't "like the game, the men who play it, nor the rules." Perhaps a bitter lawsuit with his son, T. A. Edison, Jr., over the legal right to use that name as a business asset, accentuated his dislike.

The Outing Magazine for February contains an article, "Along the American Riviera," by Charles Frederick Holder, which describes in detail the lure of California for the lover of outdoor life: its motor roads, camping grounds, trout streams, forest groves, all illustrated sumptuously with full-page photographs.

T. L. Woolwine, the prosecuting attorney of Los Angeles, has fished a few hours from his labor of enforcing liquor laws, to write a novel of the Tennessee mountains, called "In the Valley of the Shadows," to be published by Doubleday Page & Co. His mother, perhaps the local moonshiners suggested a romance of the home of moonshine whiskey to the attorney.

Charles P. Steinmetz, the electrical expert of the General Electric company, and reputed to be one of the greatest living authorities on electricity, is so afraid of the "juice" that he will not throw an ordinary switch with his hands. He uses a long wooden pole as an extra precaution. He is an exile from Germany for political reasons, is a good chemist, and a mathematical genius besides. He is also a dwarf, being slightly over four feet high. His hobbies are parrots, cactus plants, and black cigars.

W. C. Brown, new president of the New York Central railroad, was vice-president when the company began running its swift eighteen-hour train to Chicago. Soon there was a frightful accident, and President Newman ordered the train taken off permanently. Brown, who was on Chicago at the time, telegraphed protests to no avail, and then he hurried back to New York, got the directors together, insisted that the train be restored, and succeeded in persuading them to his view, over the objections of the timid Newman. After that it was plain who was the real head of the company.

Man that is born of woman is small potatoes and takes to the hill, and usually about as necessary as a smokestack on a watering cart. He takes pride to himself, in his indomitable will, but it only needs an eighty-nine-cent alarm clock to wake him up in the morning. He stands at the altar with his bride and is pleased with his looks. And all the time her relations are wondering where she ever ran into him. He says unto his fellow-men that he is the boss of his house and what he wants goes there strong. Then he hurries home to button up the back of his wife's waist. His wife takes his name, his creditors take his money, his tailor takes his measure—but none of them take him seriously. Man is merely a matter of opinion—his wife's opinion. And that is a serial without an end.—New York Times.

"54-40 or Fight."

This novel deals with the events that led up to the annexation of Texas and the acquisition of Oregon, but it is unconvincing as history and dull as fiction. We are asked to believe that the Baroness von Ritz, an agent of England, after a few conversations with the hero, who is John Calhoun's private secretary, suddenly decides that the more territory there is under the government of the United States, and the less under English rule, the better off the world will be. So she persuades Sir Richard Pakenham, the British ambassador, to give up his schemes for getting Texas and to agree on the 49th parallel as the Oregon boundary. In spite of the rough-and-tumble title there is not a fight in the book and dreary political conversations take the place of action. The Bobbs-Merrill Company, Indianapolis.

THE WORK OF

Allen's Press Clipping Bureau

FOR PUBLIC MEN

Allen's Press Clipping Bureau has now had experience in six National and five State Campaigns. In this time it has had the honor of serving hundreds of public men, including members of the Cabinet, U. S. Senators, Congressmen, Governors, State Senators and Assemblymen, Mayors, and State and County Central Committees.

It has added these men by bringing them quickly, easily, and cheaply, what the entire press has to say of them or the measures in which they are interested.

A thorough clipping service discloses the state and trend of public opinion, brings to attention false charges that should be denied, true charges that should be parried, shows what editors need argument, and what editors need encouragement—in short, aids in handling the most powerful and important of political engines, the Press.

Having three offices, a staff of thirty people, and trading 2,000,000 copies per week, we have now no quarries of difficulties for very high-grade and thorough work.

We can cover counties, districts, the State, or the Pacific States.

Rates will be furnished on application.

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

The Supreme Court.

If the Man from Mars were to be guided by what our national constitution says about it he would form a most inaccurate and inadequate conception of the power and influence of our national judiciary. The sections of the constitution which refer to it are few and simple in form. No efforts were made in the constitutional convention, to hedge it about with checks and balances, as other departments of government are hedged. Congress says how these courts shall be constituted, and the president, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, says who shall constitute them, and that is the whole of it—on paper.

Yet the Supreme Court of the United States is the most wonderful judicial body on earth. Congress, president and people have for it almost a superstitious veneration. It is as if the doctrine that the king can do no wrong had been incorporated into our scheme of government and applied to the supreme court instead of to Congress or president. The seats upon which those gowned judges sit are indeed seats of the mighty. Created by Congress and president, the supreme court transcends in final authority both Congress and president, and is negative, in theory if not always in practice, the fundamental principle upon which our government was founded—that the will of the people is the supreme law of the land. That court is hedged away from the influence of the people as far as it was possible to hedge it and it is made as independent of the popular will as it is possible to make anything made of flesh and blood, body, soul and spirit.

And yet the Supreme Court of the United States exercises its autocratic powers with moderation and keeps more nearly in touch with the trend of the popular mind than one would suppose it possible for a body of men so sequestered to do. It lags, but no irreparable harm has come from its lagging behind the popular will. It is conservative without being reactionary, and it is progressive without being radical. When the pro-slavery power was preeminent it resisted the Dred Scott decision. When the nation expanded it so shaped its decisions as not to hamper this young giant of a republic in the use of its limbs. When partisan issues have reached it has divided along partisan lines. When issues involving the rights of man against the vested wrongs of a material age are passed upon to it for determination it divides five to four, with the determining man as often on the side of humanity as on the side of vested privilege. All of which is saying that the members of the supreme Court were mere men before they went upon the bench and remained mere men after they got there, politics, prejudices and all.

In its spirit and function the Supreme Court of the United States is almost as much a legislative as judicial body. It is a top-story council of state, serene in life-tenure of office, not so many in number as to make it the victim of partisan passion or so few as to make it a cabal. It has few great names upon its roster, but it has had a few who were splendidly able and one, at least, great enough to fill a great place at a time of great need.

John Marshall will live among our nation builders as long as Washington, Madison or Hamilton. Without his wise and prudent statesmanship (for that is what it was) our new-fangled government would scarcely have gotten its wheels in motion. His doctrine of the implied powers of government saved the government, for the implied powers of government are far more important than the expressed. They have caused the constitutional garment to grow as the young giant within it has grown, with the result that there have been few rips in the vestment and liberty of man has been little interfered with. If it shall happen that a narrow-between-the-eyes bench shall refuse to walk in the path that Marshall marked out, it will be bad for the garment and worse for the bench. As for the giant, he will take care of himself.

The power the supreme court possesses is not due to the court itself or to the constitution that authorized its creation, but to the imperative need for such a tribunal to determine crucial issues. The destiny of this nation will never hang on a court decision. In a last analysis that court does no more than register the ultimate decision of the American people, and when it refuses to do that it will step down from its high place and become a mere attendant upon the pleasure of either the legislative or executive departments of government, whichever of these best responds to the popular will.

No other nation allows its supreme court to be as supreme as does our nation. In the British government the House of Lords is the court of last resort, but the House of Commons would force the hands of the Lords if an issue arose vitally affecting the policy of the nation. In France parliament transcends the courts and in Germany the emperor would probably determine the final issue. President Roosevelt has suggested that the executive department should be less hampered by court restrictions, but nothing is likely to be done about it.

Do You Hear Well?

The Stolz Electrophone—A New, Electrical, Scientific and Practical Invention for those who are Deaf or Partially Deaf.

MAY NOW BE TESTED IN YOUR OWN HOME.

Deaf or partially deaf people now may make a trial of the Stolz Electrophone at home. This personal, practical test serves to prove that the device satisfies, with ease, every requirement of a perfect hearing device.

This new invention renders unnecessary such clumsy, unsightly and frequently harmful devices as trumpets, horns, tubes, ear drums, fans, etc. It is a tiny electric telephone that fits on the ear and which, the instant it is applied, magnifies the sound waves in such manner as to cause an astonishing increase in the clearness of all sounds. It overcomes the buzzing and roaring ear noises and, also, so constantly and electrically exercises the vital parts of the ear that, usually, the natural unaided hearing itself is gradually restored.

THE PLEDGE OF CITIZENSHIP

I, a citizen of the United States of America, realizing that a free Republic is an impossibility unless the citizen performs his civic duty, hereby pledge myself upon my sacred honor never to fail to exercise my right of citizenship by voting at every election, primary or secondary, wherever it is possible and legal for me to render that service to my country, my health permitting me so to do.

In taking this pledge it is distinctly understood that I in no way obligate myself to vote for any particular party, any definite candidate or any certain measure. I am binding myself only to my Country, and pledging myself solely to the faithful performance of the duty I owe to her as a citizen.

Address:

WHY TAKE THE FOREGOING PLEDGE?

Those taking the foregoing pledge, signing and sending it to this office, will be enrolled upon The California Weekly's "School for Citizenship," which will be a permanent feature of this paper. It will entitle the person sending in his name to have answered, either through the columns of the paper or by letter, any rational question he may ask concerning public affairs, and, generally, by the person best equipped to afford the desired information. It will also entitle the signer to such special literature as may be issued upon the obligations of good citizenship as may from time to time be issued. While this pledge is open to persons of all ages it is especially desired that it be taken and sent in by young men lately become voters or who will cast their first votes two years hence. It will take but a moment to clip out the pledge, sign, enclose in an envelope, and address to "School for Citizenship," office The California Weekly, 26 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, and it opens the way for a liberal education in citizenship.

DIRECT PRIMARY LAW.

The passage of the direct primary bill through both houses, in substantially the form presented by the Direct Primary League, is now practically assured. About the only thing yielded to the politicians is the concession that county and state conventions shall still meet, ostensibly to adopt platforms, but really to permit the politicians to orate. If these conventions serve merely as innocuous safety-valves for pent-up eloquence, they may be overlooked, as a harmless amusement. If they are abused, to give opportunity to put up programs, they should be abolished, at the first legislative session after the abuse develops.

One other feature that ought probably to be modified, at the next legislature, is the provision which prevents one party, when it desires, from endorsing the nominee of another. But the Quixotic futility of attempting to improve that feature, at this session, is illustrated by the fact that the same senate, which voted twenty-seven to thirteen against the machine effort to make the bill worse could muster only nine votes for a motion to make it, in this respect, better. The judgment of the committee of the Direct Primary League, that a bill any more non-partisan than the one presented could not pass, is thus confirmed.

With these minor exceptions, the bill is probably the most thorough and best-considered direct primary law yet presented to an American state. It marks the beginning of the end of boss rule in California politics, and restores to the people control of their own affairs. It is not so much a "good government" measure as a peoples' government measure. "Good government" often smacks of autocracy, and peoples' government is sometimes very imperfect government. That depends on the people. But hitherto the chief obstacle to good government has come from the boss, not from the people. The direct primary will remove that obstacle. Leadership, organization and education must solve the remaining evils.

THE ORPHANAGES.

There is no state in the union where the care of dependent children more certainly needs to be exposed to the light than in California. It is not that there is graft or inhumanity or imbecility of management to be complained of, although there is some of all these, but our present system puts a premium upon dependency and the public has no proper method of keeping itself informed as to the true state of that important charity.

There is in California a body constituted expressly to stand between the public and its institutional life, to keep the public informed as to the condition of the state's charities and to be benefactions, and to aid institutions by its advice. That body is the State Board of Charities and Corrections. Under Governor Pardee's administration it was entirely out of politics. Governor Gillett brought it into politics, but he will not always be governor and the upward tendency of civic affairs will probably prevent his successor following his example in this particular.

Assembly Bill 945 provides in simple terms for a general visitation and advisory relation of this board toward the forty-odd orphanages of the state. That does not go far enough, but will suffice for the present, or until the public can gain, through the board, a fuller understanding of the dependent children's problem upon which to found a radically different policy from that heretofore pursued. In this particular charity California is far behind such states as New York and Massachusetts and her children are the sufferers. The bill should pass.

CRIMINAL LAW REFORM.

Two of the reforms looked for from the present legislature are now assured—the race-track gambling bill and the direct primary bill. Prospects of the third and even more important reform are not so good. While there will doubtless be some laws passed, simplifying the criminal procedure, there will be no thorough-going and comprehensive scheme of reform. The proposition seems too big for the legislature to tackle, off-hand. It does not seem disposed to accept the Commonwealth club bills, nor all of the Bar Association bills.

There is a disposition, on the part of the small lawyers, who make up a considerable part of the membership of both judiciary committees, to cling to the technical procedure in which they have been trained; and there is a prevalent hallucination that the demand for reform is local to San Francisco and grows out of the graft prosecution. Public sentiment, while doubtless as unanimous for this reform as for any other, does not appear to have been crystallized as definitely as that which forced the other two reforms. Consequently, while something may be done, it will not be enough, and the main problem is to prepare now to get more next time.

Possibly the experience of those who promoted the other two reforms may point the way. The Anti-Race-Track League and the Direct Primary League were both state-wide organizations. Both had a multitude of privates, who constituted the propulsive force, and a few carefully selected officers, who did the guiding. Both went before the legislature with definite bills, with a definite plan of campaign, and thoroughly effective publicity organizations. And both won, promptly and easily. A similar organization, to promote the reform of criminal law, might as readily grow out of the nucleus already provided by any one of several existing organizations.

MERE GOODNESS WON'T SAVE.

A number of our exchanges have felicitated themselves, and the state, upon the fact that James N. Gillett, despite his manner of nomination for office, and unwholesome political connections, has not made a bad governor, and they are inclined to concede that all's well that ends well. This is too much to admit. Governor Gillett's mere goodness will not save him. We will go farther. If James N. Gillett had made the best governor in the state's history that fact would neither justify the methods by which his nomination and election were secured nor make fortunate the untoward influences by which he has been, and is, surrounded. We will go farther still and declare that if it could be conceded without question that the Southern Pacific Political Bureau, and its handy men, of whom Governor Gillett is one, could be relied on to govern California more economically and honestly than the people of California can govern themselves it would be unprofitable and unpatriotic to permit that bureau to do the governing. The function of governing is to the body politic what exercise is to the human body, what play is to children, what self-dependence is to independence, the evolutionary impulse to the progress of the human race. The best product of self-government is the power to self-govern. The purpose of government is to make men, not automatons, whereas the political bureau method would make Californians, first subject, and then abject, dependents upon an incorporated plutocratic autocracy. No matter how blameless an executive Governor Gillett might make, his credentials come from the wrong source of power to be accepted by a self-respecting commonwealth.

OUR FIRST CITIZEN.

Before another issue of The California Weekly reaches its readers Theodore Roosevelt will have stepped down from the presidential chair and taken his place as the first citizen of the Great Republic. There is no man living who will dispute his right to that pre-eminence.

There runs an adage that it is not wise to enlarge, or to erect a monument to, any man while he is living lest he do something to forfeit public esteem. In the case of President Roosevelt that risk may safely be taken. He has already done the best—and worst—he will ever do, although if his life be spared, he will be a factor in affairs for many a year to come.

Nor even the seven years of plenty in the land of Egypt were more fruitful than the seven years of his presidency of the United States. No other president in our history has touched so many hearts, quickened so many consciences, started so many good influences to work as he, for, when Lincoln was president, there were not so many hearts to be touched, so many consciences to be quickened, so many agencies to be set in motion and, when Washington was president, there was not a tithe of the number.

There have been presidents whose influence hardly extended beyond officialdom, whose careers scarcely ruffled the surface of affairs within our national boundary, and whose prestige beyond that boundary was nil. Not so with Theodore Roosevelt. There is not a home, a nook, a cranny of humanity within the republic where his influence has not reached, not once alone, but many times, and always for an uplift, for renewed courage and hopefulness, for a stronger demand for justice with a clearer view of what constitutes justice.

Nor has he been content to deal alone with affairs of state. He has touched humanity at all points where it may be helped. He has not alone been the chief executive, the nation's president, but president also of the American people, all of them. He has been a moral steam engine, a conscience dynamo, a civic battery. So strenuous has been his influence that a feeling of weariness pervades the mind of the people, not weariness of the president but of the high pressure he has put upon them, and they would like to float with the current of affairs a little while that they may rest preparatory to another forward movement. They entertain the hope that President Taft may be content to hold fast to what has been accomplished without attempting to crowd events, even beneficially.

If one were to attempt to characterize President Roosevelt's administration with a few propositions it would best be done by affirming his cardinal principles to be: that honesty is the best policy, that publicity is the best purifier, that the human interest transcends the material no matter how important the latter may be. He has believed that business cannot be so hurt by establishing justice as by failing to establish it, that legitimate riches cannot be so injured by regulative measures as by offering profligate wealth to go unregulated.

Whatever may befall Theodore Roosevelt, at home or abroad, he has implanted in the idioms of our language, in the every day thoughts of all our people, the "strenuous life," the "square deal," the "decent citizenship," as well as the "undesirable," the "softly-spoken word," and the "big stick," "race suicide," "mollycoddle," "malfeasors of great wealth." These "sayings" of Roosevelt are part of our lives and will abide. No other man in our history so well deserves to be loved for the enemies he has made as this "first citizen" of our Great Republic. We shall be able to know them by their ill-concealed joy that he is to occupy the presidential chair

CORPORATIONS GOOD AND EVIL.

Every baby born into the world is inherently a barbarian. It has to be taught justice, truth, mercy, the rights of property and of man, or it will never respect any of those rights. It is a good deal so with that artificial person known as a corporation. Inherently it is predatory. Its management is more answerable to its shareholders for results than for how those results are obtained, and this puts a premium upon over-reaching, sharp practice, predatory raids upon competitive interests and the commonality; but constitute a corporation of right-minded men, with shareholders who feel the same moral responsibility for the conduct of the company's business that they would feel if it were their own, and no one will find in such a corporation just cause for complaint.

The recent municipal experience of Oakland illustrates this truth in a way so striking as to deserve special attention. Elsewhere in this paper will be found an interesting resume of the recent political history of that city. Those who read it will be impressed with the fact that bad government in Oakland was coincident with the existence and activity of bad corporations doing business there, and that good government was coincident with the displacing, or defeating, of those bad corporations and the advancement of corporations endowed with moral character.

Oakland sees a great corporation in possession of a large share of its environs, and growing rich through what Henry George would have called an "uncaptured increment," but an increment which this corporation is trying to earn by legitimate development, and this is being witnessed without envy and without complaint for the reason that the corporation in question deals fairly with the public and will neither bribe public servants nor permit itself to be "held-up" by them.

The Oakland water front has been a bone of contention between that city and the Southern Pacific company for decades during some of which the politician here of that company misgoverned Oakland in its own interests. Along came the Western Pacific, put its business in reputable hands, fought the city's fight for the water front, won it, and gained the confidence of Oaklanders and kept it, with a final result that justice and fair dealing regarding that issue are about to be established between all parties for a generation to come.

During the existence of the Contra Costa Water company, Oakland lived in a nightmare of criminality and was so battered off by political parasites that, although taxes were kept high, little municipal progress was made and civic health and conscience were at low ebb. The displacement of this ill-constituted corporation by the People's Water company, which substituted reasonable rates for extortionate, fair methods for foul, has restored peace to the east bay cities and public confidence in municipal enterprise.

The contention of President Roosevelt that there are good trusts and bad, moral corporations and immoral, has been exemplified in the municipal history of Oakland and our resume of that history, elsewhere in this paper, is commended to thoughtful readers.

THE REFORMATORY IN DANGER.

California's conduct of its prisons and regard for its prisoners has less to commend it than any other department of state government. The state has, in this particular, been dead to its own interests and as callous to the interests of its erring wards as ever master was to slave. A form of politics, more criminal than much of the criminality the state has sought to punish, has made merchandise of the most solemn obligations that man can owe to man, and the beginning of better things is barely perceptible. It is time something were done for the redemption of the state from this reproach.

A number of citizens, solicitous at once for the honor of California and for the well-being of fellow mortals, have interested themselves in the establishment of a State Reformatory and have asked the legislature to enact the necessary laws and to appropriate $250,000 to make a beginning. Unfortunately for the bill, but fortunately for its purpose, it is not provided that the State Board of Prison Politicians, with the Lieutenant Governor at its head, shall have the enterprise in charge, but that the governor shall select a commission of five persons to put the measure into execution. Until such time as the state shall abolish all prison and reformatory boards, and establish in their stead a department of penology to deal with the entire problem from delinquent childhood to incorrigible criminality, this is as good a thing as can be done.

But the bill languishes in committee. Lieutenant Governor Porter desires that a commission be appointed to investigate the reformatory idea and report two years hence. This because Mr. Porter does not know about reformatories. It is hardly necessary for the state to wait until Mr. Porter is informed as to the elements of penology. The reformatory is as little a matter of doubt as the hospital for the insane, the home for feeble minded, the public school. Its utility has been demonstrated beyond intelligent question and if the state must await the lagging legs of unintelligent officialdom a new generation will enter upon the stage of action before a reformatory can be established. Mr. Porter may well be eliminated from consideration in the premises. As "doing politics" is to be no part of the undertaking his peculiar talents will not be in demand. Whoever cares for California's name and fame and has not lost power to sympathize with those who have taken a first wrong step, but need not take another, should write to his senator and assemblyman to push along that reformatory measure. It is much to the purpose.

It may be entirely true as claimed by Governor Gillett that his delay of nine days in signing the anti-race track gambling bill was not occasioned by any intent on his part to allow the sharpers nine more days in which to skin the foolish rabbits that may fall into their clutches, but it cannot be denied that the nine days of delay did give those sharpers exactly nine more days in which to finish the skinning. Governor Gillett's attitude toward the race-track gambling issue has not at any time been that of a moral reformer but only that of an unmoral performer.

The Criminal Alien.

All nations suffer from the importation of criminals as all countries in California suffer from hordes floated from the next country. Complaint comes from England that, next to drunkenness, the most prolific source of criminality is the "floating" of criminals from continental Europe. There is no remorse justice in England's affliction for, during the first half century of our national existence, that country shipped its criminal classes to the United States en masse.

Race Riots Rampant.

Omaha and Kansas City have given exhibitions of racial antipathy not creditable to our country, and with no better justification than a difference of race not devoid of consanguinity, for the Greeks are not a different, but only a differing, race. Greece is a feeble nation and not able to protect its citizens in a foreign land, but we may be sure that these two incidents will become subjects for diplomatic negotiations. We are such a lawless people that occasions for such outbreaks should be reduced to the minimum, the more especially until we have shown ourselves better able to deal effectually with our twin criminal masters—the lawless millionaire and the equally lawless mob.

An Opportunity for Independence.

Senator Perkins has long been criticised because of his willingness to "take program" from interests not struggling primarily for the common good, but the senior senator now has an opportunity to put his critics to confusion and to re-instate himself in the good opinion of his constituents. In the nature of things he cannot look forward to another reelection. Why, then, need he longer make friends with the mammon of unrighteousness, why may he not stiffen his backbone until he walk as straight as Roosevelt himself? Here is hoping that he may take full advantage of his opportunity.

Freedom of Speech Returning.

The Washington correspondent of the Indianapolis News ventures the prophecy that with the exit of Theodore Roosevelt there will be a revival of freedom of speech among the statesmen at the capitol. For seven long years they have endured in silence, knowing well that the people would believe the president and disbelieve them and, therefore, not daring to say him nay. What a lot of molly-coddles! Nothing so well became them as their silence and were they now to chatter like magpies nothing would come of it.

Saving Their Faces.

Congress appears determined that the secret service shall not be employed for purposes other than the protection of the president and the punishment of counterfeiting, but it has manifested a willingness to create another secret service, equally as competent, to be placed at the disposal of the president to be used for the general benefit. This is, of course, child's play, about as little creditable to Congress as its stubborn misbehavior in the first instance.

The Capitol That Wasn't Moved.

Those who read the article of the transformed state capitol building at Sacramento will be properly thankful that California did not do so foolishly as to move the capitol of the state to Berkeley. The edifice as it stands is scarcely excelled for beauty anywhere in the United States and it should serve for the transaction of public business for another half century. When more room is needed it may be had by adding a wing to the north end and another to the south and, if opulence requires the facing of the building with marble, that may be done also. The capitol removal movement was an instance of vengeful Southern Pacific politics, as ready to make sport of the ambitions of Berkeley as to punish Sacramento for its refusal to bend the knee.

Her Advantages Inadequate.

Mrs. Charles Eastman saw the Coopers kill Carmack in the street at Nashville and so testified, but her testimony, direct and candid though it was, is not to go unquestioned. The defense is insisting that, inasmuch as Mrs. Eastman is a woman wholly unused to scenes of violence and bloodshed (even though a citizen of Nashville), her testimony must be held to be immaterial if not irrelevant. According to the legal philosophy of the defense, in order to be a competent witness in an affair of honor, one must have been so upon the firing line as to stand unmoved, calm and collected, though men are falling all around riddled with bullets and weltering in their gore. Good joke!

Bring Them Under the Law.

Insurance Commissioner E. Myron Wolfe states that the fraternal insurance associations are now a law unto themselves in this state. There is no more justification for this than for allowing insurance companies of all kinds to be a law unto themselves. All insurance institutions should be under the careful supervision of the law. The doctrine of laissez faire is no better when applied to this activity than to any other. No matter how managed the truths of actuaries cannot be gotten away from, and any attempt to get away from them must result in no insurance for many who pay insurance for others. The only opportunity for cheapening insurance that fraternalism have over insurance corporations lies in curtailing the cost of doing business and in paying dividends to stockholders, but fraternal "wild cat" is no safer than corporate "wild cat" and just as likely to be prowling around.

Getting Products To Market.

Opposition to the governor's pet scheme for giving the "organization" $18,000,000 to handle in road making has taken the sensible ground that the roads proposed will not help farmers to get their products to market. Of course they will not, and that is the main purpose for the building of good roads. The policy of the state toward good roads is so simple that only a politician need err therein. It is to teach the counties how to build good roads with the materials at hand. Then to build good roads through the mountains where private property cannot be taxed for that purpose. If this policy be followed adequately the state will have quite as much of a road building burden as it will be contented to carry.

The Collateral Inheritance Tax.

It is humiliating that those who receive bequests should so begrudge the state its modest share as to employ all manner of devices for avoiding the payment of the inheritance tax, but such is the practice. There is no natural right to anything that one has not himself created. If society restrains itself from taking all that those who die leave behind it is more because of its goodness of heart than because of any moral obligation. However, our social order has ordained that those shall accumulate who have the capacity and those shall keep who can, but that out of whatever is devised a certain toll shall be taken for the common good. This is a reasonable regulation and the Attorney General and State Controller are doing no more than their duty in asking for further legislation to enable them to collect collateral inheritance taxes. If the law were to penalize those who strive to side-step the law there would be no just grounds for complaint and the general welfare might be advanced.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

We are not without teachers to tell us how to make our lives long, how to raise fulness of years from three-score and ten to five-score. There are not wanting those who will show us how to make our lives productive, but where shall we look for one to teach us how to fill each hour with a conscious joy of living?

We have been taught many things about this world: that it is a school of preparation for something that is to come hereafter; that it is a fiery furnace for burning the dross out of us so that, at the end, only the refined gold shall remain; that it is a valley in shadow, a vale of tears, a place of sojourn, a battle ground over which the good and ill in us—the dual life—fight for supremacy; but who has taught us that it is a place in which to live, live to the end within itself?

To every person in health it should be a conscious joy to be alive. In giving us life God gave us the best thing he had to give, unless it be immortality, and he could not give us immortality without first giving us life. It is for us to learn to live so wisely and so well as to get the greatest good out of life. Every waking hour should be a conscious, not an unnoted, joy, and any life that does not yield this is not well ordered.

As good health is not the mere absence of illness, but an abounding buoyancy of spirit, so happiness is not the mere absence of misery. We are not satisfied that the food we eat shall not taste bad. We wish it to taste good, and if we "fletcherize" what we eat we shall not be content to swallow a morsel until we have masticated all the good taste out of it. So ought it to be with us in the art of fully living. At the end of life we should be able to exclaim with the President as his administration nears its end: "I have had a bulky time, something doing every minute!"

We ought to swallow our sorrows as we do our quinine—in capsules; but the good things of life should be made to yield all the pleasure they possess before slipping beyond control. There are those who squeeze the last drop of gall out of whatever bitterness comes into their lives, and then try to inject the virus into the veins of those who come near them. It was a wise woman who, having lost a son, declined to receive the visit of an old friend who had lost a daughter, in the knowledge that, by pooling their griefs, they would double the misery of both, and to no good end.

It might not be well to go as far as the widow who, having buried her husband, declined to have him remain with her "to comfort her," because she well knew that the sister would "talk of nothing but John, John the whole time," whereas she wanted to "forget John as soon as ever she could"; but there was a grain of true philosophy in it.

A wife so devoted herself to her husband as to efface herself and exalt him, not knowing that he would be a better man if she had claimed her due each day! A mother so forgets herself in the care of her children as scarcely to have an hour that she can call her own, living a starved life, so far as pleasures are concerned, and bringing her over-indulged children up to be selfish and lazy! An injustice suffered is nearly as bad as an injustice inflicted, for it leaves human affairs as much out of balance. The right to live one's own life should be unalienable even by marriage, by motherhood or in the breadwinning for a family. A witty European visitor declared that the progress of America was due to the women who were so determined to live things in style that they forced their husbands to drudge their lives away making money for them to spend, and it cannot be denied that many an American millionaire will face the Day of Judgment with no better equipment for the ordeal of knowledge of the true proportions of the price of pork in principal markets can afford him.

The perfected schools of the future will teach the art of living as a fine art.

THE WORLD AT LARGE

Steel Coming Down.

The most important event of the week in the East is the breaking out of open warfare between the United States Steel Corporation and independent steel companies. Prices have been materially cut and further reductions are anticipated, but it may be doubted if the warfare will reduce prices below what it is anticipated that the new tariff will render certain. The great corporation cannot hope to force other plants into its ownership for it already has manufacturing power of the country and that is as far as the anti-trust law will let it go. It is likely that the price cutting is nothing more than an anticipation of tariff eventualities designed to stimulate present placing of orders instead of delays thereon until after the tariff is revised to then come with a rush.

McCall to Dartmouth.

Samuel McCall, the brilliant, erratic and somewhat profane "kicker" congressman from Massachusetts, will shortly resign his seat in the House of Representatives to become president of Dartmouth college at Hanover, New Hampshire, and there is a wireless message in the air somewhere that this is being done as a stepping-stone to the United States Senate from the Old Granite state, the noble lords of Massachusetts not being able to make senatorial room for him from that commonwealth. New Hampshire is a political dependency of the Boston & Maine railroad and as the Boston & Maine is a Massachusetts concern the rest will be easy.
